In addition to all this, the faith and principles and platforms of the Democratic party of the country, as enunciated in their Cincinnati resolutions, in Mr. Buchanan's letter of acceptance, and in his inaugural address, were accepted as a pledge and a guarantee to the people of Kansas, of the full and free exercise of this right. Relying upon these solemn and reiterated pledges, and this universal and unquestioned understanding, the free-State people might very well regard it as they did regard it—of comparatively little importance who composed the convention, what particular individuals had the framing of the constitution, or whether they were chosen by few or by many votes, so long as whatever constitution they might frame was to be submitted to the people, and to pass the ordeal of their scrutiny and of their vote. If they approved it they could say so; if they did not approve it they could say so, and reject it. The constitution, the whole constitution, and nothing but the constitution, was to be presented, for a direct vote, to the people themselves, for their approval or disapproval. Under these circumstances the free-State people refrained from taking any part in that election. In addition to all the other reasons for not taking part in this election, these pledges and assurances furnished a very strong inducement and justification for this course of action.

This Lecompton convention having been elected under these circumstances—under these positive and repeated promises and pledges, and with the universal understanding that they were to submit the constitution to a direct and fair vote of the people for acceptance or rejection, it is quite too late now to say that the convention was invested with the sovereignty of the people; that they were the people in a representative capacity; that all the powers of the people, in that behalf, had been delegated to them; that they acted instead of the people, and without restriction; that they were at liberty to withhold from the people whatever constitution they might frame. They were invested with no such sovereignty; with no such authority; with no such power. They were invested with no power but to frame a form of constitution for the consideration of the people, to be ratified or rejected by them as they should see fit. So the people of Kansas understood it at the time. So the delegates themselves understood it. So everybody everywhere understood it. They were the mere agents of the people, with authority clearly limited, to perform a particular act, which, when done, was to be delivered over to their principal, the people, for their final action. They were a mere committee of the people—mere scribes or prothonotaries, selected for the purpose of drafting a form of government to be submitted to the people for their acceptance or refusal as they should judge to be for the best. This was the utmost extent of the authority with which that convention was invested.

Sir, the free-State people of Kansas knew very well, from past and bitter experience, that they would be cheated in one way or another if they went to the polls at that election. They knew enough of the members of that convention to believe them capable of any swindle which by any possibility they might be able to practice upon them. But they had not then learned how soon the President of the United States would forget his pledges; they had not then learned, and could not have been made to believe, after all his fair promises, that he would so soon bring the influence of his position, and the power of his patronage, to aid in the effort to carry out to its final and bitter end a flagrant deception practiced upon them—a bald and barefaced and impudent mockery of their hopes and expectations, and of their right, too, under the pretense of a submission, which was no submission at all, and by which they were tricked out of the privilege which had been most solemnly assured to them, and by which they were wheedled out of the exercise of the most sacred rights which belong to American freemen. It seems the convention knew their master much better than the people did. Will Congress ratify the cheat? That is the question, and the very question now before us.

Let us see, now, sir, how these pledges have been redeemed. The President and his Cabinet, and the whole Democratic party, and even the delegates themselves, were too strongly, and too publicly and notoriously committed, to a submission of the constitution to a direct vote of the people for approval or rejection, to be altogether overlooked or disregarded. Some plan, some device, must be contrived, by which, at least, to save appearances—to save some appearance of consistency, and of common honesty, and, at the same time, to save this bogus constitution. The recent territorial election had made it very apparent that if the constitution was submitted to the people, it would be rejected by an overwhelming vote, and yet, it would hardly do to withhold it altogether from them, after the whole party, from the President of the United States down to the president of the Lecompton convention, had pledged themselves before the world that it should be submitted to the popular vote. So a cunning device was hit upon by which to mock the people with an appearance of submitting the constitution to them, and, at the same time, making it impossible to cast a vote against it. No knave ever hit upon a more artful scheme by which to cover his own villainy and to delude the public. The device furnishes a mere pretext of having done what everybody had promised should be done; when, in fact, nothing of the kind has been done.

The plan contrived for the pretended submission of the constitution was this: Two kinds of ballots, and only two kinds, were to be used; one of which was indorsed "constitution with slavery;" the other "constitution with no slavery." These were the forms prescribed by the convention, and these were the only ballots that could be cast. A more artful piece of legerdemain was never contrived by the wit of man. Let us see its operation. The people could only vote for the "constitution with slavery," or for the "constitution with no slavery;" but for the constitution, at all events, if they voted at all. No man, who voted at all, could vote against the constitution. But it is said and insisted that the question of slavery or no slavery was fairly submitted to the people; and that being the great question in controversy, that the pledge to submit the constitution to the people was virtually answered. But, sir, the question of slavery—the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State—was not submitted to the people. Now, let us look a little further into this trick, by which it is pretended that the slavery question was submitted to the people, when, in fact, it did no such thing.

Now, it will be perceived, by reference to the schedule which describes the plan of submission, that if a majority of the ballots cast were for the "constitution with slavery," then the constitution was to stand as it was framed, without change or modification; and nobody denies but that is a pro-slavery constitution. But, if a majority of the ballots cast were for the "constitution with no slavery," then the constitution was still to stand as it was framed, except that the seventh section, which authorizes the future importation of slaves into the State, was to be stricken out. This was the only change that was to be made in the constitution, in case a majority of the people voted the ballot "constitution with no slavery." But now observe—and here is the trick—that, although the seventh section should be stricken out, the constitution still provides, in the schedule—which was not to be, and could not be, stricken out by any vote of the people, under the prescribed form of ballot—that "the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with;" and this provision was to be retained, although a majority of the ballots cast should be "constitution with no slavery!" And, besides, the seventh section contained some excellent and humane provisions, which it would be desirable to retain, if slavery was to be at all tolerated by the constitution. It provided, among other things, for the proper care and treatment of slaves, and for their future emancipation, with the consent of their owners; but no such provision is made in any other section. So that, in fact, the "constitution with no slavery," according to the form of the ballot, with the seventh section stricken out, is a much more obnoxious pro-slavery constitution than is the "constitution with slavery," according to the form of the ballot, with the seventh section retained.

The unavoidable effect of this trick was, in the first place, that nobody could vote against the constitution. And, in the second place, that whoever voted at all, must vote for the constitution at all events; and for a pro-slavery constitution, at all events. Indeed, if a free-State man were to vote at all, it would be more consistent with his feelings and his principles to vote the ballot, "constitution with slavery" than to vote the ballot, "constitution with no slavery;" for the reason that the constitution, with the seventh section retained—and this is the effect of the ballot indorsed "constitution with slavery"—is much less objectionable than the constitution with the seventh section stricken out, which is the effect of the ballot indorsed, "constitution with no slavery."

But, I desire to look a little further still, into the practical operation of this Lecompton convention swindle. I use this term intentionally and deliberately, as the most appropriate and significant which can be applied to this device for submitting the constitution to the people. The President, in his special message of the 2d of February, says, "Kansas, therefore, at this moment, is as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina." Now, then, according to this assumption and this mode of submission, if every voter in Kansas had cast the ballot, "constitution with no slavery," it would have still left slavery there just as it is now, under that clause which declares that "the right of property in slaves now in the Territory, shall in no manner be interfered with;" and which, according to Mr. Buchanan's statement, would have still left it just as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. So that, by no possibility, under this mode of submission, could any man vote for making Kansas any less a slave State than it now is; and, of necessity, he could by no possibility vote for making Kansas any less a slave State than Georgia or South Carolina. There is no escape from this conclusion. And this is just what was designed by this mode of submission. This was a fair submission of the slavery question, was it?

Sir, no question was submitted to the people of Kansas, whether it should be a slave State or not? And yet the President of the United States affronts the intelligence and the common sense of the American people, when he says in his special message, that this "presented a fair opportunity to the people of Kansas to decide this exciting question in their own way," but that "they refused to exercise this right." Sir, the President knows, every Senator here knows, every man of common intelligence in the country knows, not only that the constitution was in no manner or form submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, but that the question of slavery itself was not submitted to them. The mode of submission did not admit of any vote against the constitution, nor of any vote against slavery in the State, just as it exists there now; and where the President says it exists just as much as it does in Georgia or South Carolina. Whoever asserts that the slavery question was fairly submitted to the people of Kansas, or that the question, whether it should be a slave State or a free State, was submitted to them at all—to use the mildest form of expression—entirely mistakes the fact, and though he may be deceived himself, he makes quite too large a draft upon the credulity or the ignorance of the public.

There was no mode, therefore, in which the free-State people could testify their disapproval and their abhorrence of the whole thing, except by refusing to vote at all on the 21st of December. They were not allowed to vote against it; they could not, in conscience, vote for it; there was, therefore, no other course left for them but to decline voting altogether on that occasion. In this way they manifested their most emphatic condemnation of it, and of the insolent chicanery by which a bald, naked pretense that the slavery question was fairly submitted, is set up, when, in truth, even that partial submission was never made. And now this piece of jugglery is claimed and is especially plead as a fulfillment of the most sacred pledges ever given by men in high life, or in low life, that the Lecompton constitution should be submitted to a fair vote of the people. Sir, no wonder the people of Kansas feel indignant and outraged at so base a betrayal. No wonder the people all over the country are aroused to indignation, and are gathering together in vast assemblages to give utterance to their indignant protests, in thunder tones, against the consummation of this great wrong and treachery toward the people of Kansas. Sir, the earthquake voice of an indignant and insulted nation's stern rebuke is already beginning to break upon your ears, and is pealing at the very doors of the Capitol. A fearful account awaits those who shall disregard these popular appeals. They come forth from the deep-swelling heart of an incensed people.

But, Mr. President, notwithstanding all the duplicity and the treachery which have been practiced upon the people of Kansas; notwithstanding the convention refused to submit the constitution, or any part of it, to a direct vote of the people; notwithstanding all efforts to suppress any and all expression of the public voice upon it; we are not left in the dark upon this subject. We are not left to doubt or to conjecture in regard to the judgment and will of the people of Kansas upon this Lecompton constitution. That judgment and will have been recently expressed upon it in a most emphatic manner on two occasions—once, indirectly, at the last October territorial election; and once directly upon the constitution itself, on the 4th of January last. At the October election, the people of Kansas, for the first time, through the agency and influence of Governor Walker, were suffered to go to the polls and vote, without serious hindrance or molestation. That election resulted in the signal success of the free-State party by about four to one, in a spirited canvass, in which the pro-slavery party turned out in full strength, and polled their entire vote; and when they attempted to return about three times the number of votes they had actually cast. You all remember the Oxford returns, containing some sixteen hundred names copied from the Cincinnati Directory! And you all know the sequel. The result of this election—the only one in which the relative strength of the two parties had been tested at the polls—was considered, both in Kansas and throughout the country, as decisive of the issue between them, whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State. The result of this election was everywhere considered as virtually settling that question. All men, of all parties, at the North, and many at the South, said that the question was now settled; that Kansas had spoken for herself; that a large majority of her people were in favor of a free State; that it would be in vain, and worse than in vain, to attempt to resist her will; that she would and must be a free State. This was the language of the people everywhere; and great credit was claimed as due to the policy of Mr. Buchanan's administration for this auspicious result, by the entire Democratic party, and the Democratic press throughout the free States.

So decisive was this expression of the popular sentiment in Kansas, that many of the delegates—all being pro-slavery men—refused to attend the adjourned meeting of the convention, so that but a quorum of the number were ever reassembled. The impression very generally prevailed that they would now abandon the attempt to frame a constitution. The convention was entirely pro-slavery, and would not frame a free-State constitution; while, to frame a pro-slavery constitution, was only to subject it to certain rejection by the people, if submitted to them agreeably to the general understanding and promise. It was generally supposed, for a while, at least, that under these circumstances, they would frame no constitution, and thus about half yield to so clear and decisive an expression of the popular judgment. But, despite this manifestation of the popular sentiment in Kansas, and of the prevalent opinion in the country, this bare quorum of the convention proceeded to business, and this Lecompton contrivance purports to be the fruit of their labors; it purports to be the work of their hands. Looking at the result of this election alone, can it leave a doubt in the mind of any unprejudiced man as to the popular sentiment in Kansas in respect to this constitution? Can any man say, in truth and sincerity, that he believes it expresses the will of that people, or even of one fourth part of that people? I answer for myself. Let others answer for themselves. The report of the majority of the committee hardly alludes to this election—a very significant omission.

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator will show when that subject was referred to the committee, I will then show why we passed it over. It was never before us; and if any person of the committee, as a committee man, has made use of it, he has done so on his own responsibility, and not because the Senate referred that subject to the committee.

Mr. FOOT. Why, then, did the Senator make any reference at all to that election in his report? Why did he say that election was held under circumstances peculiarly favorable to the free-State party?

Mr. GREEN. Because it had been used as an argument against the constitution, and to show that it had nothing to do with it. The object was not to explain it, but to show that it had no reference to the subject of the formation of the constitution.

Mr. FOOT. I pass over without remark or commentary the notorious Oxford, McGee, and Kickapoo frauds in this October election, wherein the attempt was made to count the Cincinnati Directory against the free-State party; the rejection of which cost Walker and Stanton their official heads, as the free-State men had told them it would, "the moment they attempted to do right." They did attempt to do right, and their removal from office is the forfeit. They learned, though a little too late, that they had been sent to Kansas on another and a very different errand than to see that the free-State men should have "fair play" in the elections. Like their predecessors, Reeder and Geary—although all of them were appointed to those important trusts as the special friends of the Federal Administration; all of them the friends and supporters of the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and two of them southern men, friends and advocates of the institution of slavery, and would have been glad to have seen it established in Kansas, if it could have been done by fair means, and with the consent of the people—yet the moment they manifested any regard to the dictates of honor or conscience, or to their own self-respect, and refused to prostitute their official functions to aid in carrying out any of these schemes of fraud and villainy which had been the order of the day in that Territory—from that moment they incurred the bitter and open hostility of the pro-slavery party in Kansas, and fell into disfavor with the Administration at Washington. Thank God! they cannot dishonor them in the estimation of the American people. Comment, sir, is unnecessary. The simple facts themselves carry with them their own most pointed and significant commentary. I will only remark that if the Administration have had no complicity with the reign of terror, wrong, and oppression in Kansas, there is some reason to fear that history will hardly do them justice.

Again, Mr. President, we are not left here even in regard to the evidences of the will of the people upon this subject. That will has been expressed still later, and in a still more emphatic form, in a direct vote upon the constitution itself. Acting-Governor Stanton, seeing the excitement and indignation of the people at the manner in which they had been imposed upon, deceived and betrayed by the convention in withholding the constitution from them, in violation of all the pledges which had been so publicly given, and at the apparent determination to have it imposed upon them without a hearing, as an act of prudence and of justice, and with a view to allay the popular feeling, convened the newly-elected Territorial Legislature in extra session. Upon his recommendation, they passed an act by which the people were authorized to vote upon the constitution, either for it or against it, on the 4th of January, that being the day appointed by the convention for the election of Governor and Legislature under the provisional State government. This afforded the people not only a fair, but it gave them the only opportunity accorded to them in which they could vote upon the question of the ratification or rejection of that instrument. The people improved that only opportunity afforded to them for this purpose, and the result was a majority of more than ten thousand against the constitution. That vote stands unimpeached and unimpeachable. Do you desire to know the will of the people upon this subject? Do you desire to know whether it is their free act and deed? Do you desire to know whether they approve or disapprove it? Have you any desire to know whether you are about to do an act in flagrant disregard of the expressed will of the people of Kansas? There you have their answer. There you have the evidence, decisive, unmistakable, and authoritative. By more than ten thousand majority they repudiate this constitution. By more than ten thousand majority they protest against its enforcement upon them. By more than ten thousand majority they solemnly protest against being forced into the Union under it. I do not forget the vote for the constitution on the 21st of December. That vote, as certified by Calhoun, was slightly over six thousand, more than half of which, it has been shown, were clearly and indisputably fictitious and fraudulent—a mere repetition of the Oxford fraud at the October election. But counting them all, we have still an aggregate majority of near five thousand against the constitution. Is such an expression of the popular will in reference to the frame of government under which it is proposed they shall live to be utterly ignored and disregarded? Sir, what becomes of the great fundamental principle of all republican government, that "the majority must rule?" Is this your exposition of your boasted doctrine of "popular sovereignty?" Is this what you mean by "the right of the people to govern themselves?" Is this your illustration of the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, that "the people are left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?"

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Simmons.

Say, if you please, that the vote on the 4th of January was not legally authorized! If that were so, is it any the less a clear and emphatic manifestation of the popular judgment upon the constitution? Cannot you tell about as well what the people think of it, as if the vote had been given under an act which was confessedly valid? Say, if you please, that the Territorial Legislature had no authority to give the people an opportunity to vote upon the question of accepting or rejecting the constitution; if that were so—if such an absurdity be admitted—is that vote any the less to be regarded as an expression of the public voice upon the constitution? Is it any the less to be regarded as an emphatic expression of the public will? Sir, Congress have always, heretofore, said—and Mr. Buchanan himself said, in the debate upon the admission of Michigan—that mere forms and modes of proceeding to ascertain the will of the people in reference to their constitution framed preparatory to admission into the Union, were not to be regarded as essential, and might be dispensed with. They have always said, the main thing, the essential point of inquiry, the material question, after all, was, does it express the voice of the people? Is it the free act and deed of those who are to live under it, and to be governed by it? In the present case, the vote on the 4th of January places this question beyond all possibility of doubt or controversy. Never was the sentiment of a people upon a vital question in which they were so directly and so deeply interested, manifested in a manner more clear, more decided, or more unquestionable. Sir, the will of the people—I say the will of the people—when so clearly and audibly uttered, upon a question of this kind, must be respected. The voice of remonstrance and of protestation, when it breaks forth from the spontaneous and aroused action of the people; when it breaks forth directly from the very fountain of power—from the independent, sovereign people themselves, in reference to their proposed fundamental law, is as potential and as much commands our consideration, as when it is addressed to us through the forms of conventional proceedings. The spontaneous voice of the people must be heard over and above the voice of a usurping minority, though clothed in the form of "regular proceedings." The right of petition, of remonstrance, of protest, is a right guaranteed to every American citizen by the Federal Constitution, and awaits not the permission of legislative enactment. The people of Kansas had a perfect right, in the absence of any special law, to express their opinion, their remonstrance, or protest against this constitution, either in this way or in any other they might choose to adopt.

But, Mr. President, the vote on the 4th of January had the sanction and authority of law. It is worse than idle to say the Territorial Legislature had no authority to provide for, and give an opportunity to, the people to be heard upon this constitution; to express their will upon it; to accept or reject it. And this was all that the territorial act did, or attempted to do. It was not an attempt, nor did it authorize any attempt to modify, change, or destroy the constitution, as the President is pleased to intimate. It simply afforded an opportunity to the people, and fixed a day and a mode for them to say whether they would accept it or not; whether they were willing to come into the Union under it or not; whether it was in accordance with their will or not. This was all. Was this illegal? Was this transcending the authority of the Legislature? Was it illegal and wrong for the Legislature to give the people this privilege; and legal and all right for the convention to deny them that privilege? Was it illegal for the people to be heard anyhow, upon a question so vital to their welfare? Sir, the very absurdity of the proposition is its most complete refutation. It is only suggested, I am bound to believe, as a last and poor resort to evade or to parry the force of the solemn and emphatic remonstrance and protestation of the people of Kansas against the consummation of this great iniquity, by the overwhelming vote on that occasion. Our history as yet furnishes no example of an effort by the Congress of the United States to impose an institution of State government upon a people in opposition to their clear and express will. This is the first effort of the kind; possibly it will be the last.

Mr. President, we shall do wisely to listen to the voice of the people of Kansas. We shall do wisely to listen to this her last appeal. They have struck a responsive chord in the American heart. There is a point of forbearance—there is a point of endurance—beyond which it is not safe for men or for nations to tread. We have already reached that fearful point. We should do wisely to pause, at least for a while. I assume not to speak of the future. I assume not the province of the seer. I have no dark forebodings to utter. I have only and finally to say, despise not the voice, spurn not the appeal of the people—there is portentous warning in that voice—there is terrible vengeance in that appeal.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I always feel some embarrassment in attempting to address the Senate upon any question; but the importance of this, and the protracted discussion it has already undergone, make this one increasingly embarrassing. There is nothing connected with it which has not already been commented upon with so much ability that an endeavor to add more appears to be an act of temerity. I have no disposition to repeat what has been said upon the topics involved in this question of the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, and shall therefore find the most difficulty, in what I have to say, in trying to avoid a repetition of what has been said by others; and I should not address the Senate at all, but for the fact that the question is one of deep interest in the State I, in part, represent here; and our Legislature having passed resolutions of instruction, may expect some remarks as an accompaniment to the vote I shall give in accordance with those instructions.

I may here say, that the difficulties surrounding this question, although seemingly so threatening, are all, in my judgment, capable of a peaceful and satisfactory solution. We have only to act—as I trust all of us are disposed to do—honestly and right, and the matters can easily be settled. I can add nothing to the powerful appeals made to the Senate to do this, by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CARRITTENDEN,] and the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] This question involves the American doctrine of self-government; upon which I regret to witness a diversity of opinion in this Chamber. A number of Senators on the other side only admit that the people have a right to be well governed; and to secure this, they contend that the forms of law only are to be observed and regarded: while on this side, it is contended that the people have the right to govern themselves, and that they shall enjoy this right substantially, viewing the forms of law as the means of securing that end; and that if the end be not accomplished the forms are worthless. There is great diversity of opinion, and equal unanimity of votes, with the advocates of this measure as to the meaning of "popular sovereignty." The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] denounces it as populous, or populace sovereignty, a kind of mob-rule, with which he will have nothing to do.

The true doctrine upon which our institutions rest, as laid down by the Father of his Country, is, "the will of the majority authentically expressed."

I ask Senators to examine all the proceedings in relation to the formation of the instrument before us, and the constitution itself, and then say if, in their judgment, there is, in the whole series of acts, a single expression of the will of the people of Kansas authentically made. There is nothing authentic about these proceedings, from the origin of the Territorial Legislature to the last act of this Kansas convention. The fountain was corrupted at the outset, and it has sent forth nothing but bitter waters; and the sooner we dismiss it, and remit it to the people of Kansas for settlement, under a Legislature now chosen, and admitted to be the first elected by the people of the Territory, the sooner peace will be restored to the country.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. POLK] said that, by the first census taken in Kansas, there was a majority there from the southern States, which showed there was no necessity for an invasion from Missouri to carry the first election, and furnished strong presumptive evidence that no such invasion was made. That Senator must recollect that Mr. (or General) Atchison, of Missouri, in a letter to the people of the southern States, complained that the emigrants they had induced to enter Kansas from the South, when there, nearly all turned against the project of making Kansas a slave State. These emigrants were not slaveholders; and if not, although from the South, it was their interest to have Kansas free. Exciting as political questions are, they will not entirely control men, and induce them to vote against their interests; and if it be true that a majority of the first settlers were from the South, the knowledge of the fact that these very southern emigrants were in favor of making Kansas a free Territory, may have been the occasion for the invasion; for the Missourians saw it would not answer their purpose to let even southern emigrants settle the question for themselves.

I have listened to this protracted debate, and still am unable to see what authority this first Territorial Legislature had to take the sense of the people as to whether they wanted a State constitution or not. The Senator from South Carolina has said that this body was elected merely to organize a territorial government; all have said that it was contemplated that when there should be sufficient inhabitants they should apply for admission as a State. Does any one pretend that by the act authorizing territorial governments in Kansas and Nebraska, which are said not then to have contained four hundred American citizens, the first Legislature of Kansas had any power, either by that statute, or by the common law of this country, to take steps for forming a constitution and State government at its very first session? If that Legislature had been legally chosen, it would have been an act of usurpation on their part thus to attempt to control the future population of that vast region, considering the few men then in it. It is insulting the common sense and understanding of the people to contend that the first band who should hop into the Territory could at once mold and determine the institutions for the future people of that Territory when there should come to be sufficient to make a State government and ask admission into the Union. I believe their proceedings began without authority; have been carried on in all stages without precedent, or authority of law; and, what is still worse, in my opinion, without the slightest intention to do right.

I know that this Lecompton constitution, establishing slavery in Kansas, is made the exciting question now in this country; but there is a question underlying this, which gives it its importance—that is, a question of power, always an angry one. It is a question whether power can be continued in the hands of the few at the expense of the many, in this country, and in defiance of the will of the many. Such a question must be an exciting one.

The question of slavery has been debated in Congress and the country from the origin of the Government—nay, from the origin of the Revolution; never angrily, except when political power was connected with the decision. I had occasion, eleven years ago, to participate in such a debate here, although I never allude to the subject unless it is introduced by others; for, from my experience, it has not proved a profitable one of discussion in Congress, and but for that experience I should not now address the Senate.

Mr. President, when I look over this body and am unable to recognize a single individual here who was a member of it the first year of my service here, I am taught a profitable lesson. I look again, and find but one whose service here dates prior to my own, and I turn naturally to him for counsel and for guidance.

What are the recommendations of that Senator [Mr. CARRITTENDEN] to us? Do they breathe any spirit of ill will? Do they regard this question as too difficult to be surmounted by the wisdom and patriotism of the Senate? No, sir. The course he points out is as obvious as the path at noon-day: do right, that is all that is wanted. We have had difficulties from the outset on this question of slavery; but they have always been surmounted. It was brought into discussion when the Declaration of Independence was made, in 1776. It was presented to the convention of Virginia, which sent delegates to the Congress of 1774; and was never presented to a Congress of the Colonies or States of the Union, without eliciting some difference of opinion, if not dissatisfaction; and yet, for more than eighty years, those difficulties have been overcome by a fraternal and liberal regard to the interests of the whole country.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] invited us, the other day, to go back to the course of the fathers of the Republic; to deal with this subject in their fraternal spirit, and according to their teaching. I am willing to meet him on that ground, and to meet Senators from the South on the precise ground, to deal with the question as it has been dealt with, in a spirit of candor and frankness, with no desire to excite unkind feeling in any one. It has become environed with difficulties, which did not originally exist. I desire the Senate to recollect the history of this controversy. It has been made to embrace some points which are contained in a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, often referred to in this debate, as to who are citizens; and also the power of this Government over the Territories of the United States—questions which originated before the Constitution was formed, and which, in my judgment, were settled either before the Constitution was made, or when it was established.

If Senators will consult the record, they will be in no doubt as to who were made citizens, and none as to the powers of this Government in the Territories. I will read as to the first introduction of slavery into these colonies. I do not find the account to be, as stated by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON], in 1620. Mr. Jefferson, one of the fathers, says:

"The first establishment in Virginia which became permanent was made in 1607. I have found no mention made of negroes in the colony until about 1650. The first brought here as slaves were by a Dutch ship; after which the English commenced the trade, and continued it until the revolutionary war."

Mr. Jefferson is pretty good authority as to the early history of Virginia, and he says slavery was first introduced in 1650 by the Dutch. Efforts are now made to show that the trade was commenced by England, and that slavery existed by the common law. I do not know how that may be, or that it is material; but the court in the Dred Scott case say, that at — "This day it is difficult to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted."

They had for more than a century before been regarded as so far inferior as to have "no rights which the white man was bound to respect, and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit," &c.; that up to the time of the adoption of the Constitution this right had not been called in question, or words to that effect; and that all public acts and records are to be construed in reference to the opinions prevailing at the time they were written, and not as if written in our day, with our enlightened and humane opinions of that unfortunate race, &c. But to return to the history of African slavery in the colonies, which was introduced into Virginia in 1650. I find in the annals of Rhode Island that in 1652 the government there passed this order:

"Whereas there is a common course practiced amongst English men to buy negroes, to that end they may have them for service or slaves forever; for the preventing of such practices among us, let it be ordered, that no blacke mankind or white, being forced by covenant, bond, or otherwise, to serve any man or his assignees longer than ten years, or untill they come to bee twentie-four years of age, if they bee taken in under 14 from the time of their cominge within the liberties of this colonic. And at the end or terme of ten years to sett them free, as the manner is with the English servants."

That does not look much as if, by the common law of England, they were held longer.

— "And that man that will not let them goe free, or shall sell them away elsewhere, to that end that they may be enslaved to others for a long time, hee or they shall forfeit to the colonic forty pounds."

I suppose that is about as early a law for the prevention of slavery as can be found upon record. The next law, I suppose, was made against the Dutch slave trade, and was in this form:

"Ordered, That all Dutchmen, except inhabitants amongst us, are prohibited to trade with the Indians in this colonic; and in case they bee found to transgresse herein, they shall forfeit to the colonic goods and vessell if proved; and this order to bee in force two months after the date hereof; and if this case come to bee tried, it shall be tried in the Generall Court of Tryalls."

"The President, Mr. John Smith, is chosen Moderator of the Assembly this 20th of May, 1652."

"Ordered, That the President shall give notice to the Dutch Governor of the Menadoes touching the lawe of prohibition of trade with the Indians."

I suppose Menadoes means Manhattan Island, on which the city of New York is now situated. I do not recollect of any other place on our coast where there was a Dutch Governor.

This legislation, (which is probably the earliest to be found on this continent to prevent slavery,) was before we had a charter from England; and I read it to show that in the earliest history of the people of this country, when uncontrolled by the power of England, or other commercial nations, they had the same just notions of the rights of men to hold others in slavery, that at this later day they have in England. I call attention to these old records on account of what is said here in debate by Senators, who seem to think these are new doctrines, and that to act upon them, or believe in them, is an aggression upon the South. They may be too old for present use, and I come to the history of the times, referred to by the court, and to the acts of the fathers of the Republic. I read from a paper written by Mr. Jefferson, and laid before the convention of Virginia in 1774, from which instructions were to be drawn for the members from that State to the Congress to be held in reference to our difficulties with Great Britain, and to petition the King:

"The abolition of domestic slavery is the great object of desire in those colonies where it was unhappily introduced in their infant state. But previous to the enfranchisement of the slaves we have, it is necessary to exclude all further importations from Africa. Yet our repeated attempts to effect this, by prohibitions, and by imposing duties which might amount to a prohibition, have been hitherto defeated by his Majesty's negative: thus preferring the immediate advantages of a few British corsairs, to the lasting interests of the American States, and to the rights of human nature, deeply wounded by this infamous practice."

In this paper it is declared that the abolition of slavery is "the great object of desire in the colonies." The next paper I will call the attention of the Senate to is the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, as reported by the committee to Congress. I refer to the clause in that instrument which, Mr. Jefferson says, "was stricken out in complaisance to South Carolina and Georgia; who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves, and who, on the contrary, still wished to continue it." That stricken out was in these words:

"He has incited treasonable insurrections of our fellow-citizens with the allurements of forfeiture and confiscation of our property."

"He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the Christian King of Great Britain. Determined to keep open a market where men should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce. And that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people on whom he also obtruded them: thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another."

It is proper to say that although this was stricken out, for the reasons assigned, its substance was declared in another form, by saying, "he has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good," which may have included the one referred to by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] as having been passed by South Carolina in 1760, for suppressing the slave trade, which he said the King refused his assent to. At this period of our history there seems to have been a stronger feeling against slavery than at any time since the adoption of the Constitution. Not only in Congress, but in the primary assemblies of the people were such feelings expressed, as was natural, and often declared that whereas we were about to assert our rights to liberty, it was proper to recognize and assert the right of all men to it. During the war of the Revolution, Rhode Island passed a law giving to every slave his freedom who would enlist in the service and serve for a term of three years. Many did so; and thus secured their own freedom and that of their former owners. The court must have forgotten, or overlooked, all these facts, so prominent in our revolutionary history, or they would not have felt it necessary to put a construction upon instruments written at this period of intense love of liberty, and be compelled to restrict the application of liberal doctrines to a single class of men, when they declare if they had been written in our time, they should have considered them as embracing all classes.

I mean, however, to have no dispute with the Supreme Court; although their decision has involved this question in most of the difficulties that surround it.

I ask the attention of Senators to these facts, to show that this question of slavery, and the best means to prevent its further increase in this country, was a prominent one with the people, with their Representatives in Congress, and in the convention which framed the Constitution upon which our Government rests. In the convention there were but two States that threatened not to unite with the rest if power was given to Congress to prohibit the slave trade before 1808—the same two in complaisance to whom the clause about slaves was stricken from the Declaration of Independence; but the convention was more successful than Congress was, for after they had altered the Declaration, South Carolina voted against it; and Georgia was divided, and did not vote for it; whereas, the convention, by inserting a clause in the Constitution, that Congress should not prohibit the importation of such persons as any of the States then existing should think proper to admit prior to the year 1808, induced both these States to adopt the instrument. By inserting and adopting this clause in the Constitution, the importation of slaves was not sanctioned or authorized by the convention or people; for if the Constitution had either authorized or sanctioned it, being the supreme law, no State could have prohibited it until 1808, nor even then; for at that time, this power, which had been in abeyance so far as Congress was concerned, became theirs to exercise, and was exercised by them, and the States ceased to have anything to do in the matter, though most of them had prohibited the traffic before Congress acted. I think, therefore, the court have used a little unsound reasoning in trying to show that the people committed this Government to the support of slavery by adopting this clause of the Constitution, which simply postponed the time when Congress should prevent its further increase. This postponement was not readily agreed to, as I had occasion to show in a debate here eleven years ago, when this same question was before the Senate. I then read the remarks made in the convention by the distinguished ancestor of the Senator from Virginia, who urged us the other day to go back to the ways of "the fathers" upon this slavery question. Upon this demand of South Carolina and Georgia to withhold the power from Congress for twenty years, Virginia then said, by Colonel Mason:

"This infernal traffic originated in the avarice of British merchants. The British Government constantly checked the attempts of Virginia to put a stop to it. The present question concerns not the importing States alone, but the whole Union. The evil of having slaves was experienced during the late war. Had slaves been treated as they might have been by the enemy, they would have proved dangerous instruments in their hands. But their folly dealt by the slaves as it did by the Tories. He mentioned the dangerous insurrections of the slaves in Greece and Sicily; and the instructions given by Cromwell to the commissioners sent to Virginia, to arm the servants and slaves, in case other means of obtaining its submission should fail. Maryland and Virginia, he said, had already prohibited the importation of slaves expressly. North Carolina has done the same in substance. All this would be in vain if South Carolina and Georgia be at liberty to import. The western people are already calling out for slaves for their new lands, and will fill that country with slaves, if they can be got through South Carolina and Georgia. Slavery discourages arts and manufactures. The poor despise labor when performed by slaves. They prevent the emigration of whites, who really enrich and strengthen a country. They produce the most pernicious effects on manners. Every master of slaves is born a petty tyrant. They bring the judgment of Heaven upon a country. As nations cannot be rewarded or punished in the next world, they must be in this. By an inevitable chain of causes and effects, Providence punishes national sins by national calamities. He lamented that some of our eastern brethren had, as from a lust of gain, embarked in the nefarious traffic. As to the States being in possession of the right to import, this was the case with many other rights, now to be properly given up. He held it essential, in every point of view, that the General Government should have power to prevent the increase of slavery."

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Simmons.

SENATE.

This argument, as well as all other extracts I have made from revolutionary documents, shows the determination of our ancestors that the "General Government should have power to prevent the increase of slavery." No arguments in this Senate, or reasoning in the court below us, can conceal these facts. The feeling against slavery, instead of being stronger now than when the Constitution was framed, as the court have argued, I think is just the reverse; for slavery has become much more profitable since the adoption of the Constitution than it was before; and interest has a powerful influence upon the minds of men, even in such questions. It is from interest that the emigrants from southern States who are not slaveholders desire Kansas to be a free State. The slaveholder, from the same calculation of interest, wants the uncultivated lands to be withheld from the free laborers, and reserved for the profitable employment of his slaves, when, by their growth or importation, he may have sufficient slaves to cultivate them. The difference between the two classes of men is, that the free laborer is here now, and wants the land for cultivation; the slave labor is subject to all the contingencies of a distant future. The moral aspects of the question should be considered elsewhere; the Senate is not the place to discuss or decide such questions. I will say a single word in answer to the repeated charges from the other side of the Chamber, that Senators on this side are all rabid Abolitionists. I do not believe there is one here who can truthfully be called a rabid Abolitionist. I know I am not one, never was, and never expect to be, in the sense in which that term is used by Senators of the Democratic side of the Chamber.

So far as my vote in this body may contribute to affect the measures of this Government, it shall be given in the spirit of the Constitution under which we live—interfering with no questions designed to be left with the States. I believe this will best promote the happiness of all classes and races of men among us; and, while I believe that slaves are held in some States where the people would be better off without them, it is their business, and not mine. I shall not interfere with such questions myself, or act with any party who may propose such interference, if any such should ever exist.

I can see no real cause of irritation between the two sections, if those living upon the borders between the slave and free States will observe the obligations of good neighborhood in their intercourse with each other. With such a disposition to observe the obligations imposed by the Constitution, I can see no reason why the South should be annoyed with the sentiments of the people of distant States. What could the people of Rhode Island do to annoy them? They could not molest them if they would, and would not if they could. Why this denunciation of the northern States—distant States—for any opinions they may entertain on the question of slavery? They are not responsible for the irritation which arises between the people in the immediate neighborhood of slaves. I see no disposition at home, and have seen none for thirty years, to produce irritation at the South. As to this controversy about Kansas, it is made by the South itself.

Is this a suitable place to try the experiment of forcing slavery into a Territory, a country without laws, and where the only power which has a right to govern has abdicated government? For I insist, whatever may be said about "popular sovereignty," that this Government has the constitutional power to govern the Territories. We may, as we have done, authorize a Territorial Legislature to participate, when a given number of inhabitants have settled there; but this Kansas-Nebraska act is the first instance in our history where power was delegated to a Legislature without reference to the population, and without control on the part of this Government over their legislation. Under the Constitution we have no right to abdicate government anywhere, if that instrument imposes upon us the duty of government. Under the Articles of Confederation, nine States had a right to establish a new government, and abdicate government in the other four, if they should not adopt it and come into the Union; but when adopted, the Constitution has no provision for abdicating government anywhere within the territorial limits over which its jurisdiction extends. You cannot constitutionally withdraw your authority from the States or the Territories. So far as that instrument imposes upon you the duties and obligations to govern, if laws exist in Territories, this Government must see them faithfully executed. They cannot place themselves or be placed by this Government beyond its jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I regret that there is a design here to make this Kansas question, not the cause, for that lies deeper, but the occasion, for a separation of these States. There are those who affect to believe that the Union is a disadvantage to them—those who have "calculated its value." This was said by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] but he did not say he had calculated its cost, for no figures can represent the cost of this Union; and, lightly as he may speak or think of it, I believe it to be worth more than its cost to the whole country, although the patriotic blood and treasure sacrificed to secure it were enough to enrich an empire. Let it be preserved: it has blessings in store for us and our posterity, if we but act according to its injunctions.

I do not propose to enlarge upon this topic; but I do say that, so far as I know the objects of those with whom I now act, they have no motive or purpose to disturb the institutions of the South, or to create any ill-feeling between the different sections of this country; and, having lived somewhat longer than most of the Senators here, I will tell them all that I will act with no party, at any time, that entertains or proposes any such measures. Sir, the warmest and closest party ties that have existed with me have been severed. I do not know where the party is to which I was proud to belong; I do not know how, or by whom, it was destroyed; but its principles will endure as long as this Government lasts. Most of the great men who upheld them have passed away; but they have left a history, and we shall leave its principles, which will yet be acted upon, to the prosperity and renown of our common country. Others may have the honors, but that will make no difference to you [Mr. SEWARD, who was in the chair] or to me.

Mr. President, I have made these references to our early records to show what were the doctrines of the fathers of the Republic. And these show conclusively that the same opinions were held by them that are now acted upon by Senators upon this side of the Chamber; and what may appear singular, they are met by the same kind of complaints and threats which have been used in this "infected district," embraced in the States of South Carolina and Georgia, from the Congress of 1776 down to the present time. These States were not suited with the Declaration of Independence as originally reported; they threatened the convention, in 1787, not to unite with the other States unless the Constitution was altered; and both instruments were altered to suit their views about slavery; and since this discussion commenced, every Senator who has spoken upon it from the four States now occupying the original territory of the two referred to, have threatened us with secession unless this question is settled to suit them; no other States seem so ready with estimates of the value of the Union, with plans for peaceable secession, and inquiries of how it is to be prevented, and extravagant estimates of the resources and power of a new Republic. Such things would be alarming, if now made for the first time; but they have been the peculiar characteristics of the same region for more than eighty years; and yet they have been got along with in some way or other, without much real danger to the Union. It is but justice to these States to say that they have furnished many patriots, many sound and able statesmen, and have been regarded as banner States for the high qualities of their distinguished men. To all these threats of secession and dis-union, I have only to say that, in my judgment, we can get along better together than we can separately. It does not alter my mind about this to hear the Senator from South Carolina sound, in tones of triumph, that "cotton is king," and rules the commercial world; that the South have only to fold their arms, and all nations must come to their terms; that they need no connection with the rest of the United States, and very little intercourse with the world. Well, sir, it is well to feel pleasantly, and the South is a pleasant region: they have a good country and profitable productions, and I rejoice with them at that; but this idea that a State can isolate itself and live alone, is a mistake.

I recollect to have read somewhere that a man who thinks he can get along without the rest of the world is very much mistaken; but that he who thinks the world cannot get along without him is much more mistaken. It would be still more strikingly the case with States than with individuals. The Senator supposes, if they should refuse to plant cotton for three years, the thrones of Europe would topple and fall. This reminds me of the tone of the English press just before our war with that country in 1812. They demonstrated that we should come to a dead lock if we undertook to get along without them; and as to maintaining a war with them, that was only ridiculous. But we fought them about three years and were just beginning to learn the art of war, when peace was made. If we had fought them three years more, it would have been of little consequence to us whether we renewed our trade with her people or not; we should have made ourselves independent. I am, however, in favor of commerce, if reciprocal; but with no degrading inequality or dependence; and I have no notion of acknowledging any such relation between this country and England, or any other country, as was set up by them before 1812. I think the cotton planters are imbibing this English notion I have referred to, in supposing that their staple rules; instead of this, I think it likely that, if they stopped planting cotton for five years, instead of overturning all governments and all creation, as they fancy, mankind would learn to get along without cotton; and just before everybody bowed to them, they would forget that there ever had been such a thing as cotton used for their convenience. It is within my life-time that this material has been extensively cultivated in this country. It is a very valuable crop, and ministers greatly to the profit and comfort of man; and it is because of this that the connection of the growers and workers of it is most beneficial; two customers are better than one for them. If we at the North did not consume six or seven hundred thousand bales of their annual crop, it would be difficult to find as good a market for this, in addition to what they now send to Europe for sale. I do not wish to see the South dependent upon one market for the sale of their great staples, and that market a foreign one. I watch the prices of their products as closely as they do, and appreciate their influence in our intercourse with the rest of the world; and I never have and never shall support a policy that gives to other nations a control of the market and the prices of the leading productions of this country.

It is for these reasons, as well as others, that we can do better together than we could without the aid of each other. But if our pecuniary interests were not improved by our Union, there are others which cannot be forgotten. We shall always remember the past; we shall always have the history of our revolutionary struggle, the fame of our ancestors, the prosperity, the liberty, and glory of a common country, and these are the strongest and happiest ties that bind societies and States together. Sir, I could say more of the advantages of our Union, but I do not regard it as in any immediate danger; though I regret to have one of the cords weakened by any unkind expressions.

Mr. President, much has been said of the right of the people of a State to change their constitution without regard to the provisions it contains for making such change. The President has said that if we admit Kansas under this constitution, it may be modified whenever it may suit the people of the State to do it, notwithstanding the action of the people may conflict with its provisions; and many Senators have expressed the same opinion. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] does not concur in this; nor does the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND]; but the Senators from Missouri give the doctrine a qualified approval, and others unreservedly approve the views of the President, as the true version of their party's creed.

There are two modes by which the people can change their constitutional form of government, which are in accordance with the American idea of popular rights: one is a constitutional mode, and is to be exercised in conformity with the provisions of their own agreement, or constitution; the other, an inherent right, not controlled by compacts or laws—a revolutionary right, which may be a peaceful one, or may come to be a right to fight in order to reform abuses and wrongs. This last governments do not give, and cannot take away.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] showed us the other day, by an exhibit of his researches into history and law, that the British Government had imposed slavery upon their colonies, the Old Thirteen States, against the will of the people of the colonies; and made an application of the facts to sustain the positions of the court in their reasoning in the Dred Scott case. In reference to the iniquity of introducing slavery into this country, it may be admitted that the whole belonged to the mother country; and what did "the fathers" say of it? They enumerated this as among the acts of tyranny which justified revolution; and, by fair analogy, we must admit that if we impose slavery upon the people of Kansas against their will, by adopting for them this Lecompton constitution, we shall justify rebellion and revolution on their part, to rid themselves of a tyranny as odious to them as the similar crimes against liberty were, which caused the revolution of 1776. If the President refers to such a right in the people of Kansas to remedy the wrong he recommends us to inflict upon them, nobody will question the soundness of his position; but that will not excuse us for doing a deed so unreasonable and unnecessary.

Is any one to gain by producing such a state of things in Kansas? Are not the people there already excited, nay, exasperated, by attempts to impose slavery upon the Territory against the will of the majority? The question has ceased to be one about slavery, and has become the more serious one of the right of a majority to govern. Can you expect a people, educated as Americans are, peaceably to surrender such a right?

According to the doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska act, as expounded by the party in the Cincinnati convention, this attempt to legalize slavery by a Territorial Legislature is clearly a usurpation. They say Congress cannot legislate upon slavery in the Territories, and the act itself says they do not intend thereby to carry slavery into the Territories, or exclude it therefrom. The power of Congress to legislate upon slavery is denied. It will not be pretended that Congress can delegate a power to a Territorial Legislature to do what it has no power to do itself. It has been said in this Chamber that slavery is not established in the States by positive enactment to that effect, but by laws protecting the owners of slaves in the right to the labor of slaves, and their control over them, &c., by just such laws as have been passed by the Territorial Legislature in Kansas. If it is by this species of legislation that slavery is established, and if without such laws it could not exist, as it appears it could not, it follows that Congress has delegated a power to the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, which, according to the doctrine of the party who did it, Congress itself could not exercise. These laws were made before they formed this constitution, which included the result of them within it, and required men to swear to support it, in order to vote upon it as to whether they would have a further importation of slaves or not. No freeman would take such an oath; none should be required to take any test oath to secure the right of franchise. You, sir, would not take it; I would not. I would not take one either to support this Lecompton constitution, or to do as I pleased about it.

The Senator from Missouri, who reported this bill, asked what harm there was in requiring a man to swear to support the constitution or a certain code of laws, before he was allowed to vote? I answer, it is an insult to his understanding to require it. There is no such test oath anywhere else, and there was no right to establish it in Kansas. This test existed when the vote was taken to determine whether or not they wished to form a State constitution, and from this cause this constitution with slavery is here against the will of the majority of the people of Kansas.

Sir, I believe, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] has said he did, that Congress had power to prohibit slavery north of 36° 30'; and I also think it can be made to appear by the very doctrines asserted by the court in the case of Dred Scott, in which it is attempted to be denied. In this case, the court would seem to have decided a great many questions; and it would be strange if some of them were not decided right. There are but two that were directly connected with the question of the freedom of the plaintiff, and in some way with the question before us, and they are all I shall notice now: one that the plaintiff was not a citizen; and the other, that Congress had no constitutional power to prohibit slavery in the territory where Kansas now is.

I have read the reasoning upon which the court base their decision that a negro is not a citizen; and I have heard the eloquent commendation of the court, for making the decision, pronounced here by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN.] I understand it was decided that the plaintiff had no right in court, because no man, bond or free, whose ancestors were brought to this country from Africa and sold as slaves, could be a citizen of the United States. The court give reasons for this; the most prominent is, that the African race is a degraded race. To prove this statutes of different States, prohibiting and punishing intermarriages between them and whites, are cited, and various penal statutes against people of color are also cited; together with the laws of Congress for enrolling the militia, and those of New Hampshire for the same purpose.

Mr. President, I have an interest in this question of citizenship, and so have you. [Mr. SEWARD was in the chair.] We have not a title as citizens which can be produced at any time and anywhere, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] has. His title to citizenship is upon parchment, duly sealed; but how are we to establish ours, and our right to sue in a court of the United States? We have no parchment under seal to show it. If I were obliged to look for yours, sir, I should not look where the court seems to have looked for Dred Scott's, about jails and whipping-posts, penitentiaries and penal statutes. These are places where freemen lose their rights, and not the places to find how or where they became enfranchised. If I wanted to discover our right to the blessings of freemen, I should not look down into dungeons, but up to the source from which they come—just where the fathers of this Republic looked when they began the struggle to obtain them.

Sir, on the morning of the 4th of July, 1776, the people of this country were British subjects; on the evening of that day, by virtue of the acts of those they had authorized, they ceased to be subjects, and became simply inhabitants of the country. This definition included all within our limits, bond or free; but they were not left so long. The same authorized agents who had changed them from subjects to inhabitants proceeded to form articles for a union of the several States, and in these, the status of the inhabitants was determined, as follows:

"The free inhabitants of each of the States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States."

There is nothing here about color; all the distinction they made was between free and slave, and between the worthy and unworthy. None were excluded on account of color, of race, or country of birth; but all were made citizens who were then on the soil, except the slaves and the unworthy. This would seem to settle the question as to who were then made citizens, and recognized as such, until the adoption of the Constitution; and included therein as such, when that instrument was adopted. The court, however, appear to think the militia laws negated this conclusion, and refer with great confidence to an early act of Congress, in 1792, organizing the militia, passed by those familiar with the meaning of the language of the Constitution, which says that every "free, able-bodied, white male citizen" shall be enrolled in the militia. They also refer to a similar provision in a late law of New Hampshire, which I suppose should be more convincing, as that is a Free-Soil State.

These extracts from the laws, and like expressions, the court seem to regard as conclusive that none but whites can be citizens, or were regarded as such by the framers of the Constitution; who were members of Congress in these early times. It is a little singular it did not occur to the court that the use of the term "white citizens," to designate those who should be enrolled, instead of proving that there were no other "citizens," shows clearly that those who used that word must have used it on purpose to discriminate between "white citizens" and "citizens" of some color not understood to be "white," for it is certain that, if there were no other than white citizens, as the court insist, the use of the word "white," as a term of discrimination, was an absurdity.

This term, as one of discrimination among citizens, was so common that it had become habitual; and, until after this decision, arrested no attention: it was used when this Lecompton constitution was drafted, and was stricken out at the suggestion of some member, that since this decision of the court there were no other citizens than white ones, and therefore no longer any necessity for the use of the term.

I suppose this form of expression has been used in constitutions or statutes from the time of the Revolution to the last year to determine whether the elective franchise in the different States should be enjoyed by white citizens only, or by all citizens; and has so determined the matter. If the word was in the law or constitution, none but white citizens voted; if not in, all voted, white and colored. That has been the case in Rhode Island, and I suppose in other States; and until this late discovery of the court, nobody ever thought of disputing its fitness and propriety.

I do not think there needs to be any reconstruction of the court, for, I believe, if a similar question were brought before the court, the late decision would be overruled. These decisions are not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. The decision of this court in the Dartmouth College case was thought to settle a principle, which induced our banks to refuse to pay the tax imposed upon them by the State, and the prevailing opinion at the bar in Rhode Island was that the banks would be sustained by the court. The State brought the question here, and the court decided in favor of the power of the State to tax corporations. It happened that I was appointed on the committee to employ counsel in that case, and for that reason remember the decision, and also remember that, from the outset, I thought the right of the State to tax would be sustained. No such decision of this court will stand unless it has sound reason and sound law to rest upon.

This question was decided when the public mind was in a feverish state, and the court may have unwittingly been affected by the excitement—political excitements have great influence upon men in caucuses and in Congress, and why not in courts if it gets there? and if it has got there, we must wait until it subsides, and trust that then the errors it has occasioned will be corrected. Mr. President, I think any man of candor who will read the reasoning of the court in this case, upon the power of Congress in the Territories, will find enough to warrant the opinion I have expressed. The court say, that the clause in the Constitution which says "Congress may make all necessary rules and regulations respecting the territory," &c., does not apply to territory acquired since the adoption of the Constitution. This is no doubt so; for it was not contemplated that we should have additional territory when the Constitution was adopted. But the court say that the power to govern new territory is "the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory." And they further say, that Congress in legislating for such acquired territory, "exercises the combined powers of the General and a State Government." They say, further, that Congress can exercise no power in a Territory which it is prohibited from exercising by the Constitution—that is so: nor can it exercise any power, anywhere, which is so prohibited. A State government cannot exercise any power in a State which it is prohibited from exercising by the constitution of the State; but the Legislature or government of a State can, within its limits, exercise all powers of government which are not prohibited by the constitution of the State or of the United States; and if, in legislating for the Territories, Congress has the right to exercise the powers of the General and a State Government, it follows that Congress, like a State, can exercise all powers not constitutionally prohibited. This is the reasoning of the court, and they enumerate the prohibitions to show what Congress cannot do in the Territories, because of these constitutional injunctions, and after naming all they can find, they then say that as there are so many prohibitions, and this is known to be a Government of limited powers, therefore, Congress cannot legislate about slavery in the Territories. Sir, that is a dodge which is unworthy of men in their position; they must have known that, upon their own rule, if that subject of legislation was not enumerated in the prohibitions, Congress could legislate upon it as well as upon any other subject not prohibited; at any rate, if the court cannot see this, every one else can.

In the Florida case, which the court refer to, and from which the quotations are made, the present court sanction the exercise of the powers of Congress in legislating for the Territories to a more unlimited extent than I think is warranted; but no matter for that, as all the powers of legislation by Congress upon the subject of slavery in the Territories are clearly within the definition and rule given by the court. I shall not quarrel with them for going a great deal beyond, and claiming for Congress legislative powers in the Territories which I may think doubtful.

But if Congress have not the power to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories of the United States, by what deduction of logic do Senators contend that we can grant it to any other body of men, or to a Territorial Legislature? Can we grant what we have not got ourselves? To contend for this would be ridiculous; yet we know that the Legislature of Kansas has enacted laws for the protection of slavery such as exist in Missouri and other States; if they had any right to pass these laws, they derived it from us; the people of the Territory had granted them none—the people never did grant any power to a Territorial Legislature, in any Territory that has ever existed within the jurisdiction of this Government. If such laws have validity in any Territory, it is derived from this Government. In the case of Kansas, the power was not only not expressly given to pass such laws, but it was expressly declared in the organic act, that it was not intended thereby to establish slavery in the Territory, or to exclude it therefrom; so that no such power of legislation could be constructively implied to be given in the act, and all the laws passed about slavery, and the oaths required to support them, were void from the outset. These test oaths corrupted the franchise from the commencement, and this Lecompton constitution being the result of such a franchise, has no validity; yet we are urged to admit Kansas under it, and to avoid the appearance of giving sanction to its provisions it is proposed to add a declaratory resolution investing the people of the new State with the right of revolution—a right we cannot give nor take away. Yet this is the right our Democratic President says the people of Kansas will have, to relieve themselves from a constitution which is odious to, and which he urges us to inflict upon, them.

Sir, I have no disposition to produce irritation or agitation upon this question; and I invoke Senators on the other side not to stake the welfare of this country, not even the quiet and good feeling of the people, upon an issue so contemptible as this. It is unworthy the attention already bestowed upon it—attention which it would not have received but for its being made an Administration measure, and a sectional one upon which to conciliate and unite the South in support of the policy of the President.

Declarations have been made here from Georgia and South Carolina, from Alabama and Mississippi, that all must regret to hear. We are told this Union is to be shaken to its center upon the question whether this particular form of government shall be established for Kansas. Senators are crowding this measure as if some great event were depending upon its passage. There has appeared to be a design of raising an excitement for the purpose of seeing it subside when the deed is consummated. There are too many artificial circumstances in all these Kansas movements to commend them to my approval. We are not told that Kansas has a sufficient population to warrant this application to be admitted as a State. No enumeration or census has been taken to show this. Nothing has been done in this business as it is ordinarily done in like cases. There has been hot haste about everything concerning it; everything bears but one label; and that is, political capital by agitation in the southern States, where, upon such a question, it is supposed they may be made to act together; and every circumstance is now seized upon to induce the people of those States to believe that opposition to this fraud proceeds from a purpose hostile to them, when, if viewed simply as a party measure, the South will admit that the Republican party would gain more by their carrying Lecompton than it could by rejecting it. And I think it is doing injustice to the intelligence of southern men to suppose they can be made to believe that the institutions of the southern States can be disturbed by the decision of a question as unimportant as this, let it be decided as it may.

The people of the South know that all their institutions rest upon too good foundations to be overturned by a clause about slavery in Kansas, put into a constitution by fraud and violence.

If there is any real cause of difference between the sections, it is different from this; and this is only used as a pretext to enlist the passions of men in the service of disunion. There has been a zeal manifested on this question, unusual in this body. It has carried Senators further from what I regard the proprieties of their position. They have, by a caucus-drill, instituted a trial of physical endurance, to force the minority to terms, which the majority might impose for the termination of the debate here upon the question. In this contest, I was called from a sick bed to this Chamber, at three o'clock in the morning, as was said, to make a quorum; as if less than a quorum could not adjourn, which, as I was told, it had been decided could not be done. When I came into the Senate, a Senator was addressing it upon the dangers to the Union to result from the decision of this question. After the close of this speech, the Senator from Louisiana [MR. BENJAMIN] made a proposition to his friends, the majority here, to withdraw from the Senate. I hope this was done without reflection, for it was a proposition to break up this Government. Without a Senate, you can have no Government. I never heard such a proposition made here before, and hope never to hear another of the kind. Such a proposition will not, I trust, be made by any man born upon American soil. There have been conventions elsewhere that were supposed to be designed to "prepare the hearts of the people" for disunion; but never, I think, before this session, has there been a proposition made in this Chamber to break up this Government.

It has always been my purpose, since my first participation in the business of the Senate, to vote and act for measures which I thought would promote the interests of the country, North and South, East and West, endeavoring to have no sectional feeling or local partialities in legislation.

I can expect to exert but little influence; to attempt it might give offense, for I do not profess to have either ability or experience to justify such a course; but I may say to Senators who are talented and enjoy an elevated position, that it may be wise in them to cultivate fraternal feelings in this body of equal representatives of States. The idea that there are many spheres in the walks of life, is not the American doctrine.

The Senator from South Carolina [MR. HAMMOND] is already assured of my respect. That Senator, the other day, undertook to prove that society in the North was not organized as well, or with as favorable elements, as that of the South. He insisted the laboring men of the North occupied the position of slaves, like those of the South; and having the right of franchise, our rights were held by a more precarious tenure than theirs. I think he is mistaken in this. He calls the laborers of both sections the "mud-sills" of society. As this is a technical term in the construction of a dam, I suppose he means to intimate by it that those who are regarded as the more fortunate in point of wealth or position, are the cap-logs of society.

We have an intelligent people at the North, whether wealthy or not; and in no country in the world is there less pretension made to wealth, or to position on account of it—none where there is a more general recognition of the fealty due by all men to their common Creator, who has said to man that by the sweat of his face shall he eat bread.

No man is exempt from this service. The Senator seems to suppose that, with their organization of society, there will be, and is, a class with the leisure and means of education which must elevate and secure to them a character for progress, civilization, and refinement.

I would ask the Senator if, in his experience in society, this has generally been the effect of the possession of such supposed early advantages? I regret to say it has not, in most cases that have come within my observation; and I have always been disposed to award greater merit for success in those thus circumstanced than to those who are not subject to the various temptations which beset the class he refers to. In our country, it is common to say that "it is better to be born lucky than rich." In the history of our country there is nothing to justify this overweening vanity of wealth or high position, or to discourage those who commence with every disadvantage that conceit can attach to the drudgery of labor. Will the Senator from South Carolina look at the picture which hangs over the western entrance to the rotunda of this Capitol, and examine the portrait of Benjamin Franklin, in his plain citizen's dress, at the most refined court of Europe? Look at his countenance as he is addressing the King, and then look at the King, in his royal robes, who has enjoyed every advantage of elevated birth and of solid and refined education, and say which of the two he would like to have for his compeer in this body? The attitude, features, and countenance, of the laboring man are a specimen of one of nature's noblemen. As to the other, I will say nothing. I am prevented, from the gratitude I feel for the aid he gave us in the cause of the Revolution. Let the Senator examine the portraits of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He will find the same man associated with Roger Sherman; they are not among the mass of the members of that highly distinguished body of patriots, but are represented as two of the five members who report the Declaration to Congress—men who are prominent among the noblest of the land—both laborers. Does the Senator think we should be in a lower strata (as he calls it) by having these two men in our body to represent the States they represented in 1776?

Sir, every man in Christendom would accord to such men the post of honor, be they where they may. Franklin was known in Europe as a day worker at job printing; it never injured him anywhere. I doubt if he was ever in any body of men, or on any committee, where he did not appear a little taller than his associates for intelligence and common sense; and I would rather have the maxims in his "Poor Richard" almanac to make a man with, than all the writings of Lord Chesterfield upon refinement and court etiquette.

There are a few other remarks which the Senator from South Carolina made that I must notice—not in any spirit of complaint, for I like South Carolina; for I received the hospitalities of her people, and those of Georgia, when I was a boy, and remember it with gratitude; but I think he has made some unfair comparisons between the two sections, which I have briefly adverted to. What remains for me to say relates to the remark he made that, if we now settled this question fairly, the South had no guarantee that we should not plunder them with tariffs, with internal improvements, with navigation laws and fishing bounties, and with a bank of the United States, to concentrate all the capital of the country in the commercial emporium. These were so many counts in his bill of indictment against the North.

As well as I recollect, most of the measures enumerated and denounced by the Senator, as plundering them, originated with South Carolinians. I think the tariff was reported by one of the most distinguished of the citizens of South Carolina, Mr. Lowndes: at least I have always given him credit for inaugurating that measure for the benefit of labor. The credit of internal improvements and the bank have been awarded by his grateful countrymen to another illustrious citizen of that State, Mr. Calhoun. I must leave the defense of these measures to their beneficial effect while we enjoyed them, and to the State which feels such just pride in their originators, or supporters. The fame of these statesmen had these very measures for its basis and sustenance. I concur with the Senator in his view of the value of the great staples of that section of the country, and am always glad to notice the improvements they have made in their production. Since my remembrance, the product of cotton to the hand has increased threefold, and the general price remains about the same; which indicates great prosperity, as is shown in the advanced value of their laborers.

The Senator will admit that we, at the North, have made equal improvement in our means of producing, but we do not receive its returns in the increase of the price of labor, as they do. When we improve processes we sell for less, and the consumer shares in the benefit, as well as the producer, and sometimes has it all; but this discouragement does not unnerve the arm of labor, or paralyze the brain of the inventor. They still strive; and, at all events, mean to deserve success. We do not envy their success, and try to convince ourselves that we are benefited by it. In this way we have got on well together for more than eighty years with this Union, and I doubt the wisdom of trying an experiment to get on without it.

The Senator is fearful the South may be plundered by the fishing bounties, and I understand the Senator from Alabama, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, has reported a bill to repeal them. I regret this, and think the Senator has not fully considered the purpose of these bounties. It is easy to raise a cry against bounties; but if this matter was fairly understood by the South they would not feel hostile to the fishing vessels. They are the nurseries of our seamen, and are so called.

The South take great interest in our Navy, and furnish a very large proportion of its officers, and have evinced a commendable zeal here in guarding their interests this winter, in which I have aided. But, sir, we cannot expect to win naval victories with epaulets. It takes a different kind of men to gain the victories at sea. The officers get the honors; but we must have sailors to do most of the work and the fighting. I do not mean to disparage the officers, who get the glory, but insist that we must not forget the sailors whom they command. These fishermen embark in small vessels, and cruise in the boisterous regions of the north Atlantic, to catch codfish, and then embark in larger vessels after whales. When you have trained up a boy to catch codfish where the sea runs mountain high, and then learn him to go in an open boat and strike and kill a whale, you need not be afraid of his ever being caught or frightened by anything. Sir, there is no class of men that wind or storm ever blew or beat upon who are so utterly without fear as sailors who have been thus trained. One will sleep upon the cross-trees, high up on the "giddy mast," where you and I would tremble to see him sit awake. He is not made drowsy, as you are now, by the weariness of a single sense, by the sound of my voice incessantly tattooing the drum-head of your ear; but his whole brain is rocked by the "imperious surges" of the sea.

Mr. Jefferson has told a fine story of Logan, who said he "never felt fear, and would not turn on his heel to save his life." Logan had the idea that, when fighting, it would disgrace him to turn on his heel; and he would not do it to save his life. But this sailor wants no incentive to courage: he would not lose his nap to save his life.

The Senator from South Carolina likes the renown of our naval victories; but he cannot achieve them with landmen or smooth-water sailors. If you want to take another Frolic in a gale of wind, you must have sailors who can walk the deck in rough weather; landmen cannot do it; they may be as brave, but they must have the right training. Victories are not expected to be won by what are called educated men. For your Navy you want that inbred courage and endurance which are only to be found in the occupations I have described.

If, therefore, you want to raise such sailors, take care of the nurseries—the fishing vessels. I ask the chairman of the committee who proposes to repeal the fishing bounties, the classic Senator from Alabama, to reflect that, if the infant had been strangled in the cradle, the labors would not have been performed that gave immortality to Hercules.

I hope these suggestions may save the bounties to the fishermen; they will not be a great burden on your Treasury.

As to our navigation laws, which the Senator classes among those which plunder the South, as we now let all participate in our foreign trade on equality with us, he must mean to let them do so with the coasting trade. The English have the most profitable of our foreign carrying trade. By the aid of their Government their mail steamers have supplanted ours. They take the passengers and the most valuable freight, and I do not know that there would be danger in letting them do our carrying upon all our rivers and in all our harbors—our inland as well as our foreign mails—it may be best to mix with everybody and have a common purse, and of course a common destiny. I am not afraid of England; but I never knew a treaty or trade made with her by the United States, in which we came off equal—scarcely second best. Close intercourse was what Philip preached when he wanted to control the other States of Greece; his gold was no doubt profitable, and those out of his city saw no danger in its free circulation among them; and I believe even Demosthenes was not able to stand against it.

I would rather have a few things which we could call our own, and a single pursuit that all mankind did not mingle in; so as to preserve our identity as a people, and not go back to colonial dependence in everything. We should recollect that we cannot hire others to love our country as our people love it—or to fight our battles as ours have fought, and will fight them; these are things you cannot hire or buy, and so are public spirit, friendship, and courage. We should leave some room, and some motive for our own people to cultivate these.

The Senator from South Carolina says that labor only needs to be docile, obedient, and faithful—a pack-horse kind of labor. Would such labor elevate a country, and give it fame in the world? No, sir; mere planting and farming never did elevate a country; and yet they are the basis of all other pursuits, and the most useful and honorable, and the main pillars of national strength. But to make a nation independent, prosperous, and happy, you must diversify your labor, and that will elevate it, and the country with it. We only need to cultivate a proper spirit, and settle this Kansas question fairly. Let us not undertake to throw this Lecompton fraud across the track of this people and make it the occasion of sectional strife and alienation. It is too small a matter to be allowed to do so great an injury.

MR. BRIGHT. Mr. President, the constitution of Kansas, with all the circumstances, it is believed, directly or remotely connected with its formation, being now before us, the question is, shall the Territory be admitted as a State under that instrument?

Undoubtedly it is the policy of the Government that her Territories should be converted into States as rapidly as a due regard to the welfare of their inhabitants will permit. That is alike the interest of both—the General Government on the one hand, to be relieved from the local maintenance of the Territories; and of the Territories on the other, to be relieved from that interference of Congress which must unavoidably continue to exist, to a greater or less extent, so long as they remain in their condition of dependency. Whilst a Territory is in its infancy, unable through weakness—a paucity of inhabitants, sparsely settled, and of very limited means—to sustain itself, the propriety of extending over it the paternal care of the General Government must readily be admitted; but whenever it has acquired sufficiency of strength to bear the burden of its own support, it is due to the rest of the community to be relieved from it. Each State of the Union, under our system of government, has to maintain its own local organization; and why not the Territories, whenever they possess the ability? The only means by which this can be accomplished—the only way which has hitherto been devised of transferring the sustenance of the Territory from the common to the local treasury, where it more properly belongs, is by admitting it into the Union as a State. What the exact expense of maintaining our Territories is, it is not necessary to inquire. We know, however, that it must be very considerable; and that, whatever it is, it is defrayed out of the national Treasury of the States, whilst the States, in addition, have to sustain the charges of their own separate organizations. It is but right that every community should bear the burden of its own support; and whenever a Territory, by the strength of its numbers, has acquired that ability, its inhabitants should not only be permitted to form their own separate government, but if they refuse, should be coerced into the measure by all fair and just appliances known to the Constitution. The States have an interest in this, which it is their right and their duty to protect.

But there are higher and nobler considerations than mere pecuniary ones involved in the creation of new States. The addition of a State is an addition to the strength and stability of the Union, riveting more firmly the bonds that make us one people, and giving us increased consequence—which is power—in the eyes of other nations. Of the policy of admitting new States, or of adding them as rapidly as possible, there surely cannot exist two opinions. The general policy, therefore, being in favor of the admission of Kansas, the inquiry arises, what valid objection can be urged against it? The principal one presented is, that the constitution before us was not, after its formation, submitted as an entirety to a vote of the people, for their ratification or rejection.

I have always favored, Mr. President, the doctrine of non-intervention. From the time of its first enunciation by that eminent statesman now at the head of the State Department up to the present hour, it has always found me a supporter and advocate. Eight years ago, when this Chamber was illumined by the light of those great intellects of Kentucky, South Carolina, and Massachusetts, which have since gone out forever, we congratulated ourselves and the country that, by the application of this principle in the acts organizing the Territories of New Mexico and Utah, we had established a practical rule of action for all time to come, in reference to the domestic affairs of the States and Territories, which should command, by its own intrinsic justness, the approbation of the people of every portion of the Union, and should relieve Congress for the future from those angry sectional strifes which, for the previous thirty years, had endangered the peace and perpetuity of the Government. The principle is so just itself, so admirably adapted to the spirit and genius of our institutions, that my wonder is it was not earlier adopted, or, being adopted, that it should afterwards have encountered such violent hostility. Yet so it was; though it finally received the indorsement of both the great political parties of that day, it met for a time, nay still meets, with the fierce opposition of all that class of men who have been and yet are laboring to impose restrictions upon the free exercise of sovereignty in the Territories.

Of the power of Congress to legislate for the Territories I have never entertained a doubt. Within the limits of the Federal Constitution their authority is supreme. Within those limits they possess the same power over the Territories that is exercised by the several States within their respective borders. But power is one thing, and the expediency of its exercise another. Whilst Congress, in my judgment, possesses the power, past experience has demonstrated how dangerous it is to the peace and harmony of the Union for Congress to attempt its exercise in reference to the domestic affairs of the Territories. Its inexpediency was shown by the ill blood and bitterness which it generated within these walls and throughout the country. For relief and peace we turned to that rule of non-intervention by which Congress has been since governed, and which has received the decided approbation of a large majority of the American people.

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Bright.

SENATE.

With whatever zeal and energy I possessed, I sustained the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act. By its provisions I am now ready to stand or fall. It meets no less the approval of my judgment now than when it was first urged upon the consideration of the Senate. I was then and am now ready to leave the people of the Territories free to decide their domestic institutions for themselves. I am as willing that they should select the mode, as that they should have the power of decision. If I had thought when I sanctioned the principle that the people of Kansas and Nebraska should not be free to decide their domestic institutions for themselves, that I had intervened to prescribe the mode in which that decision should be proclaimed, I should have done more than hesitate. I should have halted before I violated a principle in its very enunciation. Whilst declaring for non-intervention, I should never have been willing to intervene against it. It is just as much an offense against non-intervention that Congress should require one piece of legislation as another. It violates the theory upon which the act was based as much for Congress to prescribe the manner in which the Constitution should be framed, and the requisites of its efficacy, as that they should require a provision affecting the domestic interests of the Territory to be incorporated in it. The only value of such a principle as runs through the Kansas-Nebraska act is its entire consistency and coherency. If violated, even remotely, its virtue is gone forever. It makes no difference by what instrument the outrage is effected, it matters not whether it be the voice of Jacob or the hand of Esau, if the soul of it, the vital principle which sustained it and gave it both beauty and power, is violated. Who ever supposed, when the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed, that Congress would ever afterwards be troubled with the question as to the mode in which the constitution of Kansas was to be passed? Who believed that it would be cause of offense if it was adopted after the form of approved precedents? If the matter of that constitution accorded with the Constitution of the United States, did we not put ourselves solemnly on the record that we would not intervene against it? Were we then, too, perpetrating what has become so familiar a word of late in the vocabulary of certain Senators, "a swindle?" I sent forth the pledge to the country that I would not refuse the constitution of Kansas, unless its provisions were in conflict with the Federal Constitution. That pledge I intend to redeem at all hazards. No objection is made, so far as I can learn, against any provision of that instrument as being contrary to the Constitution of the United States. If there be none such, let those of us, at least, who said in effect that such should be the only ground of rejection, be silent.

The only complaint made is as to the method of the making. Is there anything in the Constitution of the United States which prescribes the mode in which Territories shall be initiated into the membership of States? If there be any such clause my reading has never shown it to me. If, then, the Federal Constitution does not prescribe the manner in which constitutions shall be made, and if there be nothing in the constitution now presented which is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, in all sincerity and candor I ask, how can we, who agreed to make that the only test, refuse to admit Kansas into the Union? No law of Congress, no regulation made by the legislative authority of the Union, has been violated or evaded. The properly constituted and legally authorized civil power of Kansas, after full proclamation of its purposes, adopted this constitution in the way in which other constitutions have been adopted, and in the way approved by the philosophy and genius of our Government. Nay, more: the Legislature of Kansas, in its procedure, took counsel from this body, and framed, both in principle and detail, the act calling the constitutional convention upon the model of the bill of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] which received the decided approval of the Senate. It secured the bona fide inhabitants of Kansas a fair election of delegates. It provided for a registry of the legal voters of the Territory. It did everything that a bill could do to effectuate the purposes that were stamped upon the face of it. Accidental or wrongful omissions by the sheriff could be remedied by the probate judges. There was no legal voter in the entire Territory who could not avail himself of the provisions of that fair and honest act under which the election was held and delegates chosen. No hostile bayonets drove freemen from the polls—no despotism sat there enthroned to dictate the vote. The act of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas calling the convention has extorted, even from unwilling lips, the commendations of praise. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] himself uses the following language:

"So far as the act of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas calling this convention was concerned, I have always been under the impression that it was fair and just in its provisions. I have always thought the people should have gone together en masse and voted for delegates, so that the voice expressed by the convention should have been the unquestioned and united voice of the people of Kansas. I have always thought that those who stayed away from that election stood in their own light, and should have gone and voted, and should have furnished their names to be put on the registered list, so as to become voters. I have always held that it was their own fault that they did not thus go and vote; but yet, if they chose, they had a right to stay away."

Under the provisions of the law calling the convention the people of Kansas were left entirely free to form their own domestic institutions. If perverseness and faction there and elsewhere dictated a policy which kept either a minority or majority from the polls, the fault was with the offenders only. Their mouths, at least, are sealed against a complaint. It does not become them to come before the country denouncing an act which, according to their own confession, was performed in their presence; and which, they say, they had the power to prevent. If any outrage was perpetrated, it was, according to their own statement, the outrage of a minority in the face of a majority, proceeding quietly to exercise rights which had been conferred by virtue of law. Which of these two classes is entitled to our respect or consideration? Those who, in obedience to law, expressed themselves at the ballot-box, like loyal citizens, or those who stayed away for the known purpose of fomenting a rebellion, whose standard had already been lifted in the Territory? This latter class viewed a legal constitution as a calamity worse than murder and rapine. Topeka was dear to them, because it was illegal. To inaugurate Topeka under the forms of law would be to ignore the very purposes for which Topeka was spoken into existence. To them Topeka was only a darling so long as he was a bastard—the bar sinister endeared him—the proposal to crown him with the honors of legitimacy was worse than a "swindle."

If the adoption under the forms of law of a constitution similar to that of Topeka had not, in the opinion of the non-voting population of Kansas, been the greatest calamity that could befall the authors of that instrument, and the cause for which it was gotten up, they would have quietly, under the protection of law, voted at the election for delegates to form a constitution. Their first purpose being a determination to keep up anti-slavery agitation, they determined to make every other thing bend to it. Accordingly, they refused to vote, and, in some cases, forcibly prevented the registration; and now, with a sublimity of impudence which is without a parallel, set up their own perverseness and faction as a reason for defeating the expressed will of the voting population of the Territory.

Nothing, Mr. President, can be clearer to my mind than the proposition that the act of delegates legally elected, and acting within the scope of the powers conferred upon them, is the act of the people themselves. According to the genius and theory of American constitutions, it is entirely immaterial by what majority such delegates are elected, or what number of voters appeared at the polls. The act of the delegate, moving within the authority conferred upon him, is the act not only of those who expressly deputed him, but of those who had the opportunity to do so. It stands as the act of all such until legally set aside or modified by competent authority. This principle is a maxim both of law and political science. The representative idea is the especial boast and glory of our system. It is both its corner and keystone. More than anything else it distinguishes our system from those which have prevailed in other stages of the world's history. It stands midway between despotism and popular caprice. It protects against both. It gives stability and intelligence to government. To it, more than to any other cause, we are indebted for whatever of glory and power have gathered around the American name. Whilst it recognizes and adopts the great principle of democracy, that the people are the source and origin of all political power, it so modulates and controls that doctrine as to make it subservient to the purposes of justice and right. Our fathers did not stumble on it by accident. It was no sudden thought even. It was born of wisdom. It was introduced into our State and Federal constitutions, and made a practical power there, by men who had studied the past and found out its true teachings. If the domain for which they were framing a system of government had been as narrow in its limits as ancient Attica, they still would have adopted it.

Experience has fully vindicated their sagacity. That they regarded this great principle not only as just but as the only practicable one, is easily seen by even a careless observer. Under the system devised by them majorities were not only represented, but sections and even minorities. Both under Federal and State constitutions minorities may have the representative control. The majority never has that control unless it takes care to have itself represented. Sometimes even that control is expressly prevented. Delaware, on this floor, is made as potential as New York. In the more popular branch even, he who represents the convictions of a majority exceeding five thousand has no more power in the enactment of laws than a colleague who may have succeeded by a majority of one. No majority, ever so large, can impress itself upon legislation except by first controlling the representation. No matter how unanimous public sentiment may be, no matter how strongly a conviction may have fastened itself upon the people, they are utterly and entirely powerless for all the purposes of legislation except through the medium of representation. The representative opinion may be in conflict with the popular voice; an overwhelming majority may raise an indignant protest against the expressed legislative will; yet it stands as the controlling law until set aside in accordance with legal forms. He who supposes that the opinions of a majority, even when clearly expressed, necessarily make the laws, has mistaken the whole theory of our Government. That majority, before it can make itself effectual, must fix upon its representative and clothe him with the authority to speak in its behalf at the proper time and place.

Not only is this so, but all of our constitutions and charters, Federal and State and municipal, are based upon the theory that whenever the people, or any portion of them, have had an opportunity of voting and neglect or refuse to do so, the only fair and proper presumption is that either they have no convictions which they wish to express, or that they acquiesce with those who have voted. This presumption is so absolute that for wise and proper reasons it is not allowed to be contradicted, no matter what may be the facts. A member of the House of Representatives may be returned by a single vote. It would be no argument against his right to a seat that ten thousand men could be found in his district who would have voted against him. In like manner it would be no sort of objection to the validity or force of a law passed by his vote that every man in his district was opposed to its passage.

As far as the Federal Government is concerned, there is no contrivance known to the Constitution by which the power of making laws of any kind, fundamental or not, can be transferred from the representative to the people. No amount of public sentiment outside the legislative halls can enact such a law. The function of legislation must be performed by the representative, and by him alone. The purpose of our fathers was, on the one hand, to remove legislation, as far as practicable, from clamor and sudden gusts of passion; and on the other, to preserve that accountability of the representative to the people, which is always sure to secure, sooner or later, the fullest and amplest recognition of popular sentiment. The good sense and sound judgment of the country, I believe, are prepared to sustain this principle, not only in the making of ordinary legislative acts, but in the framing of constitutions. The better opinion now seems to be, that State Legislatures cannot refer the propriety of a passage of a law to the vote of the people. My own State has taken decided ground on this question. She was unwilling to let the matter rest on argument or judicial decision. She has incorporated a provision in her constitution which expressly prohibits the submission of a proposed law to the vote of the people. She believed that representatives, elected by the people and accountable to them, constituted the only proper body for determining the propriety of legislative acts. She was unwilling even to allow that body to divest itself of that function. She took the effectual means of making sure and fixed the responsibility of the representative, by fastening upon him a duty from which no power above or below could relieve him.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Bright.

SENATE.

If this principle of the submission of important provisions to a direct vote of the people who are to be affected by them grows out of the theories upon which our Government has been established, why, then, is it ignored in Federal and State constitutions, and by solemn judicial decision? If the principle be so essential, why has it not been authoritatively recognized somewhere? If, as has been claimed, this right of the people to decide directly by what provisions they shall be governed be a great principle which flows directly from our form of government, why, I ask, has the practice been almost invariably otherwise? The truth is, Mr. President, that this principle so confidently claimed, instead of being salutary, is vicious. It has been so pronounced by those wise men who gave form and vitality to the glorious Government under which we are now enjoying privileges and blessings unknown to any other people on earth. The true American idea is, that legislation, whether it be in the ordinary form enacted by Legislatures, or in the establishment of the fundamental law as enunciated by State constitutions, should be fully consummated by men selected by the people for that purpose. It makes no difference in principle whether the thing which is to be done be the enactment of an ordinary law or the establishment of a constitution. They are both of the same class; they both constitute the law; they both establish a rule of action. The philosophy of one is the philosophy of the other. If there be more solemnity in one procedure than the other, that does not affect the principle. Both regulate the conduct of the citizen, and are to be determined by one and the same reason. In point of fact, ordinary legislative acts are of more moment to the citizen in determining his actions and fixing his responsibilities than mere constitutional provisions. They reach his person and his hearth-stone; they define his rights, prescribe his duties, and point out his remedies. Their hand is upon him, asleep or awake; they are above him and around him, his panoply and shield. The nearest, as well as the most distant relations of human life, are made subject to their power. The rights of property, the sanctities of home, nay, of life and death, are all within their embracing fold. No subject is too high, none too tender, none too minute for their reach. Although such varied and vast interests are confided to legislative bodies, it has only been within a few years past, and then only at rare intervals, that the proposition of submitting a law to the direct vote of the people has been seriously considered. I hold it to be the clearest departure from the wisdom of our fathers which modern days, with their new ideas, have produced. I am proud that my own State has put its emphatic seal of condemnation upon a heresy so noxious.

While I am free, Mr. President, to admit the binding force of State constitutions, I am compelled to say that, for several reasons, their importance in this country has been greatly exaggerated. Constitutions and charters, municipal, provincial, or national, in other countries and ages have been concessions wrung by force, or purchased by money, from what was there and then deemed the seat and origin of power. Their importance and value, under such circumstances, could not be too highly estimated. Like Magna Charta, they stood between the people and usurpation. They were pleaded against wrong and outrage. They were the horns of the altar to which the people clung when ruthless oppression laid the hand of violence upon them. The service which they rendered in behalf of the people fully vindicated their claim to profound reverence. In our country, however, where the people are recognized as the origin and seat of political power; where constitutions flow from them, instead of being concessions to them; where the remedy for an abuse is in their own hands, to be exercised at any time and in their own way, the case is far different. With us, State constitutions are mere organizations. They are merely pieces of political mechanism—simple contrivances for organizing legislative, judicial, and executive branches. One power is made to lodge in one place, and another resides elsewhere. In their declaration of general principles, they but repeat the common law which our fathers brought with them, and which would be law without such repetition. So far even as the limitations in them are concerned, they are but restrictions upon the agents of the people, which can be removed or modified at their pleasure. Even against a provision contained in the constitution itself, it can be amended. Where ever the doctrine prevails, that all power is lodged with the people, to be exercised by them for their own benefit, such must be the necessary consequence. Where the power to make exists, there also the power to modify exists, if the rights of none others intervene. If royal power could not rightfully abrogate constitutions and charters, it is because the rights of other parties do intervene. In our country, however, there is no other party but the people. They make for themselves, and can unmake. There is no power anywhere to prevent. When the people of a State determine to change their constitution, there is no political body in existence which can interpose. The distinction, in this respect, between our Federal and State constitutions is apparent. One is a compact between several parties. Any one can claim the observance of any provision. To a State constitution, however, there is but one party. It is merely a rule of action devised by themselves for themselves alone. There are no obligations in it of which other political bodies can claim the benefit. At the pleasure of the party which made it, it can be unmade. Any provision in it which pretends to take away that power or delay its exercise is impotent against the majesty of the people.

I hold it, therefore, Mr. President, as incontrovertible, that the constitution of Kansas now presented, so far as it conflicts with the interests, or even caprices, of the people of that Territory, can be altered at any time, and in any way, at their pleasure. Nay, more: I hold that if the proposed constitution be obnoxious to the people of Kansas, the surest and speediest way of securing to Kansas a constitution agreeable to her people, would be to admit her to the companionship of States, under the Lecompton constitution, and then leave her as a sovereign power, to adjust her own affairs, without interference from any quarter. Once admitted into the Union, the contest loses its national character, (an event which every true patriot should desire,) and the determination of her people will stand as the law and the fact for the youthful State.

So strong, Mr. President, is my conviction of the viciousness of the principle of submitting to a direct vote of the people the propriety of the enactment or rejection of laws, that for one I am prepared to extend the same objection to a submission of entire constitutions to the same tribunal. I know that others entertain different views, and particularly under the peculiar circumstances which existed in Kansas after the convention had concluded its labors. Our patriotic President, anxious for the quiet and peace of the country; desirous of allaying all excitement in relation to the affairs of Kansas; prompt to take away even the shadow of an excuse from the rebellious bands then hatching treason in the Territory; was favorable to the expediency of the submission of the constitution to a direct vote of the people, though at all times clear in his own mind as to the right of the convention to determine that matter for itself. Believing, however, as I do, that constitutions are but laws, and that the enactment of one requires as complete an exercise of sovereign power as the framing of the other, there must be an extraordinary combination of circumstances, in any case, to make me relinquish the convictions which I have carefully formed on this subject.

Independently of other objections to the submission of entire constitutions directly to the people, how can an intelligent vote be given by those who attempt it? If a constitution consists of fifty articles, and thirty of them accord with a person's convictions, and twenty are more or less obnoxious, what is his vote at best, under such circumstances, but a compromise? How can you have intelligent voting, when fifty diverse and unconnected propositions are to be determined on by one ballot? Nay, more: it is very easy to conceive such a thing as a probable result, that, although each and every article, if submitted one by one, would receive a majority of votes, the whole, when presented together, would, by a combination, be defeated. It seems to me that even if there were no vital and cardinal objections to such a course, the uncertainty and unsatisfactoriness attending it would be formidable obstacles in the way of its adoption.

If, however, the dignity and importance of a constitution rise superior to mere legislative enactments, I ask if there is anything in the history of the country—anything in the practice of the founders of our constitutions, State and Federal, which teaches us that it is necessary that even so solemn an instrument should be submitted to a direct vote of the people? What question could be superior in dignity or importance to that of the adoption or rejection of the Federal Constitution? States were called on to surrender a portion of their sovereign powers, and to give, in some cases, to the General Government the power of life and death over their own citizens. There were peculiar reasons, too, in addition to all this, which might have been urged as an excuse for the submission of the Federal Constitution to the people. The paths pursued by its framers had been untroubled before. All other federations had been failures. In Kansas, on the other hand, the constitution is almost a stereotype of those of the new States of the Northwest, which have sprung into power and strength within the history of a few years. In nine tenths of its provisions it is similar to those which have been approved by actual and successful working. Notwithstanding this material difference in the two cases, in no instance was the question of the adoption or rejection of the Federal Constitution submitted to a direct vote of the people of any of the thirteen States. And yet it was adopted by the people. The instrument itself says so. Every word of that immortal document, from preamble to conclusion, was carefully scrutinized, and its force weighed by men who well understood the force of language. Nothing was put in by mistake or left there by inadvertence. They meant what they said. They said, not only in words in the preamble, but in substance in the body of that instrument, that in the system which they then inaugurated for the perpetuation of freedom and the securing of domestic tranquility in the New World, the acts of the representatives of the people should be deemed the acts of the people themselves; and that, at least, as far as national relations were concerned, the people should express their convictions only through representation. If there be one grand cardinal idea more than another stamped upon the Constitution, it is that. So decidedly is that the case, that the Constitution allows no amendment by popular vote, but specifically requires that all change shall be acted on by the Legislatures of the States. In those days, at least, the opinion prevailed without any contradiction, that when a constitution or other instrument was adopted by representatives specially selected to consider the subject, it was adopted not only by the people who voted for those representatives, but by every one who had an opportunity to vote for them. The opinion entertained at that day, so far as I can learn, has never been questioned by any respectable authority, until anti-slavery agitation, for its own purposes, brought about the state of affairs now existing in Kansas. Even during that period of anti-slavery agitation, when Missouri applied for admission into the Union as a State—when the restriction was imposed whose removal I favored in the Kansas-Nebraska act—it was not contended either that a constitution framed by representatives legally authorized to act was not the act of the people of Missouri; or that it was necessary or proper to submit the proposed constitution to a direct vote of the people. It was reserved for later days, for those of our own time, to start into being this new theory. If it be, as its friends and admirers claim for it, a vital principle, why has it slumbered so long without having been recognized even in debate?

Mr. President, it has always seemed to me that those who concede the legality of the Lecompton constitution and acknowledge the force of the Kansas-Nebraska act, surrender the whole argument. To reject an act framed by a convention which had the authority to pass it in that form, is unquestionable intervention. It is the setting up of our will against that of the people affected, as expressed by a lawful and competent body. It is saying to Kansas that our convictions shall prevail against hers, although the latter have been announced in due form of law.

It will not do at this late day, after a struggle which convulsed the country from center to circumference, to say that the Kansas and Nebraska act was not an enabling statute, but only amounted to an authority to petition for redress of grievances. The people of Kansas, or any portion of them, or any recognized body, legal or illegal, would have had such a right independent of the Kansas act. Whatever may be our view of present questions, let us at least hold on to what we have gained in the past in its full integrity. The Kansas and Nebraska act meant more than a mere authority to petition for redress of grievances. It had a far deeper significance and import. It gave form and life to the Territories; but left them, after their organization, perfectly free to regulate their own domestic affairs, through their own legally constituted governing authority, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. If that means a bare authority to be heard in the form of a petition, truly was the victory which we thought would bring peace to the country barren and fruitless. I adopt no such opinion. No such construction was given to it in discussion. That act contained two great ideas which at the time received my cordial approbation, and are no less dear to me now; they are, first, non-intervention, and, secondly, acquiescence in the action of the legally constituted territorial governing authority, subject to the provisions of the Federal Constitution. To them will I hold so long as they stand in plain, unmistakable language, unrepealed, upon the statute-book, let whosoever may desert them or impair their force by fanciful interpretations.

I have said, Mr. President, that there was no obligation resting upon the convention to submit any portion of the constitution to a direct vote of the people. The convention, however, moved by considerations of expediency, submitted what acting-Governor Stanton called "the great distracting question" to the people of the Territory. There was no dispute of any moment save on the question of slavery. That Kansas should be constituted into a State; that it should be republican in form, with the usual division of legislative, executive, and judicial departments, all were agreed. The Lecompton convention, acting upon this idea, submitted the only vexed question, and the friends of Topoka, true to their former course of faction, refused to vote. They had proclaimed, before the constitution was framed, that it was their purpose to reject it, no matter what provisions it contained. Although accounting themselves the especial champions of freedom, they suffered the slavery clause to be incorporated in the constitution, rather than vote for the remainder of a constitution which has been the subject of but little complaint. In plain words, they refused to vote because it was made by a set of delegates duly elected under authority of law, instead of being made by another, elected in defiance of it. They ended in faction what they had begun in rebellion. By no act of mine will I give aid, comfort, or countenance to any such movements.

If it be alleged that the "free-State party," as it termed itself, received pledges that the entire constitution should be submitted to the people, I answer, in the first place, that they were unworthy recipients of any such, if made; and, secondly, that no one had any authority to make such save the convention itself; and if made, were extra-official and void.

Even if I had been inclined to look with favor upon the policy of the submission of constitutions to a direct vote of the people, and believed, further, that the wishes of a large majority of the people of Kansas had been disregarded in the formation of the Lecompton constitution, still I should not have been prepared to vote against accepting it. The present aspect of the slavery question demands that merely abstract opinions should be sacrificed to the welfare of the whole country. It seems to have been the constant and unceasing effort of a certain party in this country to foment strife, and array one section against another. Throughout the whole of my political life, I have been in firm and decided opposition to that party, and I expect to remain so until its close. I look upon this constant agitation of the question of slavery as dangerous to the continuance of the Union. It has already, within my own recollection, weakened the bonds of fraternal regard between North and South. I consider it to be the first duty I owe to my country to use every effort in removing from the arena of national politics this disturbing cause. To that end, nothing can be more acceptable to me than to transfer all the difficulties of Kansas from this floor to the proper forum of their adjustment, within the limits of that Territory. No matter what had been my personal convictions on the abstract matters which have been the subjects of debate during the latter part of the session, I should joyfully have welcomed any proposition whose object was to localize within comparatively narrow limits what has been a cause of irritation to the whole country. Such, I understand, is also the position of the great party with whom it has ever been my pride to act, and of the distinguished statesman now the Chief Executive of the Union. The present is not the first occasion in which the Democratic party has stood in opposition to agitation or faction. Heretofore it has always been successful. I trust the same fortune awaits it again. No matter how fierce may have been the contests which it has waged, it has always returned from the field of victory increased in power. What it has lost by defection, it has more than gained in permanent strength. The history of the country is the illustration of its triumphs. To the almost total exclusion of all other parties, it has impressed itself upon the legislation of the country. Its pen has written your statutes. No law which it has pressed but has been adopted; none that it opposed, but has been defeated or repealed. Apostates, inflamed by disappointments, have turned in new-born hate against it, and have rendered themselves. It has flung defiance to insult from abroad, and has stood the champion of the Constitution at home. It has added untrodden millions of acres to your domain, and has made the flag of the Union honored on every sea. To the fortunes and progress of that noble party I intend to adhere. If it be overtaken by defeat, I know that it will rise again with greater ability to fulfill the mission which I believe Providence has intrusted to its hands. That mission will never be one of alienation, discord, or faction. It will be one of peace, of union, of progress.

To me it is a subject of congratulation, that, in the present crisis, we have in the executive chair a patriot whose firmness and courage have often been tried. He belongs not to that class of men whom excitement unnerves. Clamor has no terrors for him. In the present case he has calmly surveyed the whole field. He has taken his position and intrenched himself there. He has viewed the question before us in all its bearings, present and future, and has decided in favor of no section. He has recommended a course which, if adopted, will prove a measure of peace to the whole country. His counsel is eminently wise and proper. He has brought to the examination of this matter a practical and sagacious mind, thoroughly familiar with all the facts of the case. He has announced to us with great clearness what are his convictions. I trust they will receive the consideration to which they are entitled, both from their intrinsic value and the distinguished source from which they come. In that event, we may again congratulate ourselves and the country that another cause of agitation has been removed from the Halls of Congress.

Mr. WILSON obtained the floor, and the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union. There were very few Senators present when the Vice President took the chair.

Mr. TOOMBS. As we have met, according to the understanding of the Senate, and the benches seem to be full, [laughter,] I move that we take the vote on this interesting question. I think it is abandoned pretty much on this side of the House. Gentlemen have given up their opposition to it. They have had some notions to deliver merely for the country. They have no idea of arguing this question for the Senate. I suppose there is no idea of continuing it. They have had opportunities of speaking to their various constituencies in Massachusetts, Vermont, and the rest of the New England States. There are six of those States; they are small, it is true, but they have occupied a great deal of our time and attention. As many as ten of their representatives in this body have spoken for the universe on this question. We have given them all that time. I suppose that now having given them full time, we can take judgment nil dicit, without any objection. I move that we take the question upon this important measure. We have been discussing it for some days. I was well aware from the beginning, that these gentlemen had no other idea except to amuse the country; that there was no real opposition to this measure. The great pretext which these gentlemen have been making for their opposition to this measure, that it was against the popular will, everybody knows they laugh at behind the pillars, because the fundamental principle of the Black Republican creed is the right to make constitutions for all the new States. They have gone for a prohibition to exclude slave States, and holding the idea that there shall be no more slave States, they go not only for cramming constitutions down the throats of majorities, but against absolute unanimity.

This issue which they have been making is only for New England, for some of the tender-hearted women who are in favor of progress—spinsters who are left in that country. I apprehend that the whole purpose is accomplished. The newspapers are filled with their speeches; we have paid the Globe a large sum of money; and this whole story has answered all its purposes. There never was any serious objection to the passage of this measure. Everybody wanted Kansas to come in, but this is considered a part of the show to go to the country. As we have gone through the show, as some of these gentlemen have duplicated their speeches on us, two three, and four times, I suppose that they will be content to close this business now, as this is Saturday night, and go home for Sunday prayers, and trust to Providence.

Mr. WILSON. Is the Senator from Georgia ready for the vote?

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir. The fact is, that according to the old New England idea, this is Sunday, and I have conscientious scruples about being here after the sun goes down on Saturday. [Laughter.] I hope I shall be backed by the gentlemen who represent the land of steady habits. We ought not to be here after the sun goes down. Even the great principle of human liberty, I think, will not warrant it. I hope, therefore, that we shall settle this business, go home, go to sleep, get up to-morrow, and go to church, and leave it to the Representatives of the people in the other House.

Mr. BROWN. I have a very small matter of account to settle with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and as it only concerns myself, it is not material that anybody but himself should be present. In a speech pronounced by him on the 4th of February—which I did not hear at the time—he made certain quotations from a speech of mine delivered some years ago, and he did me (unintentionally, I have no doubt) very marked injustice. I did not reply at the time, because I did not chance to be in my seat. He quoted two paragraphs from my speech, and quoted them correctly. He then quoted what purports to be a third paragraph from the same speech; but I never should have known that it was taken from the same speech if he had not so stated; because, having read the whole speech over since, I find no such paragraph as the third one in it. It is only by that landmark that I was enabled to trace out in what speech of mine it was intended to locate that third paragraph, to which I now call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate. He says—attributing the language which he quotes as being said by me in the speech alluded to:

"The Senator makes professions of devotion to the Union. In the very speech from which I have before quoted, the Senator says that—

"Our people have been calculating the value of the Union." * * * "I tell you candidly we have calculated the value of the Union. Love for the Union will not keep us in the Union."

"The whole tone, temper, and sentiment look not to the support of the Union as our fathers made it, but to the triumph of a sectional southern policy, to the expansion of slavery, or to the ultimate overthrow of the Government of this country."

Now, sir, no such paragraph as is here quoted appears in the speech in which the first two paragraphs, quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts, appear. It is a speech delivered by me on the 30th of January, 1850, in the House of Representatives, and reported at pages 250-258, and along there generally, of the Congressional Globe of that year. The three sentences embodied in that paragraph may possibly be found in the whole body of the speech. I believe they may be, by dividing sentences, and taking detached portions of paragraphs, and putting them together. What I assert is, that no such paragraph appears in the speech, and that the three sentences put together make up a paragraph which wholly distorts the meaning of the speech; and that I may set myself right before the Senate and the country, I shall send to the Secretary's desk, and ask to have three paragraphs, which I have marked, read from that speech, in which, if any three sentences bearing the meaning of the three I have read appear at all in the whole speech, they will be found. I ask the Clerk to read the three short paragraphs which I have marked, to show what was the general character of the speech, and to show that the Senator from Massachusetts, in attributing that language to it, and saying that it contained such a paragraph, wholly misconceived the general scope and design of that speech. It was not, as he assumed, a disunion speech; it was not a speech showing that I was seeking the disruption of the Union; but, on the contrary, in all its amplitude, so far as my feeble ability could make it, it was emphatically a Union speech. I do not come here now, nor did I stand in the House of Representatives in 1850, as the especial and particular defender or eulogist of the Union. I am content to feel and know, in my heart of hearts, that I am for the Union; but I never was one of those who believed that the Union was to be saved by singing peans to its fame or to its glory. It is to be saved by other means, if it is to be preserved at all. I do not care to detain the Senate. I want to set myself right; and I ask that those three paragraphs be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

"Throw an impartial eye over the history of the last twenty years, and answer me if there is anything there which challenges our devotion? Who does not know that time after time we have turned away in sorrow from our oppressions, and yet have come back clinging to the Union, and proclaiming that, 'with all her faults we loved her still.' And you expect us to do so now, again and again; you expect us to return, and, on bended knees, crave your forbearance. No, you do not; you cannot think so meanly of us. There is nothing in our past history which justifies the conclusion that we will thus abuse ourselves. You know how much a high-toned people ought to bear; and you know full well that we have borne to the last extremity. You know that we ought not to submit any longer. There is not a man of lofty soul among you all who, in his secret heart, does not feel that we ought not to submit. If you fancy that our devotion to the Union will keep us in the Union, you are mistaken. Our love for the Union ceases with the justice of the Union. We cannot love oppression, nor hug tyranny to our bosoms."

"I tell you candidly, we have calculated the value of the Union. Your injustice has driven us to it. Your oppression justifies me to-day in discussing the value of the Union, and I do so freely and fearlessly. Your press, your people, and your pulpit may denounce this as treason—he it so. You may sing hosannas to the Union—it is well. British lords called it treason in our fathers, when they resisted British tyranny. British orators were eloquent in their eulogies on the British Crown. Our fathers felt the oppression, they saw the hand that aimed the blow, and they resolved to resist. The result is before the world. We will resist, and trust to God and our own stout hearts for the consequences." * * *

"I repeat, we deprecate disunion. Devoted to the Constitution—reverencing the Union—holding in sacred remembrance the names, the deeds, and the glories of our common and illustrious ancestry, there is no ordinary ill to which we would not bow sooner than dissolve the political associations of these new States. If there was any point short of absolute ruin to ourselves, and desolation to our country, at which these aggressive measures would certainly stop, we would say at once, go to that point and give us peace. But we know full well, that when all is obtained that you now ask, the cormorant appetite for power and plunder will not be satisfied. The tiger may be driven from his prey, but when once he dips his tongue in blood, he will not relinquish his victim without a struggle."—Congressional Globe, Thirty-First Congress, first session, page 259.

Mr. BROWN. In a single word, I want to say that that speech was pronounced in 1850, calmly, deliberately, upon full consideration. It has been extensively criticised since, in my own State and in the papers, North and South. I stand in the presence of the American Senate to-night to say that I indorse every word and syllable of it, and am prepared to vindicate it; but I do not stand prepared to be charged with having uttered alone and without connection the language quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts. All of us know how easy it is to snatch out a sentence here and a sentence there, from a speech, and put them together and make up precisely what the speaker never intended to enunciate. Take the speech in all its amplitude, and I see nothing in it of which I feel ashamed; nothing which I am not prepared to indorse in this or any other presence.

I stand here to-night prepared to say, in the connection in which I then used the language, that we have calculated the value of the Union. We calculated it, as I then said, to ascertain how much oppression we could bear before we threw it off. I do not belong to that school of politicians who believe that the Union is paramount to everything else. I put the rights of the States above the Union; I put the sovereignty of the States above the Union; I put the liberty of this people under the Constitution above the Union. All these were above it in the beginning; to all these the Union in the beginning was subordinate; and, so far as I have power, it shall remain subordinate. I can feel a proper degree of devotion to the Union without feeling that all power is concentrated in the Union, that it is paramount, that the States must succumb to it, that the sovereignty of the States must pale in its presence, that the liberty of the people must bow down in the august presence of this Union. I believe no such thing, and will act upon no such principle. The Union was made by the States; it is subordinate to the States; and, within its proper sphere, I will stand by it and make as many sacrifices as anybody else to maintain it. But I will sing no peans to the Union. I do not stand here as its especial and particular eulogist. The rights of my State, the rights of my oppressed section, are worth more to me than the Union. I have said so before, here and at home. I say so now; and, if that is to be disunion, let it be so.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senate will adjourn. I suppose that the Senator from Georgia considers this bill dead, and for that reason it makes very little difference to him whether the vote be taken to-night or at any other time. I suppose there is a majority in favor of it in this House, but I understand that in the other part of the building there is a large majority against it. I am unwilling to sit here with eight or ten Senators to listen to speeches; I would rather hear them in open day, with a full Senate. Therefore, as there is no hurry to take the vote, I hope the Senate will adjourn to Monday.

Mr. TOOMBS. Take the vote now.

Mr. BRODERICK. Well, sir, if other gentlemen who are interested in the question were present, I do not know that I should have much objection to taking it now; but there are several Senators absent who are very anxious to speak upon the question before the vote is taken. I believe that the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DIXON,] the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] are all desirous of speaking, and I may speak myself upon this question on Monday. I hope, therefore, since there is no desire on the part of the majority to obtain this question, since they are satisfied there is not a majority in the other House in favor of it, that the Senate will adjourn to-night, and take up the question on Monday, and proceed to consider it from day to day until all the Senators have spoken. Then, sir, I shall be ready to take the vote. I have not made any bargain with the Republicans or with the majority wing of the Democratic party in the Senate. I hope the Senate will adjourn until Monday at twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Before the Senator from Georgia has the vote taken, I will make an explanation to the Senator from Mississippi. I quoted from a speech made by that Senator in 1850. I had his speech before me at the time, and read several paragraphs from it. I believe the Senator does not find fault with them. I quoted, however, three sentences, which, on looking over it, I find are contained in the speech, but not in a paragraph. I found those three sentences which I have quoted going the rounds of publication as the opinions of the Senator from Mississippi, which called my attention to the speech itself; and having the speech before me, I made several quotations, some of which have been read to-night, and used those three sentences without examining particularly as to whether they made a whole paragraph. Indeed, they do not profess to be a whole paragraph, for they are marked as separate quotations, with asterisks between the sentences. I do not think, however, on examining the Senator's speech, that these quotations do him any injustice. The speech he then made was a bold, frank, and manly utterance. It was a complete statement of his views, feelings, and policy. I have before me to-night a speech made by Colonel Bissell, the present Governor of the State of Illinois, in which he quoted some eight or ten paragraphs of this speech of the Senator from Mississippi, to show that disunion sentiments were entertained by members of the House at that time; and he commenced his quotations by quoting largely from the speech of the Senator from Mississippi. I think Mr. Ashmun, of my State, quoted the Senator also, to the same effect. I believe it will be found in this same volume.

Now, sir, all that I quoted from the Senator is to be found in his speech. There are, it is true, qualifications running through his speech—limitations of his declarations; but the speech, I think, will sustain the assertion I made, that its tone and its temper were threatening; that a dissolution of the Union was a contingency to be looked at; and that in case certain events should take place, the dissolution of the Union might follow. I believe the Senator from Mississippi went home and ran as a candidate on the doctrines of this speech. At any rate, I know there was a great contest in the State of Mississippi between the Senator's friends and Governor Foote; that it was one of the most severe contests in the history of the country, between the friends of the compromise measures of 1850 and the secessionists, who, I take it, were a class of men generally understood in the country to be disunionists.

Mr. BROWN. Not at all, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I know there was a qualification there, but after all, practically, it amounts to the same thing. I will say, however, that the Senator to-night has stated his views, and repeated the doctrines of that speech. I do not wish to do that Senator injustice here, or in my own section of the country, and I never have. His opinions are always frankly and manfully uttered. We know where to find him. In all the intercourse I have had with him, and I learn the same from all my friends around me, we always know where to find him, and we have always received from him kindness and courtesy.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday morning at twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield the floor for that motion?

Mr. WILSON. I am ready to go on with my remarks to-night; but if the Senate wishes to adjourn, I will give way.

Several Senators. Go on now.

Mr. CHANDLER. Go on. We have agreed to take the question on Monday.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, this protracted debate, in which so many Senators have participated, is hastening to its close. Hundreds of thousands of the American people have watched its progress with the most intense and painful solicitude. When the President precipitated the question upon the country in his annual message, we were oppressed with the most profound apprehension for the result. Hardly a ray of hope illumined our pathway. We heard the imperious voice of that gigantic power which sways the national Government, demanding the consummation of this crime against the people of Kansas. We saw the Chief Magistrate of the Republic holding in one hand honors and patronage to seduce and corrupt, and in the other power to smite down him who would not yield to his glittering blandishments. During these hundred days of conflict, we have seen the honors, the patronage, and the power of this Government openly prostituted by the President to seduce the weak, and to strike down life-long Democrats who could not be won by corruption. Never has this nation witnessed such shameless and indecent prostitution of executive power. Never have we witnessed such reeking corruption or such abject and unblushing servility. In spite, however, of the potent influences of executive powers of corruption and vengeance, of servility and treachery, our fears have yielded to our hopes, and our hopes are fast ripening into convictions that this Lecompton constitution can never receive the sanction of the Congress of the United States. Our hope is now strong that this Lecompton constitution, the slave power, and this Administration, will be consigned to that grave which knows no resurrection. The Administration may, by the corrupt appliances of executive power, win a barren and fleeting triumph, but the signs all around us indicate that it is doomed to utter defeat; that the slave power will fall with it, to rise not again; and that the intelligent and patriotic men of the country, who love liberty and loathe fraud—men who are loyal to the Constitution and the Union, to law and order, will take the helm and guide the ship of State hereafter on her course.

Sir, that pure, patriotic, and illustrious statesman, John Quincy Adams, has left recorded in his diary these pregnant words: "It is among the evils of slavery that it taints the very sources of moral principle," "establishes false estimates of virtue, and vice," and "perverts human reason." Day by day, as I have watched the startling events which have transpired in the ill-starred Territory of Kansas—day by day, as I have listened to the studied perversions of those deeds of fraud and violence, trickery, and falsehood, I have been reminded of the significant words of the great statesman, whose rich learning, varied and vast acquisitions, ripe experience, and matured intellect, were devoted to the high service of the Republic, at home and abroad, for half a century. In this age, and in this land, where the lights of Christian civilization are flashing upon our pathway, that moral nature must be tainted, that heart must form false estimates of virtue and vice, and that reason must be perverted, before any citizen of America could be impelled to enact such crimes as have been enacted in Kansas, or uphold, defend, or apologize for them. Perverted reason and tainted moral principle may lure or impel to the commission of such acts as have stained the history of that Territory; but let Presidents and Senators remember, that from the hour the tempter glided into Paradise and hissed into the too-willing ear of the mother of mankind disobedience to the "higher law," to the consummation of this work, no genius, no learning, no eloquence, could "Blazon evil deeds or consecrate a crime."

Great advocates have won fame before the judicial tribunals of the world in defense of great criminals, but that page of human history is yet to be written which shall record the enduring fame of statesmen won in the vindication of crimes against the rights of the people.

The right of the people to frame their own forms of government as to them shall seem most conducive to their happiness, is an achieved American right. It was won, not by your Kansas-Nebraska act—it was won eighty-two years ago in the fire and blood of the Revolution. In amending old constitutions, or in framing new ones, we should, either in the State or in Congress, rise above little technicalities and forms. We should remember the words of James Madison, "that forms ought to give way to substance; that a rigid adherence to forms would render nominal and nugatory the transcendent and precious rights of the people." The "Old Thirteen" received their charters from the Crown of England; and when independence was proclaimed, they changed their forms of Government in their own time and way. Eighteen new States have formed, some by spontaneous movements of the people, some by legislative authority, and some by enabling acts, constitutions, and joined this sisterhood of free Commonwealths. The statesmen of the country have generally risen above little technicalities and forms; they have generally sought to learn the will of the people of the new States, and of the country, and to see if the constitutions presented were republican. Never have we witnessed such an exhibition of specialities and technicalities as in this case of Kansas. Sir, the records of both Houses of Congress, and the archives of the executive department will bear to all future time evidences of what Mr. Madison called "the little ill-timed scruples, and the zeal for adhering to ordinary forms under the masks of which" the rights of the people have been sacrificed and their will baffled. The people of that Territory have been stigmatized in official papers, and in both Houses of Congress, as "rebels" and "revolutionists" and "traitors," for exercising the clearest rights of American citizens. The Congress of the United States is not the place for these exhibitions of the little technicalities and specialities of third-rate county courts.

Senators gravely insist upon the most rigid adherence to the forms of law, when they know that the transcendent and precious rights of the people have been, and will be, sacrificed by adherence to forms. They boldly deny established historical facts, because these facts are not officially proven; and they will not allow them to be officially established. Fraud taints everything—all legal proceedings and contracts, even the marriage contract; everything except this Lecompton constitution, and fraud seems to sanctify this deformed monstrosity. Sir, there is not a Senator here, there is not an intelligent man in America who does not know that this Lecompton constitution is not sustained by the people of Kansas. There is not an intelligent man in America who does not know that this constitution is tainted and vitiated by frauds and by violence. The evidence of this is as conclusive as is the evidence that the armies of England, France, and Russia met at Sebastopol; that the light brigade charged at Balaklava; that the Redan and Malakoff were stormed. The acts of violence and fraud in Kansas are matters of history, proved by congressional investigation; by the evidence of Governors Reeder, Geary, Walker, and Stanton; by legislative inquiry, and by the admission of the actors themselves; yet these Halls witness the boldest denials of the clearest established facts, and the most reckless disregard of the will, the ascertained wishes of the people. Sir, this course is unworthy of the Senate, and dishonorable to the country.

I have read, Mr. President, with care, the reports of members of the Committee on Territories. The reports of the venerable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] present the issues involved in the clearest light. The report made by the majority of the committee, by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] is a specimen of skillful and adroit misrepresentation. I have read it with mingled emotions of astonishment, shame, and indignation. Sir, the rhetoricians tell us that nothing is beautiful which is not true. If the absence of truth is the absence of beauty, this must indeed be the most hideous production of our times, for there is hardly a sentence in it that presents a truthful idea of the points at issue. Sir, it was my purpose to have examined this report in the light of the truths of history; but I shall forego that labor, now rendered needless by the full and masterly presentation of facts by other Senators, especially by the distinguished Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] and Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] whose lofty scorn of fraud and trickery will be applauded by hundreds of thousands of fair-minded men all over the Union.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] came to this Chamber one of the acknowledged champions of the expansion, perpetuity, and dominion of slavery in America. His election to this body was heralded as the advent of a champion and leader into the national councils, by the perpetualists and propagandists. The Senator, thus heralded, hastened to mingle in the debate. He spoke, not to enlighten the Senate or instruct the country, for he confessed he had not read the details of the transactions in Kansas, the knowledge of which is essential to an intelligent understanding of the questions at issue. The Senator spoke to display before the country the beauties of that system of human bondage, to which his State has clung with relentless tenacity, a system he has ever defended, and to magnify the power of his section to rule the world, under her legitimate monarch, "King Cotton." Sir, the Senator from South Carolina frankly tells us that "if this were a minority constitution, that it would be no objection; that constitutions are made for minorities, and that, perhaps, minorities ought to have the right to make constitutions." When we remember that the Senator represents a State which bases her representation upon inequalities of population, requires a property qualification for her legislators and denies to her people the right to vote for Governor or President, and that the Senator has indorsed, without reserve, the sentiment of Governor McDuffie that "slavery is the corner-stone of the Republican edifice," and "repudiates as ridiculously absurd, that much lauded, but nowhere accredited motto of Mr. Jefferson, that all men are created equal," we shall not be surprised at this distrust of the people, this avowal of this aristocratic, autocratic, and oligarchic sentiment.

But the Senator from South Carolina, after confessing his ignorance of the events which have produced this Lecompton constitution, does not allow his admitted want of knowledge to restrain him from the expression of the opinion that "if there were frauds, they were equally great on all sides." We should be charitable to confessed ignorance, but we are not required to be charitable to the presumptuous expression of opinions based upon confessed ignorance. The Senator talks about "regiments of emigrants recruited in the purlieus of the great cities of the North, and sent out armed with Sharpe's rifles and bowie knives and revolvers, to conquer freedom for Kansas!" Sir, had the Senator deigned to study, or rather, had the Senator studied as a Senator should have done, the details of the history of Kansas, he would never have given utterance to such language. The Senator goes on to charge the people of Kansas with "refraining from going to the polls, and making it a free State, when they had the power, in order to defeat and destroy the Democratic party." This absurd declaration has no foundation in fact, and every intelligent man in America who understands the affairs of Kansas, and whose opinions are of any value, knows this to be so. Equally absurd is the declaration, that Senators on this side of the Chamber "do not wish to defeat this bill," that we have "brought this imbroglio for the very purpose" of crushing "out the Democratic party in the North." These charges and insinuations will have little weight among men who have any knowledge of the facts, perhaps they may serve further to mislead those who have already been misled.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Wilson.

SENATE.

But the Senator tells us, Mr. President, that "the object of the discussion" on this side of the Chamber "is to agitate the question of slavery," and he authoritatively announces to us that the time has gone by to discuss this question of slavery in the abstract; and he declares that "it should be, and must be, discussed as a practical thing—as a thing that is, and is to be"—an "ineradicable thing." Assuming that slavery "is to be ineradicable," he is ready for a "final and conclusive settlement now;" and he "brings the North and the South face to face" to see what "resources each have in the contingency of separate organization!"

After referring, Mr. President, to the eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles of territory in the South; to its fine soil and delightful climate; to the control of the great valley of the Mississippi, the seat of future empire which she will maintain forever, the Senator boasts that "they have on their muster-rolls a million of men," "men brought up on horseback, with guns in their hands," and that "in an emergency every one of them would be available." Sir, this idle boast is simply ridiculous. It will excite a smile everywhere among people who have any adequate conception of what is necessary to embody and support, even for a few months, a large military force. This jubilant boast reminds me of the brilliant conception of "lengthening their bayonets one foot," ascribed to Governor McDuffie, at the time when South Carolina was big with nullification; when we New England Yankees were casting cannon, making swords, and even military buttons to gild the uniform of the chivalry who were strutting after the banners of disunion.

Having, Mr. President, vaunted their prowess and military resources, the Senator turns to the exports of the South, and he asserts that the wealth of a nation depends entirely upon its surplus export productions. If the theory that the foreign exports of a nation are the measure of the productive wealth of a nation be true, the South ought to be a very rich country—far more wealthy than the North. If it be true, the nation now in possession of $9,700,000,000 ought to be poor indeed, for, since the adoption of the Constitution, we have imported more than we have exported by $800,000,000. If we credit the Senator's proud vauntings of the surplus exports of the South, we must believe she is the seat of commercial power, of accumulated capital, of railroads, of ships; the section to which you can look for surplus capital, to which the Government now looks for the purchase of its twenty millions of Treasury notes. Sir, the South may export her millions of dollars of cotton, rice, and tobacco, year after year, and she may do so at a loss of millions annually. She may import from the East and from the West, as she often has done, millions more than she receives for her exports. Every merchant and business man in America knows this to be so.

Sir, the Senator from South Carolina assures us that "the South is perfectly competent to go on one, two, or three years, without planting a seed of cotton!" The South, with millions invested in lands and in slaves, able to stop planting cotton for three years! Sir, they can only stop by ceasing to fulfill their obligations, and by sacrificing in one year, in the value of lands and slaves, more than the value of three cotton crops. How many of the cotton-growers could cease even for one year, and keep the sheriff from their doors? The slave States owe to the free States this day more than the value of the cotton crop now being planted. They owe millions upon millions to the free States for merchandise, to say nothing of the sums owed for lands, railroads, and other investments. Sir, the South has seen few days, for a quarter of a century, when she was not indebted to the free States to the value of at least one cotton crop; yet the Senator vauntingly tells us that they have "poured in upon us one million six hundred thousand bales of cotton just at this crisis, to save us from destruction;" that they have, owing to the bursting of our bubbles at the North, sacrificed thirty-five millions, which they "have put into the charity box of our financiers!" Do our financiers owe you for your crop? Did not your crop come at the "crisis" to pay, in part, your own debts?

Sir, instead of putting millions into the charity box of our merchants and manufacturers, I tell the Senator that thousands of merchants, manufacturers, and mechanics of the North are this day, and have been for months, pressed with the burden of bearing the unpaid debts owed them by the slave States. Your cotton has been paid for at the market value in cash; the balance of your crop, not yet delivered, has been paid for; send it promptly forward, and thus keep that faith of which you boast so much. Does not the Senator know that millions of merchandise purchased one year ago on long credits—for you sell for cash and buy on long credits—have been renewed, and remain yet unpaid? while the bills for tens of millions of last fall's purchases have not yet matured? while your merchants are now in the market purchasing on credit, thus, in many cases, making three bills for unpaid goods? I remember that during the terrible pressure of last year, while our business men were staggering under the pressure, thirteen out of fourteen wholesale merchants in one department of business in one southern city imposed upon their eastern creditors the burden of renewing their matured notes. Sir, I tell the vaunting Senator from South Carolina that we of the North buy the cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco of the South, for gold, and sell you goods on six, eight, twelve, and fifteen months' credit; and that these long credits are often renewed, and frequently never paid at all. The merchants and manufacturers of the North have lost hundreds of millions of dollars during the last thirty years in the slave States. I have personally lost, in the Senator's own State, in Louisiana, Virginia, and Kentucky, thousands of dollars more than I am now able to command.

But the Senator, filled with magnificent visions of southern power, crowns cotton, "king," and tells us that if they should stop supplying cotton for three years, "England would topple headlong, and carry the whole civilized world with her save the South!" What presumption! The South—which owns lands and slaves, the price fluctuating with the production, use, and price of cotton, having no other resource or means of support—would go harmless; while the great commercial centers of the world, with the vast accumulations of capital, the products of ages of accumulation, with varied pursuits and skilled industry, would "topple" to their fall! Sir, I suppose the coffee planters of Brazil, the tea growers of the Celestial Empire, and the wheat growers on the shores of the Black sea, and on the banks of the Don and the Volga, indulge in the same magnificent illusions. I would remind the Senator that the commercial world is not governed by the cotton planters of the South, the coffee planters of Brazil, the tea growers of China, nor the wheat producers of eastern Europe. I tell the Senator that England, France, Germany, western Europe, and the northern States of the Union, are the commercial, manufacturing, business, and monetary centers of the world; that their merchants, manufacturers, and capitalists grasp the globe; that cotton and sugar and tea and coffee and wheat and the spices of the isles of the Oriental seas are grown for them. Sir, the cotton planters of the South are simply their agents, and they perform their tasks under a necessity quite as great as their own slaves perform theirs under the taskmaster's eye. I would remind the Senator that the free States, in 1850, produced $850,000,000 of manufactures, and that $52,000,000 of that vast production, only about one seventeenth part of it, was made up of cotton. Our manufactures and mechanic arts now must exceed twelve hundred million dollars, and cotton does not make up more than seventy million dollars. Does the Senator think the free States would "topple" down if they should lose one seventeenth part of their productive industry?

The productive industry of Massachusetts, a State that manufactures more than one third of all the cotton manufactured in the country, was, in 1855, $350,000,000; only $26,000,000, one thirtieth part of it, was cotton. Does the Senator believe that a State which has a productive industry of $350,000,000, about $280 per head for each person, would perish if she should lose $26,000,000 of that vast production?

It is no matter of surprise that gentlemen who live away off on cross-roads, where the cotton blooms, should come to believe that cotton rules the world; but a few month's association with the great world would cure that delusion. "You are our factors!" exclaims the Senator. "You bring and carry for us. Suppose we were to discharge you? Suppose we were to take our business out of your hands, we should consign you to anarchy and poverty!" Sir, suppose, when the Senator returns from this Chamber to his cotton-fields, his slaves should, in their simplicity, say to him: "Massa, you only sells de cotton; we plants; we hoos; we picks de cotton!" "Spose we discharge you, Massa!" The unsophisticated "mud-sills" would be quite as reasonable as is the Senator. The Senator seems to think that the cotton planters hold us in the hollow of their hands; if they shake them, we tremble; if they close them, we perish.

But the Senator from South Carolina, after crowning cotton as king, with power to bring England and all the civilized world "toppling" down into the yawning gulphs of bankruptcy and ruin, complacently tells the Senate and the trembling subjects of his cotton king that "the greatest strength of the South arises from the harmony of her political and social institutions;" that "her forms of society are the best in the world;" that "she has an extent of political freedom, combined with entire security, seen nowhere on earth." The South, he tells us, "is satisfied, harmonious, and prosperous," and he asks us if we "have heard that the ghosts of Mendoza and Torquemada are stalking in the streets of our great cities; that the inquisition is at hand, and that there are fearful rumors of consultations for vigilance committees?" Sir, this self-complacency is sublime! No son of the Celestial Empire can approach the Senator in self-complacency. That "society the best in the world" where more than three millions of beings, created in the image of God, are held as chattels—sunk from the lofty level of humanity; down to the abject condition of unreasoning beasts of burden! That "society the best in the world" where are manacles, chains, and whips, auction-blocks, prisons, bloodhounds, scourgings, lynchings, and burnings, laws to torture the body, shivel the mind, and debase the soul; where labor is dishonored and laborers despised! "Political freedom" in a land where woman is imprisoned for teaching little children to read God's Holy Word; where professors are deposed and banished for opposing the extension of slavery; where public men are exiled for quoting in a national convention the words of Jefferson; where voters are mobbed for appearing to vote for free territory; and where booksellers are driven from the country for selling a copy of that masterly work of genius, "Uncle Tom's Cabin!" A land of "certain security," where patrols, costing, as in old Virginia, more than is expended to educate her poor children, stalk the country to catch the faintest murmur of discontent; where the bay of the bloodhound never ceases; where but little more than one year ago rose the startling cries of insurrection; and where men, some of them owned by a member of this body, were scourged and murdered for suspected insurrection! "Political freedom" and "certain security" in a land which demands that seventeen millions of freemen shall stand guard to seize and carry back fleeing bondmen!

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina, with a charming simplicity, which reminds us of a distant plantation, away from the haunts of the busy world, where "unaspiring" bondmen delve, where the cotton blooms, with a frankness worthy of commendation, proceeds to unfold to the world the social ideas and political problems of that school of which he is an accepted teacher. He lays down axioms and maxims as the true social and political creed of slaveholding Lecompton Democracy. I invoke the men of the North, ay, the men of the South, the toiling millions of the Republic, to read and ponder well these doctrines proclaimed here in the Senate of this democratic Republic with such audacity, by one of the champions of the Lecompton constitution—one of the apostles of the Africanized Democracy. Listen to the oracular words of the Senator:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on this mud-sill. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand. A race inferior to her own, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for our purpose, and call them slaves."

"We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by 'ears polite'; I will not characterize that class at the North with that term; but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal."

"The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; all the powers of the earth cannot abolish that. God only can do it, when he repeals the fiat, 'the poor ye always have with you;' for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market, and take the best he can get for it: in short, your whole class of manual hiring laborers and 'operatives,' as you call them, are essentially slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life, and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated."

"Our slaves are black, of another and inferior race. The status in which we have picked them is an elevation."

"They are happy, content, unassuming, and utterly incapable, from intellectual weakness, ever to give any trouble by their aspiration. Yours are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than 'an army with banners,' and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your Government overthrown, your property divided?"

"By the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very heart's content. How would you like for us to send lecturers and agitators North, to teach these people this, to aid in combining and to lead them?"

These sentiments, Mr. President, are not original with the Senator from South Carolina. At home and within these walls the statesmen from South Carolina have avowed with sublime audacity these sentiments of the slave perpetualists. Mr. Calhoun pronounced "slavery the most safe and stable basis for free institutions in the world." Mr. McDuffee declared slavery to be "the cornerstone of the republican edifice!" Sir, when these avowals were made by these champions of the South Carolina school, they were disavowed by the leading men of the South, and by men of all parties in the North. Their reproduction now by the Senator from South Carolina derives importance from the fact that South Carolina has impressed her ideas and imposed her policy upon the South, upon the Administration, and upon the Lecompton Democracy. South Carolina bears the flag and leads the column of slave perpetualists and slave propagandists. The Senator utters her sentiments—the sentiments she has imposed upon the Democracy she now leads. I hold this Administration—I hold the Lecompton Democracy responsible for these oracular utterances.

South Carolina has ever led the van in support of the system of human slavery in America. The illustrious statesmen of the first Congress, in 1774, declared that "God never intended a part of the human race to hold property in, and have unbounded power over others;" and they agreed they "would not import slaves, or buy slaves imported by others." They formed a federative Union, and by the second article of that bond of Union the slave trade was prohibited. South Carolina accepted those articles of Confederation, and she was the first to break her pledged faith and to reopen that accursed traffic in the bodies of men. "In complacency to South Carolina and Georgia"—to use the words of Jefferson, the illustrious signers of the Declaration of Independence erased from the draft these words of arraignment of the British King:

"He has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating its most sacred rights of life and liberty, in the persons of a distant people, who have never offended him, captivating and carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel Powers, is the warfare of the Christian King of Great Britain. Determined to keep a market where men should be bought and sold, he has at length prostituted his negative for suppressing any legislative attempt to prohibit and restrain this execrable commerce."

Actuated by that policy, which reopened the slave trade, and erased the noble words of Jefferson from the Declaration of Independence, South Carolina went into the convention to form the Constitution of the United States, her Rutledges, her Butlers, and her Pinckneys ready to peril the unity of the States unless they could wring from Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, Madison, Ellsworth, King, and their illustrious compeers, the right to continue the inhuman and polluted traffic in the muscles of men.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. WILSON. Most cheerfully.

Mr. MASON. Is not the Senator aware that the proposition to allow the States to continue the slave trade for twenty years was carried by the union of the men of the extreme North and the extreme South, and that Virginia resisted it?

Mr. WILSON. I am aware that northern men yielded to the demands of South Carolina.

Mr. PUGH. A Massachusetts man shaped the form of the proposition!

Mr. WILSON. Northern men then, as now, too often yielded to the demands of slavery. We do not applaud the errors of the fathers. I hope we never will cease to censure the greater errors of the men of our time, who sin against the lights of experience.

In the first Congress under the Constitution, the humanity of the country attempted to restrain the slave trade in foreign vessels; but the voice of South Carolina, in fiery and vehement language, threatened to dissolve the Union, and the timid men of the North shrank from such a contest. From the opening of the first Congress under the Constitution to the utterance of this speech to which I am now replying, she has led the van in assaults on freedom—in defense of slavery. She led, under Mr. Pinckney, in 1836, in adopting a rule suppressing the sacred right to petition for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in this District. She led, under Mr. Calhoun, in 1836, in carrying through the Senate an incendiary publication bill, to destroy the constitutional liberty of the press. She announced, through the pen of Mr. Calhoun, in 1844, to the Throne of France, and to Christian Europe, that we intended to annex the Republic of Texas, to uphold slavery in America. She announced in this Chamber, by the voice of Mr. Calhoun, that the constitution would carry slavery into the coming free territory of Mexico. Inflexibly firm in adherence to her ideas, and bold and vehement in the avowal and support of her cherished policy of slavery expansion, perpetuity, and dominion, she has won her sister slaveholding States to her ideas and her policy. The moderate, conservative, and national statesmen of the South, of the schools of Jackson and Clay, have been driven into retirement—they are ostracised, exiled, placed under the ban of the empire. The venerable and distinguished Senators from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] and Tennessee [Mr. BELL] yet linger here to remind us of other days; and a few liberal national men remain in the other House; but these seats are now filled by men who have accepted her creed, or who silently bow to the imperious sway of her disciples. The social and political ideas of the fathers are proscribed, and the social and political ideas reproduced by the Senator from South Carolina have attained a complete ascendancy.

We all remember—for who could forget?—the assaults in 1856 of the southern Democratic orators upon everything free in America. "Slavery" was pronounced "the natural and normal condition of the laboring man, white or black!" "The experience of universal liberty" was pronounced by the Richmond Enquirer "a failure," and "free society insufferable!" "Free society" was denounced by a Democratic organ in Alabama, "a conglomeration of greasy mechanics, filthy operatives, and small-fisted farmers!" And the South-Side Democrat, edited by a gentleman now one of the Public Printers for the House, denounced as hateful "free farms, free labor, free society, free will, free thinking, free children, free schools"—they all belonged "to the same brood of damnable isms!"

Sir, these social and political ideas, now reproduced by the Senator from South Carolina, go unrebutted in these Halls by the supporters of this Administration. No Democratic Senator, no supporter of the policy of the Administration, has yet questioned the assumptions, or dissented from the views of the Senator. The supporters of the Lecompton constitution from Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, and California, have not ventured to even dissent from the doctrines avowed by the Senator from South Carolina—doctrines which would not pass unrebutted on the banks of the Danube or the Vistula. I mean to examine these assumptions in the light of facts. I mean to take issue with these unsupported declarations, and I mean to brand these wanton insults to the free laboring men of the country.

To listen, Mr. President, to the words of the Senator from South Carolina, we should suppose that the white men of the South were all men of wealth and culture and refinement—that they were all lords and masters—that labor was all performed by bondmen—the "mud-sills" of society. We should imagine that these white men "were leading progress, civilization, and refinement." We should imagine that the sunny South was the seat of power, the chosen abode of commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts; of literature and the finer arts; of schools and libraries! We should also imagine that the free North was the home of ignorance, poverty, and vice, and organized anarchy.

Sir, the Senator has placed the North and the South, the free and the slave States, freedom and slavery, "face to face." I meet him on that issue: I make no assault; I make no war upon the South. This contest, which now stirs the nation to its profoundest depths, is no contest between the North and the South. It is a contest between the rights of man and the privileges of an aristocratic, oligarchic class.

Mr. President, the Senator points triumphantly to eight hundred and fifty thousand square miles of slave soil; to the finest natural soil and the most genial climate. We of the North confess to your extent of territory, your naturally fine soil, and your genial climate. We make no claim to equality of extent, of climate, or of soil. When the foot of civilized man first pressed the sods of the New World, your section abounded in soil so rich it seemed exhaustless; ours was hard, cold, and rugged. Freedom took the rugged soil and still more rugged clime of the North, and now that rugged soil yields abundance to the willing hands of free labor. Slavery took the sunny lands and sunny clime of the South, and now it has left the traces of its ruinous power deeply furrowed on the face of your sunny land. In 1612, before the foot of the bondman had pressed the soil of Virginia, Sir Thomas Dale, in speaking of that Commonwealth, said:

"Take four of the best kingdoms of Christendom, and put them altogether, they may no way compare with this country either for commodities or goodness of soil."

At an earlier period, Lane, Governor of Raleigh colony, says of Virginia and Carolina:

"It is the goodliest soil under the cope of heaven—the most pleasing territory in the world."

Says "A Perfect Description of Virginia," published in London in 1649:

"New England is to Virginia as Scotland is to England. There is much cold, frost, and snow; their land is barren; except a herring be put into the hole you set the corn in, it will not come up."

Two hundred years have passed since those words were penned, and we do not now "put a herring in the hole we set the corn in," on our barren soil, yet it comes up. Millions of the acres of "the goodliest soil under the cope of heaven" in old Virginia are now so poor, that "a herring put in the hole they set the corn in" would not bring it up.

Washington, in a letter to Arthur Young, in 1787, says:

"Our lands, as I mentioned to you, were originally very good; but use and abuse have made them quite otherwise."

James Madison tells us, in 1819, that much of the rich soil of Virginia had been exhausted. Governor Wise said of the agriculture of Virginia, in 1855:

"You all own plenty of land; but it is poverty added to poverty, poor land added to poor land; and nothing added to nothing makes nothing." "You have the owners skinning the negroes, and the negroes skinning the land, and all grow poor together. You have relied alone on the power of agriculture; and such agriculture! Your sedge-patches outshine the sun; your inattention to your only source of wealth has scared the bosom of mother earth. Instead of having to feed cattle on a thousand hills, you have to chase the stump-tailed steer through the sedge-patches to procure a tough beef-steak."

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Wilson.

SENATE.

Mr. G. S. Sullivan, of Lincoln county, North Carolina, says, in the Patent Office report for 1851:

"We raise no stock of any kind, except for home consumption, and not half enough for that; for we have now worn out our lands so much that we do not grow food enough to maintain them."

Mr. N. B. Powell, of Alabama, in the Patent Office report for the same year, says:

"We are the most dependent people in the Union, relying mainly, as we do, upon our neighbors of the West for nearly all of our supplies."

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] has described, in sad accents, the desolation of portions of his own native State. In traversing his own native county of Madison, the Senator says:

"One will discover numerous farm-houses, once the abodes of industrious and intelligent freemen, now occupied by slaves, or tenantless, deserted, and dilapidated; he will observe fields once fertile, now unenclosed, abandoned, and covered with those evil harbingers, fox-tail and broom-sedge; he will see the moss growing on the moldering walls of once thrifty villages; and will find 'one only master grasps the whole domain' that once furnished happy homes for a dozen white families. Indeed, a county in its infancy, where, fifty years ago, scarce a forest tree had been felled by the ax of the pioneer, is already exhibiting the painful signs of senility and decay apparent in Virginia and the Carolinas: the freshness of its agricultural glory is gone; the vigor of its youth is extinct, and the spirit of desolation seems brooding over it."

The Senator from Alabama is devoted to his native State, of whose condition he thus sorrowfully speaks. Yesterday, he went even to the verge of disunion, in favor of the expansion of slavery to "virgin lands," which it will "despoil" and impoverish, as it has despoiled and impoverished the State he represents.

"The lands of South Carolina," (we are told by 'A Carolinian' in De Bow's Review,) 'have remained stationary in price for the last thirty years, and in many instances they have actually declined.' 'Our old fields,' (says the South Carolina Agricultural Society in 1855,) 'are enlarging; our homesteads are decreasing fearfully.'"

Judge Longstreet, a native of Georgia, refers to a classic dwelling which occupied a lovely spot in one of the most fertile regions of his native State. It was overshadowed by majestic hickories, towering poplars, and strong-armed oaks. Forty-two years afterwards, he visited this spot once so lovely:

"The sun poured his whole strength upon the bold hill which once supported the sequestered school-house; a dying willow rose from the soil which had nourished the venerable beech; flocks wandered among dwarf pines, and cropped a scanty meal from the vale where the rich cane had bowed and rustled to every breeze; and all around was barren, dreary, and cheerless."

De Bow's "Resources of the South," from Fenno's Southern Medical Reports, speaks of "decaying old tenements;" in Georgia, "red old hills, stripped of their native growth and virgin soil, and washed into deep gullies, with here and there patches of Bermuda grass and stunted pine shrubs struggling for subsistence on what was once the richest soil of America." Millions of acres of the richest soil of the western world have been converted into barrenness and desolation by the untutored, unpaid, and thriftless labor of slaves. This exhaustion of southern soil, tilted by bondmen—this deterioration, decay, and desolation, now visible in what was once the fairest portion of the continent—stands confessed by the most eminent writers of the South. These descriptions of the decay and desolation of some of the fairest portions of the sunny South, remind us of the desolating effects of slavery upon the rich fields of classic Italy, in the days of Tiberius Gracchus, as described by the brilliant and philosophic pen of our Bancroft, in his masterly article on Roman slavery.

Turning, Mr. President, from this contemplation of the desolations of slavery to the rugged soil and still more rugged clime of the free North, we shall see that the farms tilled by free, educated men, are annually blooming with a fresher and richer verdure; that they annually wave with larger harvests of the varied products which find markets in the cities and the villages, which commerce, manufactures, and the mechanic arts, create, beautify, and adorn. While the plantations of the South echo the sound of the lash by which unpaid toil is impelled on in the blighting process of exhausting the richest soils, the farms of the free States are increasing in value, fertility, and beauty; they are nursing a race of noble and independent men, where —"the lowliest farm-house hearth is graced

With manly hearts, in piety sincere;
Faithful in love; in honor stern and chaste;
In friendship warm and true; in danger brave;
Beloved in life, and sainted in the grave."

There were, Mr. President, in 1850, in the free States, 877,000 farms, containing 108,000,000 acres, valued at $2,143,000,000; being about $20 per acre. The products of these farms amounted to more than $860,000,000. There were, in the slave States, 564,000 farms, containing 180,000,000 acres, valued at $1,117,000,000, being about $6 per acre; and the products of these plantations amounted to about $630,000,000. The farms of the free States averaged 120 acres; the slave-State plantations averaged more than 300 acres. The 34,000 farms of cold, sterile Massachusetts, averaging 99 acres each, embrace 3,500,000 acres, valued at $32 50 per acre, amounting to $112,000,000; the 30,000 plantations of South Carolina, averaging 540 acres each, embrace 16,000,000 of acres, valued at $5 08 per acre, amounting to $82,000,000. The farms of the free States are cultivated by 2,500,000 persons, and yield a production of nearly $8 per acre, and more than $300 per head to each person; the plantations of the slave States are tilled by more than 3,250,000 persons, and they yield a production of less than $4 per acre, and less than $200 per head to each person.

Turning, Mr. President, from the agriculture of the two sections, let us glance at the manufactures. Here the superiority of the North stands confessed. In 1850, the North had 94,000 establishments; $430,000,000 of capital invested; $465,000,000 of raw material were used; 780,000 persons were employed; $196,000,000 were paid for labor; and $842,000,000 were produced. The South had only 27,000 establishments; $95,000,000 of capital; used $86,000,000 of raw material; employed 161,000 persons; paid $33,000,000 for labor; and produced $165,000,000. Massachusetts had 8,300 establishments; $83,000,000 of capital; used $86,000,000 of raw material; employed 165,000 persons; paid $40,000,000 for labor; and produced $151,000,000. South Carolina had only 1,400 establishments; $7,000,000 capital; used $4,900,000 of raw material; employed 12,000 persons; paid $2,300,000 for labor; and produced $9,700,000. The wages of women are higher in the cotton-mills of Massachusetts than the wages of men in the iron works of South Carolina. The productive industry of Massachusetts, in manufactures and the mechanic arts, have increased immensely since 1850. It now averages $280 per head; the productive industry of South Carolina, according to De Bow, is $62 per head.

De Bow estimates, Mr. President, that one half of the agricultural products, and all of the manufactures, are subjects of commerce. If this be so, the value of the products which enter into the commerce of the North is about fourteen hundred million of dollars; value of products of the South, $480,000,000. The value of the domestic commerce of the country is estimated to be six times larger than the value of the foreign commerce. The imports and exports of the North amounted in 1855 to $400,000,000; the exports and imports of the South to $132,000,000. The imports and exports of the city of New York amounted to $278,000,000—more than twice the value of the imports and exports of the South. Massachusetts exported and imported in 1855, $73,000,000; South Carolina, $14,000,000. The North had in 1850 188,000 persons engaged in commerce; the South, 70,000.

Glancing at the means of transportation, we find that the North had, in 1855, 4,250,000 tons of shipping, valued at $212,000,000; the South, 855,000 tons of shipping, valued at $42,000,000. The North built 528,000 tons in 1855; the South built 52,000. Massachusetts had, in that year, 970,000 tons of shipping, valued at $48,000,000; South Carolina had 60,000 tons, valued at $3,000,000. Massachusetts built 80,000 tons, valued at $4,000,000; South Carolina built 60 tons, valued at $3,000. The North has 18,000 miles of railroads, costing $560,000,000; the South 7,000, costing $125,000,000. Poor Massachusetts, that produces no rice, makes up no part of "king" cotton, has $55,000,000 invested in railroads within her own borders, to say nothing of the many millions she has invested in other States. She has $60,000,000 of bank capital, and her poor "white slaves," her "mud-sills," have $35,000,000 deposited in her savings banks. Rich South Carolina, with her rice and her cotton, has invested $12,000,000 in railroads; she has $17,000,000 of bank capital; but, unhappily, we have no statements of how many millions her "well-compensated," "unaspiring" laborers have on deposit. Perhaps the Senator from South Carolina can furnish us with those statistics.

From this contrast of the productive industry and material resources of the two sections, which the Senator from South Carolina put "face to face," I pass to a brief consideration of their institutions and means of intellectual culture. In the slave States, laws forbid the education of nearly four millions of her people; in the free States, laws encourage the education of the people, and public opinion upholds and enforces those laws. In 1850, there were 62,000 schools, 72,000 teachers, 2,800,000 scholars in the public schools of the free States; in the slave States, there were 18,000 schools, 19,000 teachers, and 580,000 scholars. Massachusetts has nearly 200,000 scholars in her public schools, at a cost of $1,300,000; South Carolina has 17,000 scholars in her public schools; $75,000 is paid by the State, and the Governor in 1853, said that "under the present mode of applying it, it was the profusion of the prodigal rather than the judicious generosity which confers real benefits." New York has more scholars in her public schools than all the slave States together. Ohio has 502,000 scholars in her public schools, supported at an expense of $2,250,000. Kentucky has 76,000 scholars, supported at an expense of $146,000.

The free States had, in 1850, more than 15,000 libraries, containing 4,000,000 volumes; the slave States had 700 libraries, containing 650,000 volumes. Massachusetts, the land of "hiring operatives," has 1,800 libraries, which contain not less than 750,000 volumes—more libraries and volumes than all the slave States combined. The little State of Rhode Island, a mere patch of 1,300 square miles on the surface of New England, has more volumes in her libraries than have the five great States of Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana. De Bow, good southern authority, says, that in every country the press must be regarded as a great educational agency. The free States had, in 1850, 1,800 newspapers, with a circulation of 335,000,000; the slave States had, at that time, 700 newspapers, with a circulation of 81,000,000. The free States have seven times as many religious papers, and twelve times as many scientific papers as the South. Massachusetts has more religious papers than all the slaveholding States of the Union. She has a circulation of 2,000,000 for her scientific papers; the South has but 372,000. The "hiring operatives, mechanics, and laborers;" the very "mud-sills" of society, read five times as many copies of scientific papers as the entire South, including that class which the Senator tells us leads "progress, civilization, and refinement." Nine tenths of the book publishers of the United States are in the free States. The Charleston Standard, good authority with the Senator, tells us, "that their pictures are painted at the North, their books published at the North, their periodicals printed at the North; that should a man rise with the genius of Shakespeare, or Dickens, or Fielding, or of all three combined, and speak from the South, he would not receive enough to pay the cost of publication." That class, that favored class, which leads, as the Senator tells us, "progress, civilization, and refinement," force the literary talent to the North, the home of "hiring operatives," to find not only publishers, but readers also.

Of the authors mentioned in Duyckinck's "Cyclopedia of American Literature," eighty-seven were natives of slave States, and four hundred and three were natives of the free North—the land of the "hiring laborers." Of the poets mentioned in Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America," seventeen were natives of the land where they have that other class which leads "progress, civilization, and refinement;" and one hundred and twenty-three were natives of the land of hireling operatives, the "mud-sills" of society. Of the poets, whose nativity is given by Mr. Reed, in his "Female Poets of America," eleven are from the South, seventy-three from the North. Nine tenths of all the books written in America, fit to be read—nine tenths of all the books published in America, fit to be published—are written and published, not in the land of that privileged class of which the Senator boasts, but in the free States, unblest by that privileged class; nearly all the authors, whose names grace and adorn the rising literature of America, whose names are known in the literary and scientific world, find their homes in the free States of the North. Irving, Ticknor, Sparks, Bancroft, Prescott, Hil-dreth, and Motley, whose contributions to the historical literature of America are recognized by the literary world; Dana, Bryant, Halleck, Long-fellow, Sprague, Whittier, Lowell, and Willis, the recognized poets of our country; Hawthorne, Emerson, Curtis, Melville, and Mitchell, whose names grace the light literature of our times; and Silliman, Agassiz, and Pierce, names associated with American science, find their homes, not in the land of the privileged class that the Senator from South Carolina tells us leads "progress, civilization, and refinement," but they dwell in the land of "small-fisted farmers, greasy mechanics, and filthy operatives"—the "mud-sills" of society. The sculptors, and the painters, and the artists—they, too, find their homes, not in the sunny South, but in the free land of the North. In literature, in science, in the arts, the superiority of the North is beyond all question. Men who have been, or who now are, "hiring laborers" in some forms in the North, have contributed more to the arts, the science, the literature of America, than the whole class of slaveholders now living in the South.

I would not, Mr. President, underate the influence of the slave States in the councils of the Republic. Bound together by the cohesive attraction of a vast interest from which the civilization of the age averts its face, the privileged class have won the control, and direct the policy of the Government. In the council and in the field, the representatives of this privileged class have assumed to direct and to guide. But in accumulated capital, in commerce, in manufactures, in the mechanic arts, in educational institutions, in literature, in science, in the arts, in the charities of religion and humanity, in all the means by which the nation is known among men, the free States maintain a position of unquestioned preeminence. In all these, the South is a mere dependency of the North. India and Australia are not more the dependencies of England than are the slaveholding States the dependencies of the free States. Sir, your fifteen slave States are but fifteen suburban wards of our great commercial city of New York. Beyond the political field, this dependency of the South is every where visible, even to the most blind devotees of "King Cotton." Mr. Perry, in an address before the South Carolina Institute in 1856, says of the State represented by the Senator:

"The dependence of South Carolina upon the northern States, for all the necessities, comforts, and luxuries which the mechanic arts afford, has drained her of her wealth and made her positively poor."

Mr. Helper, of North Carolina, in a work entitled "The Impending Crisis of the South," describes, in this graphic language, this humiliating dependency of the South upon the North:

"In infancy we are swaddled in northern muslin; in childhood we are humored by northern gewgaws; in youth we are instructed out of northern books; in old age we are drugged with northern physic; and when we die, our inanimate bodies, shrouded in northern cambric, are stretched upon the bier, borne to the grave in a northern carriage, interred with a northern spade, and memorialized with a northern slab!"

"Reader! would you understand how abjectly slaveholders themselves are enslaved to the products of northern industry? If you would, fix your mind on a southern gentleman, a slave breeder, and human flesh monger, who professes to be a Christian! Observe the routine of his daily life. See him rise in the morning from a northern bed, and clothe himself in northern apparel; see him walk across the floor on a northern carpet, and perform his ablutions out of a northern basin and ewer. See him uncover a box of northern powder, and cleanse his teeth with a northern brush; see him reflect his physiognomy in a northern mirror, and arrange his hair with a northern comb. See him dosing himself with the medicaments of northern quacks, and perfuming his handkerchief with northern cologne. See him referring to the time in a northern watch, and glancing at the news in a northern gazette. See him and his family sitting in northern chairs, and singing and praying out of northern books. See him at the breakfast table saying grace over a northern plate, eating with northern cutlery, and drinking from northern utensils. See him charmed with the melody of a northern piano, or musing over the pages of a northern novel. See him riding to his neighbor's in a northern carriage, or furrowing his lands with a northern plow. See him lighting his cigar with a northern match, and flogging his negroes with a northern lash. See him with northern pen and ink, writing letters on northern paper, and sending them away in northern envelopes, sealed with northern wax, and impressed with a northern seal."

Passing, Mr. President, from the consideration of these startling contrasts between the effects of intelligent free labor on the North, and unskilled slave labor on the South, I proceed to the contemplation of the blighting and crushing effects of slavery, not upon the poor bondmen, but upon the non-slaveholding poor whites of the South. Putting out of view altogether the sad lot of nearly four millions of hapless bondsmen, doomed to a destiny so rayless, so cheerless, so hopeless, that the Senator from South Carolina vauntingly tells us that they are "uninspiring," and will never give any "trouble to us by their aspirations," I here and now declare that the five millions of non-slaveholding whites of the South live in meaner houses, consume poorer food, wear poorer clothes, have less means of mental and moral instruction, less culture, and less hope for the future for themselves and their posterity, than the five millions of the poorest people of the seventeen millions of the North. I include, sir, in this declaration the millions of emigrants from western Europe, from the banks of the Thames, the Shannon, and the Rhine—men characterized by the Senator from South Carolina as "semi-barbarians." I will demonstrate the truth of this declaration by abundant quotations from southern authorities.

The first witness I put upon the stand is the honorable Senator from South Carolina himself. In an address before the South Carolina Institute, the Senator said that "Of the three hundred thousand white inhabitants of South Carolina, there are fifty thousand whose industry, such as it is, and compensated as it is, is not adequate to procure them honestly such a support as every white person is entitled to. Some of them maintain a feeble and injurious competition with slave labor; some can scarcely be said to work at all; they obtain a precarious subsistence by occasional jobs, by hunting, by fishing, sometimes by plundering fields or folds, and too often by what is, in its effects, far worse—trading with slaves, and seducing them to plunder for their benefit."

Comment, Mr. President, is needless.

William Gregg, in an address delivered before this same South Carolina Institute, in 1851, said:

"I put down the white people who ought to work, and who do not, or are so employed as to be wholly unproductive, at one hundred and twenty-five thousand." "A large portion of our poor white people are wholly neglected, and are suffered to while away an existence in a state but one step in advance of the Indian of the forest."

"Many a one is reared in proud South Carolina, from birth to manhood, who has never passed a month in which he has not been stunted for meat." "These may be startling statements, but they are nevertheless true."

When the Baron DeKalb met General Francis Marion, during the Revolution, he expressed amazement that so many "South Carolinians were running to take British protections." Marion replied:

"The people of Carolina form two classes, the rich and the poor. The poor are very poor: the rich, who have slaves to do all their work, give them no employment. Unsupported by the rich, they continue poor and low-spirited."

"The little they get is laid out in brandy, not in books and newspapers; hence they know nothing of the comparative blessings of our country, or of the dangers which threaten it; therefore, they care nothing about it. The rich are generally very rich; afraid to stir lest the British should burn their houses, and carry off their negroes."

After the war, he estimated that "poor Carolina lost through her ignorance $15,000,000," for "ignorance begat toriyism, and toriyism begat losses." Referring to the blessings of education for the people, he said:

"Look at the people of New England. Religion had taught them that God had created men to be happy; to be happy, they must have virtue; that virtue is not to be attained without knowledge; nor knowledge without instruction; nor public instruction without free schools; nor free schools without legislative order."

South Carolina has sent many of her sons into the councils of the nation who have won distinguished positions and high honors; but there is more philosophy, more wisdom, and more statesmanship, in these words of Francis Marion, than can be garnered up from all the eloquent utterances of the statesmen and orators she has sent into the councils of the Republic.

Mr. Olmstead, in his work on the "Sea-board Slave States," speaking of the educated Carolinians—that other class which, according to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, leads "progress, civilization, and refinement"—says that "they habitually make great claims" to culture.

"But I must observe, also, that I have been astonished at the profound ignorance and unmitigated stupidity I have found in some planters owning large numbers of slaves."

A southern-born gentleman, who had resided in South Carolina, and who had traveled in Spanish America, said to Mr. Olmstead, speaking of the Spanish and Hispano-Indian races, that he had "seen, among the worst of them, none so entirely debased, so wanting in all energy, industry, purpose of life, and in everything to be respected, as among extensive communities on the banks of the Congaree, in South Carolina."

"They are more ignorant, their superstitions are more degrading, they are much less industrious, far less cheerful and animated, and very much more incapable of being improved and elevated, than the most degraded peons of Mexico. Their chief sustenance is a porridge of cow-peas, and the greatest luxury with which they are acquainted is a stew of bacon and peas, with red pepper, which they call 'hopping John.'"

Speaking of the sand-hillers, Mr. Olmstead says that a rich rice planter described them in these words:

"They seldom have any meat, except they steal hogs, which belong to the planters or their negroes; and their chief diet is rice and milk. They are small, gaunt, and cadaverous, and their skin is just the color of the sand hills they live on. They are quite incapable of applying themselves to any labor, and their habits are very much like those of the old Indians."

A northern gentleman, who had spent a year in South Carolina, said to Mr. Olmstead, after speaking respectfully of the wealthier class:

"The poor whites, out in the country, are the meanest people I ever saw; half of them would be considered objects of charity in New York."

Speaking in favor of manufactures, the Hon. J. H. Lumpkin, of Georgia, in 1852, said:

"I am by no means ready to concede, that our poor, degraded, half-fed, half-clothed, and ignorant population, without Sabbath schools, or any other kind of instruction, mental or moral, or without any just appreciation of character, will be injured by giving them employment in manufacturing establishments."

Mr. Olmstead says:

"It is evident that a large part of the people of Georgia still have the vagrant and hopeless habits of Oglethorpe's first colonists, somewhat favorably modified, it is true, by the physical circumstances which have made them superior to absolute charity or legal crime, and also, perhaps, by the influence of a freely preached, though exceedingly degraded form of Christianity. They are still coarse and irrestrainable in appetite and temper; with perverted, eccentric, and intemperate spiritual impulses, faithless in the value of their own labor, and almost imbecile for personal elevation."

Mr. Tarver, of Missouri, in a work on "Domestic Manufactures in the South and West," says:

"I have observed of late years, that an evident deterioration is taking place in this part of the population, the younger portion of it being less educated, less industrious, and in every point of view less respectable than their ancestors."

Mr. Helper, of North Carolina, says:

"Poverty, ignorance, and superstition are the three leading characteristics of the non-slaveholding whites of the South."

The reports of ecclesiastical bodies in the South, of missionary, Bible, tract, educational, and other societies, and the statements of colporteurs, and other persons interested in the intellectual and moral culture of the people, furnish the fullest and amplest evidence to sustain the declarations I have made concerning the poor whites of the slaveholding States. Upon them the evils of slavery press with merciless force. I trust the day is not far distant when they will inaugurate a policy that shall at least emancipate themselves and their posterity from a thralldom hardly less endurable than the bondage of the black man. The noble city of St. Louis has sent into the House of Representatives FRANCIS P. BLAIR, junior, a champion of the rights of the non-slaveholders of the South. Let the oppressed poor whites heed the voice and follow the councils of such a leader, and the day of their deliverance from their galling degradation will soon dawn. There are signs that cannot be mistaken, in the North and in the South,

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Wilson.

SENATE.

that there are portions of the American continent, provinces in Mexico or Central America, where, ultimately, that slave population which presses hard upon the poor whites of the South may find free homes under the protection of the Government of the United States:

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina tells us that "all the powers of the world cannot abolish" "the thing" he calls slavery. "God only can do it when he repeals the fiat 'the poor ye have always with you,'" "for the man who lives by daily labor," and "your whole class of hiring manual laborers and operatives, are essentially slaves!" "Our slaves are black; happy, content, unaspiring;" "yours are white, and they feel galled by their degradation." "Our slaves do not vote; yours do vote, and, being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power; and if they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than an army with banners, and could combine, your society would be reconstructed, your government overthrown, and your property divided."

"The poor ye have always with you!" This fiat of Almighty God, which Christian men of all ages and lands have accepted as the imperative injunction of the common Father of all, to care for the children of misfortune and sorrow, the Senator from South Carolina accepts as the foundation-stone, the eternal law, of slavery, which "all the powers of the earth cannot abolish." These precious words of our Heavenly Father, "the poor ye have always with you," are perpetually sounding in the ears of mankind, ever reminding them of their dependence and their duties. These words appeal alike to the conscience and the heart of mankind. To men blessed in their basket and their store, they say, "property has its duties well as its rights!" To men clothed with authority to shape the policy or to administer the laws of the State, they say, "lighten, by wise, humane, and equal laws, the burdens of the toiling and dependent children of men!" To men of every age and every clime they appeal, by the Divine promise that "he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord!" Sir, I thank God that I live in a Commonwealth which sees no warrant in these words of inspiration to oppress the sons and daughters of toil and poverty. Over the poor and lowly she casts the broad shield of equal, just, and humane legislation. The poorest man that treads her soil, no matter what blood may run in his veins, is protected in his rights and incited to labor by no other force than the assurance that the fruits of his toil belong to himself, to the wife of his bosom, and the children of his love.

The Senator from South Carolina exclaims, "The man who lives by daily labor, your whole class of manual laborers, are essentially slaves"—"they feel galled by their degradation!" What a sentiment is this to hear uttered in the councils of this democratic Republic! The Senator's political associates who listen to these words which brand hundreds of thousands of the men they represent in the free States, and hundreds of their neighbors and personal friends as "slaves," have found no words to repel or rebuke this language. This language of scorn and contempt is addressed to Senators who were not nursed by a slave; whose lot it was to toil with their own hands—to eat bread earned, not by the sweat of another's brow, but by their own. Sir, I am the son of a "hiring manual laborer" who, with the frosts of seventy winters on his brow, "lives by daily labor." I, too, have "lived by daily labor." I, too, have been a "hiring manual laborer." Poverty cast its dark and chilling shadow over the home of my childhood, and want was there sometimes—an unbidden guest. At the age of ten years—to aid him who gave me being in keeping the gaunt specter from the hearth of the mother who bore me—I left the home of my boyhood, and went to earn my bread by "daily labor." Many a weary mile have I traveled "To beg a brother of the earth

To give me leave to toil."

Sir, I have toiled as a "hiring manual laborer" in the field and in the work-shop; and I tell the Senator from South Carolina that I never "felt galled by my degradation." No, sir—never! Perhaps the Senator who represents that "other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement," will ascribe this to obtuseness of intellect and blunted sensibilities of the heart. Sir, I was conscious of my manhood; I was the peer of my employer; I knew that the laws and institutions of my native and adopted States threw over him and over me alike the panoply of equality; I knew, too, that the world was before me, that its wealth, its garnered treasures of knowledge, its honors, the coveted prizes of life, were within the grasp of a brave heart and a tireless hand, and I accepted the responsibilities of my position all unconscious that I was a "slave." I have employed others, hundreds of "hiring manual laborers." Some of them then possessed, and now possess, more property than I ever owned; some of them were better educated than myself—yes, sir, better educated, and better read, too, than some Senators on this floor; and many of them, in moral excellence and purity of character, I could not but feel, were my superiors. I have occupied, Mr. President, for more than thirty years, the relation of employer and employed; and while I never felt "galled by my degradation" in the one case, in the other I was never conscious that my "hiring laborers" were my inferiors. That man is a "snob" who boasts of being a "hiring laborer," or who is ashamed of being a "hiring laborer;" that man is a "snob" who feels any inferiority to any man because he is a "hiring laborer," or who assumes any superiority over others because he is an employer. Honest labor is honorable; and the man who is ashamed that he is or was a "hiring laborer" has not manhood enough to "feel galled by his degradation."

Having occupied, Mr. President, the relation of either employed or employer for the third of a century; having lived in a Commonwealth where the "hiring class of manual laborers" are "the depositaries of political power;" having associated with this class in all the relations of life; I tell the Senator from South Carolina, and the class he represents, that he libels, grossly libels them, when he declares that they are "essentially slaves!" There can be found nowhere in America a class of men more proudly conscious or tenacious of their rights. Friends and foes have ever found them

"A stubborn race, fearing and flattering none."

But the Senator from South Carolina tells us that if the hiring laborers knew the "tremendous secret" of the ballot-box, our "society would be reconstructed, our Government overthrown, and our property divided." Does not the Senator know that an immense majority of the "hiring class of manual laborers" of New England possess property? Does he not know that the man who has accumulated a few hundreds of dollars by his own toil, by the savings of years, who has a family growing up around him upon which his hopes are centered, is a conservative? Does not the Senator know that he watches the appropriation bills in the meetings of those little democracies—the towns—as narrowly as the Representative from Tennessee, in the other House, [GEORGE W. JONES,] watches the money bills on the Private Calendar? I live, Mr. President, in a small town of five thousand inhabitants. Nearly half of the population are employed as operatives and mechanics for the manufacture of shoes for the western and southern markets. In 1840 we had thirteen hundred inhabitants, and the property valuation was about three hundred thousand dollars. Last May we had fourteen hundred names on our poll-list, two thirds of them "hiring mechanics," and a property valuation of over two millions of dollars. Those "hiring laborers," on town-meeting days, make the appropriations for schools, for roads, and for all other purposes. Do they not know "the tremendous secret of the ballot-box?" Have they proposed to divide the property they themselves created? No, sir; no! but I will tell the Senator what they have done. Since 1850, they have built seven new school-houses, with all the modern improvements, and at an expense of about forty thousand dollars, one house costing more than fourteen thousand; they have established a high school, where the most advanced scholars of the common schools are fitted for admission to the colleges, or for the professions, the business, and the duties of life; they have established a town library, freely accessible to all the inhabitants, containing the choicest works of authors of the Old World and the New, of ancient and modern times. The poorest "hiring manual laborer," without cost, can take from that library to his home the works of the master minds, and hold communion with "The dead but sceptered sovereigns who rule

Our spirits from their urns."

The Senator tells us, Mr. President, that their slaves are "well compensated!" South Carolina slaves "well compensated!" Why, sir, the Senator himself, in a speech made at home, for home consumption, entered into an estimate to show that a field hand could be supported for from "eighteen to nineteen dollars per annum" on the rice and cotton plantations. He states the quantity of corn and bacon and salt necessary to support the "well compensated" slave. And this man, supported by eighteen dollars per annum, with the privilege of being flogged at discretion, and having his wife and children sold from him at the necessity or will of his master, the Senator from South Carolina informs the Senate of the United States, is "well compensated!" Sir, there is not a poor-house in the free States where there would not be a rebellion in three days if the inmates were compelled to subsist on the quantity and quality of the food the Senator estimates as ample "compensation" for the labor of a slave in South Carolina.

Turning from his "well compensated" slaves, the Senator tells us that our "hiring laborers," our "mud-sills," are scantily "compensated." Mr. CLINGMAN, of North Carolina, in urging the establishment of cotton manufactories in the South, says the wages of labor at the North are one hundred per cent. higher than wages in the same pursuits in the South. The wages of labor in iron mills in South Carolina were thirteen dollars per month, in 1850; in Massachusetts they were thirty. Sir, these hands of mine have earned, month after month, two dollars per day, in manual labor; and I have paid that sum to "hiring manual laborers," month after month and year after year. Financial and commercial revulsions sometimes come upon us, and press heavily upon all branches of the mechanic arts and manufactures; but labor is generally well employed and well paid. At any rate, the laboring men of the free States have open to their industry all the avenues of agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the multifarious mechanic arts, where skilled labor is demanded, and where they do not have to maintain, as the Senator in his address before the Institute of his own State tells us the white men of South Carolina have to maintain, "a feeble and ruinous competition with the labor of slaves."

Borrowing, Mr. President, an idea, found in a speech made in the other House by Mr. Pickens, of his own State, more than twenty years ago, in which he threatened to preach insurrection to northern laborers, the Senator asks, "how we would like for them to send lecturers and agitators to teach our hiring laborers" the "tremendous secret of the power of the ballot-box," and "to aid in combining and to lead them?" Sir, I tell the Senator we would welcome him, his lecturers and agitators; we would bid them welcome to our hearth-stones and our altars. Ours are the institutions of freedom; and they flourish best in the storms and agitations of inquiry and free discussion. We are conscious that our social and political institutions have not attained perfection, and we invoke the examination and the criticism of the genius and learning of all Christendom. Should the Senator and his agitators and lecturers come to Massachusetts on a mission to teach our "hiring class of manual laborers," our "mud-sills," our "slaves," the "tremendous secret of the ballot-box," and to help "combine and lead them," these stigmatized "hiringlings" would reply to the Senator and his associates, "We are freemen; we are the peers of the gifted and the wealthy; we know the 'tremendous secret of the ballot-box,' and we mold and fashion these institutions that bless and adorn our proud and free Commonwealth! These public schools are ours, for the education of our children; these libraries, with their accumulated treasures, are ours; these multitudinous and varied pursuits of life, where intelligence and skill find their reward, are ours. Labor is here honored and respected, and great examples incite us to action. All around us in the professions, in the marts of commerce, on the exchange, where merchant-princes and capitalists do congregate; in these manufactories and workshops, where the products of every clime are fashioned into a thousand forms of utility and beauty; on these smiling farms, fertilized by the sweat of free labor; in every position of private and of public life, are our associates, who were but yesterday 'hiring laborers,' 'mud-sills,' 'slaves.' In every department of human effort are noble men who sprang from our ranks—men whose good deeds will be felt and will live in the grateful memories of men when the stones reared by the hands of affection to their honored names shall crumble into dust. Our eyes glisten and our hearts throb over the bright, glowing, and radiant pages of our history that records the deeds of patriotism of the sons of New England who sprang from our ranks and wore the badges of toil. While the names of Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, Nathaniel Greene, and Paul Revere live on the brightest pages of our history, the mechanics of Massachusetts and New England will never want illustrious examples to incite us to noble aspirations and noble deeds. Go home, say to your privileged class, which you vauntingly say 'leads progress, civilization, and refinement,' that it is the opinion of the 'hiring laborers' of Massachusetts, if you have no sympathy for your African bondmen, in whose veins flows so much of your own blood, you should at least sympathize with the millions of your own race, whose labor you have dishonored and degraded by slavery! You should teach your millions of poor and ignorant white men, so long oppressed by your policy, the 'tremendous secret that the ballot-box is stronger than an army with banners!' You should combine and lead them to the adoption of a policy which shall secure their own emancipation from a degrading thralldom!"

Mr. President, for four years the distant Territory of Kansas has been the battle-field between freedom and slavery—between free labor which elevates, and that servile labor which degrades. In this contest, slavery has startled the nation by a series of acts of violence, and by frauds you will scarcely find paralleled in the history of the world. These acts of violence, these frauds, perpetrated by the necessities of the slave power, upheld by the ready servility of the Democratic party, are now made the tests of fealty by the Administration. Fealty to the Administration, to the Democratic party, is now fealty to human slavery, to violence, to trickery, and to fraud. Sir, by perversions of the Constitution and the laws, by the red hand of violence, by unvailed trickeries and transparent frauds, by the indecent proscription of men of inflexible integrity, by the shameless prostitution of the honors of the Government, and by the "rank corruption, mining all within," which "infects unseen," the Administration is converting the American Democracy into a mere organization for the perpetuity, expansion, and domination of human slavery on the North American continent. There is not, to-day, in all Christendom a political organization so hostile to the rights of human nature, to the development of republican ideas, to the general progress of the human race, as the Democratic party of the United States. There is not a political organization even in Spain, Russia, or Austria, that dare, in the face of the civilized world, blazon its banners with doctrines so hostile to the rights of mankind, so abhorrent to humanity, as are avowed in these Halls, and upheld by the American Democracy, under the lead of this Administration. The great Powers of Europe, England, France, and Russia, have fixed their hungry eyes upon the coveted prizes of the Eastern World; and we are invoked to forget the lessons of Washington, to close our ears to the appeals of the people of Kansas, whose rights have been outraged, and turn our lustful eyes to the glittering prizes of dominion in Mexico, Central America, Cuba, and the valleys of the distant Amazon. No party in those three European monarchies dare avow, in the face of Christendom, the sentiment we have heard proclaimed in these Halls, that territorial expansion and territorial dominion must be made, not for the advancement of the sacred and sublime principle of equal and impartial liberty to all men, but for the subjugation and personal servitude of other and inferior races.

Duty to the Government now prostituted and polluted, to the country now dishonored in the face of the civilized world, summons the liberty-loving and patriotic men of the Republic, of every name and creed, to "forget, forgive, and unite," and to rally to the overthrow of this venal, cringing, and inglorious Administration, and to the utter annihilation of the oligarchic Democracy. To the men of the North, ay, and the men of the South, who loathe fraud, paltry trickery, venality, and servility; who believe that "righteousness exalteth a nation," this summons alike appeals. But to no men does this summons appeal with such irresistible and imperative force as to the "whole hiring class of manual laborers and operatives," now disdainfully stigmatized as the "slaves," the "very mud-sills" of that society upon which that privileged class assumes to rest, which now claims to control this Government, and "to lead progress, civilization, and refinement" in America. It appeals to them to repel the libelous aspersions cast upon the toiling millions of America, by taking, through the ballot-box, the reins of power from the grasp of the slaveholding aristocracy of the South and their servile allies of the North; rebuking the arrogance of the one by banishment from usurped power, and the servility of the other by putting upon their breast the "Scarlet Letter" of dishonor. It appeals to them to place in every department of the Federal Government, statesmen who cherish a profound reverence and an inextinguishable love for humanity; who are animated by lofty motives, aims, and purposes; guided by wise, comprehensive, and patriotic councils; and who will put the Republic in harmony with the sacred and inalienable rights of mankind.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, I design to submit some views on this question, and have been, for some time ready to do so. I doubt very much whether I can submit them now, before the approach of another day. I was disposed to suggest to the Senate, (and I have consulted with the Senator from Missouri upon the subject,) the propriety of adjourning until ten o'clock on Monday morning, at which time I shall be ready to proceed. I will submit that motion to the Senate.

Mr. GREEN. I will suggest, with the leave of the Senator, that we first make a motion that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at ten o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN. And then, if the Senator cannot proceed to-night, and no other Senator desires to proceed—

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Delaware desires to speak.

Mr. GREEN. If the Senator from Delaware could proceed to-night, I suppose the Senator from Michigan will have no objection to his doing so.

Mr. STUART. I am willing. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri to make his motion now.

Mr. GREEN. Then I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at ten o'clock on Monday next. Before we adjourn we can make this subject the special order for ten o'clock on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. TRUMBULL in the chair.) It is moved that when the Senate adjourns it be to ten o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN. We cannot make this bill the special order until Senators decline speaking to-night. If neither of the Senators is willing to proceed to night, I will make that motion.

Mr. STUART. I say very frankly that I should be perfectly willing to proceed, but for the fact that I should not be able to conclude to-night. If the Senator from Delaware desires to proceed, of course I shall have no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Neither of the Senators is willing to proceed to-night. I therefore move that the subject be postponed to, and made the special order for, Monday next at ten o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STUART. I move that the Senate adjourn. The motion was agreed to; and thereupon, at five minutes past ten o'clock, p. m., the Senate adjourned to Monday.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, March 22, 1858.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, when, in December last, I submitted some views to the Senate upon this subject, I did it because I thought I saw distinctly and clearly that there was a movement on foot in the Territory of Kansas, which, if carried out, must necessarily endanger the existence of this Confederacy, and would do so by striking a fatal blow at the basis of our institutions. It has been supposed by some gentlemen—and I regret to say that it has seemingly been supposed by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH]—that in taking the position I then did, it was upon this distracting question of slavery. As I have just stated, my object was one much more important, one involving much higher principles, and one involving the principle upon which our Confederacy stands.

Pardon me, sir, while I refer to two extracts from the speech that I then made—a reference which I should not make now but for the purpose of setting the Senators whom I have named right upon this question. I then said:

"Sir, it may be necessary for me to say—if it is, I beg the attention of the Senate while I say it—that I am not discussing this question with reference to my own opinions upon slavery; I am not discussing it with regard to my own opinions on any provision contained in the constitution; but I am discussing it for the purpose of proving that the action of the convention is, and was intended to be, a trick and a fraud upon the people of Kansas."

Again:

"I have said that the power of admitting States into this Union necessarily forces upon Congress the paramount duty of seeing that the State asks its admittance in accordance with the will of a majority of the people. Show me that, and I will never inquire one instant as to what their domestic institutions are, or what other provision is contained in their constitution, so that it secures a republican government, which is no more nor less than a representative government, based upon the will of the people. As I said, I am pledged to that by every speech I have ever made in my State. I am pledged to that upon the principles of the strictest honor and justice among men. Higher, higher yet, I am pledged to it by my oath to support the Constitution of the United States, which empowers me by my vote to admit States into the Union—never to coerce them in."

I regretted that, having made that statement, thus clearly, the Senator from Mississippi, in delivering a speech here, which he announced to us was for his constituents, should seek to induce the belief on the part of those constituents that I was an intermeddler with the institutions of the South. Sir, that Senator and myself took seats in this Chamber at the same time, and from that time until to-day I have never discussed the question of slavery; and so long as I entertain my present opinions, unless some bill shall be brought here which involves the question within itself, I never will. I regretted that the Senator should make that allusion, although he sought to sustain it by something of a stale anecdote, not very well told.

Since the delivery of that speech, Mr. President, which, as I have shown, was based singly and solely upon the objection that the people of Kansas did not adopt this constitution and ask to be admitted under it, a variety of arguments have been used to meet it. A vast amount of special pleading has been resorted to to evade its effect, until we stand here to-day in a position where, if we were about to make up a dictionary of significations, we could not tell what is the meaning of "the majority of the people;" we could not tell what is the meaning of "self-government," of "non-intervention," of "intervention," of "enabling acts," or "submissions of constitutions to the people." A confusion of ideas and arguments utterly confounded would be the phase presented here to-day, if the friends of this measure could see their reasoning brought into juxtaposition. One gentleman makes an argument, and shows that States have been admitted into the Union without an enabling act, and considers that he has answered the objections. Another one rises and enumerates the number of States that have been admitted into the Union without their constitutions ever having been submitted to the people, and sits down complacently, as if he had met the objections.

Why, sir, the only importance of enabling acts is to prescribe boundaries to an infant State, and to see that the programme is properly started for a fair exposition of the will of the people. The only object of submitting a constitution to the vote of a people is for the purpose of ascertaining their will—not that it is necessary in either case, but that it is a means to approach an end; a mode of ascertaining whether the paper presented, and called a constitution, embodies the will of the people of the proposed State. I showed in that speech, or sought to show, that the power of Congress to admit States, as given by the Constitution, was limited only by the discretion of Congress, and necessarily, therefore, carried with it the right to reject a State for reasons of its own. But, driven as the friends of this measure have been, from point to point in the argument, it finally has resolved itself into this position: true it is, they say, that the people of every Territory have the right, by a fair expression of the will of a majority, to frame a constitution, to submit it to Congress, and ask admission under it; true it is, they say, this right would exist in Kansas but for the fact that the majority of the people are in open rebellion against the territorial government.

That is the question which I intend to meet to-day. I intend to meet it, Mr. President, with all that respect which is due, and which I feel for the President of the United States and his position; but I intend to meet it, also, with all that frankness and candor and fearlessness which belong to my own position. Sir, when the President's special message was read here, I confess to you I listened to it with astonishment; I thought it was astonishing that the President of the United States should send in a special message to Congress stating that the people of Kansas were in rebellion, without telling us what means he had taken to put that rebellion down. I was none the less astonished when I saw, in this same document, the remedy prescribed for the difficulty, which was to admit this rebellious people into the Confederacy of the United States. It was worse than the reasoning of the woman who married the inebriate—she said she did it to get rid of him: worse, because he had a measured life, and some day might die. But to admit into this Confederacy a rebellious people is to introduce a poison into the body-politic, which, ramifying through the whole, would inevitably, in the end, destroy the whole.

But, sir, I shall now undertake to show you that such was not, and is not the fact. I am not going through the history of Kansas. It has been done frequently, and well. I am only going to say, in a few words, what has been my position from the first. It is simply this: that that Territory was organized by an invasion, is indisputable; that that invasion having seized upon the forms of government, exercised it to effect a pernicious purpose, is equally clear; that having been thus organized, the President of the United States, the Governor of the Territory, or the courts of justice, had any power to question the organization, I also denied, and do to-day. Executive authority and judicial authority are bound to take the laws and execute them as they find them, and have no power to inquire as to whether they have been legally, fairly, or fraudulently passed. I said, however, and always said, that the Congress of the United States had power over that question, and ought to exercise it. We ought to have amended the organic law, and provided for a re-organization of the Territory. That I said then. When the late Senator from Missouri, Mr. Geyer, introduced a bill for that purpose, I did everything in my power to induce the Senate to adopt it. Then we should have met this evil at the outset, and met it fairly, upon constitutional principles. We did not do it; and, Mr. President, if that great truth ever needed an exemplification, it has it in this instance—that adopting an error, whether in government, or upon any other subject, the longer you travel in the path of error the more difficulties will accumulate around you.

The condition of things in that Territory is simply the condition of things that exists in these States, and not unfrequently has existed within the Halls of Congress. There is a small faction in that Territory who are called Abolitionists, agitators, and those are the men alluded to by the President as the supporters of the Topeka constitution, and whom, he has come to the conclusion, constitute the majority of the people of the Territory. There is another faction in that Territory, as in the States, composed of extreme southern men, agitators alike upon this question of slavery; the men who are in favor of reopening the slave trade, who are in favor of carrying their institution anywhere and everywhere at any and at all hazards, and those are the men that concocted this Lecompton constitution. But, sir, the great body of the people of Kansas are equally opposed to both. I repeat it, and I say I defy any man to show to the contrary, that the people of Kansas this day are alike opposed to Topeka and to Lecompton; that either one of those instruments submitted to a fair vote of the people this day, would be voted down by an immense majority. That is the condition of things in Kansas. In support of this position, I present an article from the Kansas National Democrat of February 25, 1858, a paper which publishes the laws of the United States "by authority."

"THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.—Last week we laid before our readers the President's message. We shall take occasion to publish some facts relative to the past history of this Territory, as soon as circumstances will permit, that must convince the President that he has been much imposed on relative to the supposed loyalty of the men who have represented to him the entire free-State party as rebels.

"When Governor Geary and patriotic men in Kansas succeeded in driving the pro-slavery and other armed parties from the field in September, 1856, the ultra pro-slavery men were open mouthed in their denunciation of the Governor; they alleging that they were to be sacrificed to elect Buchanan; denouncing all northern men as unworthy of confidence; thus disgusting and driving scores of men, from a sense of self-respect, into the most deadly hate and opposition to the course of these ultra men, who were and are more intent on their selfish schemes than desirous of promoting the interests of the slave States.

"Great wrongs have undoubtedly been perpetrated by both wings of the sectional parties in Kansas. There is no difference between them. They both deserve the execration of all patriotic men. That the President and Congress may be convinced of the fact that a majority of the free-State men of Kansas are not only loyal, but opposed to the disunion parties of this Territory, we would ask them to analyze the vote cast on the 4th of January last, against the Lecompton constitution, and the vote for State and legislative officers, under it.

"There were over twelve thousand votes cast against the constitution. For free-State officers under it, near seven thousand votes were cast, and about two thousand five hundred legal votes for the ultra pro-slavery officers or ticket. Now, from this vote it is apparent that the conservative or national men of Kansas, as pro-slavery and free-State, can beat both wings of the disunionists united, as we have no doubt that they will act together, both being intent on accomplishing one common object."

Now, Mr. President, at the expense of being somewhat tedious upon this subject, as this is the main point that I make in my speech, because it is the sole reason that the President offers in his special message for asking Congress to adopt this constitution, I ask the attention of the Senate while I show, from the proceedings of the people of that Territory, the truth of what I have stated, and then I will undertake to show by argument that there is no such thing as rebellion there. I will present, first, the proceedings of a Democratic meeting in Douglas county, held at Lawrence on the 13th of December. I call the especial attention of the Senate to the date of these proceedings.

At a meeting of the Democracy of Douglas county, held at Lawrence on the 13th December last, the following preamble and resolutions, among others, were adopted:

"Whereas, the Territory of Kansas, for the past three years, has been the theater of intestine commotion, and fierce and bitter animosities have been engendered on account of the distracting question of slavery, and as the result of said commotions and strife, we present to the world the extraordinary spectacle of two factions attempting to force upon the people constitutions that the great mass of them do not recognize or approve of—each the production of misane fanaticism, and not founded on the public approbation: Therefore,

"Resolved, That, as American citizens and members of the great Democratic party, we believe in the principles of self-government, that all political power is derived from, and is inherent in, the people, and that their voice, constitutionally expressed through their representatives, should be obeyed in all things.

"Resolved, That no constitution or laws can be of any binding force or validity unless approved by the popular will and endorsed by a majority of the people.

"Resolved, That the instruments called the Lecompton and Topeka constitutions do not reflect the popular will, and are not approved by the great mass of the people of Kansas. "Resolved, That we have abiding confidence in the integrity, patriotism, and democracy of the Democratic members of Congress; and that we most respectfully protest against the admission of Kansas into the Union under either of the constitutions framed at Topeka or Lecompton."

I said that I asked the especial attention of the Senate to the date of these proceedings—the 13th day of December. When it was known what had been done by the Lecompton convention, when the Lecompton convention had provided for a vote to be taken on that instrument on the 21st of December—the same month—when they had provided for an election of officers to take place on the 4th of January following, that meeting was called for the purpose of sending delegates to a territorial convention to be held at Leavenworth. That convention also assembled. I beg the attention of the Senate while I present some of the proceedings of that convention, and having read them I will read an article which I have from one of the papers published in that Territory.

At a territorial convention held at Leavenworth on the 24th December last, the following among other resolutions were adopted:

"We, the Democracy of the Territory of Kansas, in convention assembled, do hereby resolve:

"1. That we utterly repudiate the action of the convention as anti-democratic, as contrary to the true exposition of the Kansas-Nebraska act, as violative of the letter and spirit of the Cincinnati platform, as opposed to the inaugural address of President Buchanan, as in direct conflict with his instructions to Governor Walker, as an infraction of the Constitution of the United States, as at variance with the true theory of republican government, as destructive to the right and in derogation of the capacity of the people for self-government, as against the doctrine of non-intervention, as an entire abandonment of the doctrine of State rights, and as calculated to sever the bonds of the Union.

"2. That this convention, representing, as I believe it does, a very large majority of the Democracy of Kansas, takes this occasion to announce and reiterate its united and determined opposition to sectionalism and fanaticism springing from any or all quarters, whether East, West, North, or South; that such sectionalism and fanaticism are not in accordance with the principles of a confederated union of the States, but, if indulged and sanctioned by the people, are certain to produce a rupture of the bonds which hold them together. Nor does this convention the less deprecate and denounce every invasion of this Territory by persons living outside its limits, with a view of controlling its elections, and out of which invasions have sprung a great many of the disturbances and troubles in the Territory, and which have led to innumerable and gross frauds, both disreputable to those committing them, and at war with the rights and interests of the people of Kansas.

"3. That the ballot-box was not protected from fraud on Monday, the 21st of this month; but the returns, so far as they are known, indicate very clearly that a very large number of the votes returned were not cast by citizens of this Territory, but by persons who came into it on that day, and by invitation, for the purpose of voting, and for that purpose alone.

"4. That this convention solemnly and earnestly protests against the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State under the so-called Lecompton constitution, the so-called Topeka constitution, or any other instrument which may be in any manner framed, unless such instrument shall be first legally prepared and submitted to the vote of the people of Kansas, and to the people of Kansas only, in such manner as to ascertain clearly their will for or against such instrument."

Before presenting the commentary which I shall read from the Leavenworth Journal, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that that paper is not one of those Abolition papers. It is in favor of a fair exposition of the will of the people; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the editor says distinctly that he is in favor of making Kansas a slave State. Now, sir, I ask you to hear what he says on the subject of this convention:

"THE POSITION OF THE KANSAS DEMOCRACY.—We omitted last week to invite especial attention to the preamble and resolutions adopted by the Democratic convention, held in this city, on the 24th of December last. We never witnessed a larger or more enthusiastic gathering of the true Democracy of the Territory; old, gray-headed men, who had begun to despond for the triumph of the great principles of the party, came out and showed by their zeal that the old camp-fires, which were almost extinguished in Kansas, were relighted; and there was one universal outburst of patriotic feeling. Such men as Amos Rees, Aully McCaulley, Judge Johnston, John P. Slough, James Christian, Joseph C. Hemingway, Robert L. Ream, and a host of others who never participated in Kansas politics, because of the tendency to anarchy which marked the course of the various political parties in the Territory, contributed their most earnest efforts to make the occasion one of deep interest, as it was one of great solemnity and solicitude.

"Every speaker who addressed the convention, did so with a fervor and pathos which showed that even the most distinguished men of the country, whatever their position or patronage, could not swerve from the cardinal principles upon which our Government was founded. Amongst those speakers were Judge Halderman, Judge Johnson, Judge Hemingway, Messrs. Rees, McCauley, Goss, and Slough, who spoke with ability, power, and eloquence.

"The resolutions explain themselves; they are drawn with care, consideration, and firmness, and enunciate too clearly to be misunderstood the doctrines of the Democratic party as understood and promulgated by the party to the country, until the ingenious effort made at Lecompton, and seconded elsewhere, to change the whole creed, and relapse under the disguise of Democracy into a species of Federalism far worse than that of the old Federal party which existed in the days of Mr. Jefferson and the elder Adams. That ancient and respectable party never desired or claimed any power in the Federal Government to force a government upon an unwilling and protesting people; they never claimed that because the people were opposed to a particular form of institutions they should be made to receive them; but the modern doctrine is, that the more the people are opposed to a particular form or mold of government, with the more certainty and purpose that government shall be put in force, and the more the people must be called upon to obey. If this be old-fashioned republicanism, we confess we never so learned it. If it be Democracy, we were never so taught.

"It is totally useless for a party on the one hand to say that slavery is the great issue and the only issue, and appeal to us to desert our banners and go against that institution. They can neither frighten us to do so nor drive us from our advocacy of slavery; and it is equally futile for a party on the other hand to pretend that the harmony of the party requires every one to think and act with the Chief Magistrate of the Union upon the question now agitating Congress and the whole people. Their efforts may blindly mislead some few; they may try and be partially successful; to seduce the South into the conviction that the admission of Kansas into the Union under a constitution obnoxious to four fifths of her people is the only way to make Kansas a slave State, and to save the South from humiliation and degradation. We tell these gentlemen that Kansas can never be made a slave State by trickery; and, if it could, the temporary benefit would carry in its wake, not only an eternal stigma upon southern obliquity, but produce more and more lasting injury to southern institutions than any act in the whole drama of southern history. The South has the opportunity now to create four new States out of Texas. This Administration has it in its power to acquire Cuba, and make it an addition to the strength of the South. Arizona must inevitably be slave territory; Central America will ultimately be attached; Sonora and Chihuahua are a part of our 'manifest destiny,' and would be slave. But trample under foot the great principle of self-government, incorporate it in the creed of the Democratic party that the will of the majority shall be set aside, and the will of the minority substituted as omnipotent, for the purpose of a temporary victory on one issue in Kansas, and you break down the Democracy in the North, you put very soon in power a sectional party from the northern States, whose distinguishing motto is, 'No more slave States!' Democrats who love every part of our common country, and who are of that party because they believed that its creed acknowledged that the will of the majority, legally expressed, should rule, will be at a loss to reconcile the government of the many by the few as a part of their former catechism, and, as a consequence, will desert the ranks. The Democracy assembled at Leavenworth on the 24th, was of that kind which never swayed from the fundamental principle upon which all free governments rest; that government was instituted to produce the greatest good to the greatest number; and that, to be a free government, it must have the consent of the governed.

"Slavery alone has nothing to do with this question. Every domestic institution, including that of slavery, is involved; indeed, the birthright of every free citizen, his elective franchise is at stake. We shall be sorely disappointed and grieved if Congress disregards the will of the sovereign people of this Territory."

I have said he is an editor in Kansas, in favor of making Kansas a slave State; he is a member of the Democratic party there, and he tells you that the question of slavery is not the reason why the people of that Territory protest against having this constitution forced upon them. He tells you that it involves the question of the birthright of freemen, the right of suffrage, and that the attempt is to bury that right beyond the possibility of resurrection.

Let me turn the attention of the Senate now for a moment to the actual condition of that Territory when the President made that remarkable statement in his message. At a full, fair election, held in October, in which the people had participated in a body—not this small handful of Topeka men, but the great conservative majority of the people who protested against this constitution—they had elected a Legislature. That Legislature was in session at the moment when the President sent his special message here. Governor Denver, one of his own appointees, was then presiding as Governor of the Territory. Every mail and every telegraphic dispatch from the Territory, but heralded to our ears the declaration that all was peace; and yet, sir, the President tells that at that moment a majority of the people were in rebellion, assigning no other reason for this assertion than that they sought to keep alive the Topeka constitution. Now let me ask if ever a people, since the election in October, since even the promulgation of this great outrage by the convention that concocted it, proceeded with more careful consideration of their rights, or with more circumspect regard to the Constitution and laws of the country in their efforts to relieve themselves from that gigantic fraud?

Mr. President, look at the election on the 21st of December. What do these resolutions tell you? What does the editor of that paper tell you? That the same system of frauds had been perpetrated. Did they undertake by force of arms to resist it? Not at all; but calmly and peacefully they assembled in their primary meetings and remonstrated against it, founding their remonstrances upon the right of the people to govern. The Legislature, although one third of it was elected in opposition to the free-State party, have unanimously sent us the following remonstrance against it:

Preamble and joint resolutions in relation to the constitution framed at Lecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th day of November, 1857:

Whereas, a small minority of the people living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties of this Territory, availed themselves of a law which enabled them to obstruct and defeat a fair expression of the popular will, did, by the odious and oppressive application of the provisions and partisan machinery of said law, procure the return of the whole number of the delegates to the constitutional convention recently assembled at Lecompton; and whereas, by reason of the defective provisions of said law, in connection with the neglect and misconduct of the authorities charged with the execution of the same, the people living within the remaining nineteen counties of the Territory were not permitted to return delegates to said convention, were not recognized in its organization, or in any other sense heard or felt in its deliberations; and whereas, it is an axiom in political ethics that the people cannot be deprived of their rights by the negligence or misconduct of public officers; and whereas, a minority, to wit: twenty-eight only of the sixty members of said convention, have attempted, by an unworthy contrivance, to impose upon the whole people of this Territory a constitution without consulting their wishes, and against their will; and whereas, the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in thus acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof; and whereas, the action of a fragment of said convention, representing as they did a small minority of the voters of the Territory, repudiates and crushes out the distinctive principle of the 'Nebraska-Kansas act,' and violates and tramples under foot the rights and the sovereignty of the people; and whereas, from the foregoing statement of facts, it clearly appears that the people have not been left 'free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way,' but, on the contrary, at every stage in the anomalous proceedings recited, they have been prevented from so doing:

Be it therefore resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State, and the representatives of said people do hereby, in their name, and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission.

Resolved, That such action on the part of Congress would, in the judgment of the members of this Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution in its stead of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority.

Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from the Territory.

The men who were elected as State officers have also sent up their remonstrance. Individuals residing in the Territory are in this city, who are pro-slavery men, and who also protest against it. What does Judge Elmore, one of the members of that convention, and a slaveholding man, tell you? That the majority of the people of the Territory were resolutely against it. What does Dr. Stringfellow tell you? That he has been there for three years, and spent $5,000 to make it a slave State, but that the people are irreconcilably against it; and yet, as the editor of the Leavenworth Journal, says the more certainly it is ascertained that a majority of the people are against it, the more determined seem some gentlemen to force it upon them. When a majority of the people of that Territory, under the organic act, have elected a Legislature, and that Legislature has peacefully assembled, peacefully remonstrated against this constitution, I ask, is it not an absurdity to say that that is a rebellion? Why, sir, what would have been thought of a man in the British Parliament, who, after the Declaration of Independence, the success of its principles, and the organization of this Government, should still have said that the American people were in rebellion? Yet, that was a revolution indeed. I mention it only to show the absurdity of pretending that a people who have the government in their hands, by regular process of law, and are peacefully exercising it under the direction of a Governor appointed by the President and Senate, through a Legislature regularly elected, are in rebellion.

Again, sir, that Legislature passed an act for taking a vote on the constitution on the 4th of January. Did that look like resistance to the territorial government? Did that look like resistance to the constituted authorities of the United States? Was it not the last act in the power of the people legally to secure their rights? The constitutional convention had sought to place those rights under their feet. They had violated every principle of self-government. They had pretended to make a submission of the constitution to the people, and at the same time so submitted it that it could not be rejected; and the people peacefully passed a law by their Legislature, in virtue of which they, at the polls, proclaimed their objection to the instrument; and they did it by ten thousand majority. Does that look like rebellion? I said, Mr. President, that I might perhaps subject myself to the charge of being somewhat tedious on that point, not only in argument but in fact, but I do it because the President, taking the lead in these specious arguments, has brought the whole issue to turn upon the fact as to whether this is a peaceful and loyal or rebellious people. I think an inspection of the facts and reasons that I have thus adduced completely overthrow any such position.

The President says (and I only allude to it in passing) "that the Kansas act was an enabling act is too clear for argument." I think that statement would be well met by the insertion of one single word—"that the Kansas act was not an enabling act is too clear for argument." I might appeal to the majority of the Committee on Territories on this point, for they take that position in their report. If any man, when the Kansas-Nebraska act was under consideration in the Senate, had said that we were then passing an act for the purpose of enabling that Territory to form a constitution and State government, he would have been laughed at. Why, sir, the great dispute, and the only dispute, was what was the power of Congress to legislate for the Territories while they remained Territories? That was the only question. As I said upon a former occasion, strike the Kansas act from the statute-book, strike all other territorial acts from the statute-book, and let any man answer me if an organized people have not a right to form a constitution and State government, and ask to be admitted into the Union under it? Can Congress enable a people, when forming a constitution and State government, to say what sort of institutions and State government they will have? And yet, sir, strange to say, this comes from men who claim to be opposed to intervention!

Again: the President says, in connection with this subject, that to say to a people that, when framing a constitution, they shall have the right to organize their State government and adopt such institutions as they may deem proper, and at the same time to say that their institutions must correspond with the opinions of Congress, would seem to be a contradiction in terms. So it would; but Congress has never said so. The President interpolates the words "when framing a constitution." They are not in the act; and, as I said, it was not intended to prescribe any limits or confer any power in regard to framing a constitution and State government. It was singly and solely to settle a dispute, that existed in Congress and throughout the Democratic party, in regard to the limitation of the power of Congress over a Territory while it remained so.

Something has been said (and the President dwells upon that point in his message) about the regularity of the proceedings which called this convention and which made the constitution. I have said, upon a former occasion, that that very regularity was adopted for the purpose of a deception. For the first time in that Territory this idea of a census and registration was got up. Was there any new necessity for it? Who originated it? From whom did it come? It came from the very men who had introduced voters into that Territory, against right and against justice. It came from the men who had control of the officers who were to execute that law; and by prescribing these additional forms, they but added to the means of deception and fraud. They copied it after the Toombs bill, for the purpose of prosecuting an imposition upon Congress; but look at the difference between the bill of Congress, as it was to be executed, and the bill of the Territorial Legislature, as that was to be executed. My venerable colleague of that day, Mr. Cass, occupying the seat now occupied by the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] rose in his place and stated that he was authorized by the President of the United States to say, that if that bill became a law, the President would appoint the ablest and best men of the United States to act as commissioners; and in those appointments would do justice to every political party. That was the character of the commissioners who were to execute that act; but the bill of this Legislature was to be executed by sheriffs and judges of probate, who had been appointed at the hands of that Legislature—men whom they knew they could rely upon to assist them in practicing upon the people of Kansas this contemplated outrage; and the end fully justified their expectations. What was the result? That a part only of the Territory was represented in that convention at all.

SENATE.

Now, sir, I must say to my honorable friend from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] and the majority of the Committee on Territories, that I regretted, deeply regretted, two things in their report. I regretted to see that they saw fit to call the majority, the free-State people of that Territory, Abolitionists. I think it better, upon all occasions, to call political organizations by the name they take to themselves; but in this instance it is not the fact, as I have shown by documents already read at your table.

I regret, also, to see that they noticed in that report a statement, upon the topic I am now considering, from H. Clay Pate. Sir, we have all sorts of pates hold of this thing from the beginning; but I had hoped we might have escaped this Clay Pate. We are told that the potter hath power over the clay, to make one vessel to honor and another to dishonor; but the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] told us the other day that this Clay Pate was already made to dishonor. What does he say? What is the amount of his statement when you have done? Why, it is the statement of Mr. Wilson that two other men made a statement to him—mere gossip got up for the occasion. It is a mere statement of another person; but if it were all true, if you were to admit every word of it, still it leaves the fact that the people occupying one half of the counties of the Territory, be they more or less, had no right to vote at that election, and did not vote, because they could not get their names registered.

The President says that he is in favor of admitting Kansas under this Lecompton constitution, to carry out the great principle of non-intervention. I said that, when this controversy began, we knew the meaning of non-intervention and intervention. What are the facts? Here is a people remonstrating through their conventions, through their Territorial Legislature and Delegate, through their State officers—remonstrating by ten thousand votes, at the polls, against having this constitution forced upon them; and yet you say that to force it upon them is non-intervention! To take off your hands; to let this thing fall, a dead carcass; to leave these people, in the language of the Kansas act, perfectly free to regulate their own concerns in their own way—that they say is intervention! In the language of that editorial, to force this thing, and force it the harder the more you are satisfied the people are opposed to it, that, say the friends of this measure, is the quintessence of non-intervention! Was there ever anything more absurd?

The President says it will localize excitement; it will banish the question from the Halls of Congress, and produce peace within the Territory, and throughout the United States; the thing called excitement in this topic will be dead, he thinks. Sir, if this project could succeed; if that great birthright of American freemen could thus be violated, and this constitution placed upon the necks of that people; when the President should come to look into the Territory, and when he should see the people in angry and sullen columns against it; when he should see there those portentous clouds of darkness which he thinks are hovering over the country; he might say:

" 'Tis Lethæ's gloom, but not its quiet;
The pain, without the peace of death."

He next tells us that this election on the 4th of January was a nullity. Is it true, sir, that the President of the United States instructed Governor Denver to see that that election was fairly carried out; that the people should have a right, peaceably and fairly, to vote on that day, against the constitution, when he intended to regard it as a nullity? What is the argument based upon this? We are told that the people of a Territory, in their legislative capacity, have a right, under the Kansas-Nebraska act, to proceed to form a constitution and State government. What did they do in this instance? They authorized an election of delegates to frame a constitution. Did they authorize them to do anything more? I am now speaking of the mere technical question involved. They authorized the delegates to frame a constitution to be submitted to Congress; but they never authorized the delegates to submit it to Congress; that is not found in the law.

But we are told, that if a people having done this should find that the delegates whom they have intrusted to effect this object have made a constitution obnoxious to them, that the power to reclaim any action over it is gone; that it is an exhausted authority; that although they had that power under the Kansas-Nebraska act complete, unlimited, yet, like the kite of the lad, the string is broken; it has passed from their control, and being whirled about by every gust of passion, lies torn and destroyed at their feet among the crags of technicality. What, sir! The delegate got an authority above and beyond all reclamation of the people, and this doctrine, at this stage of the world, a Democratic principle! The people authorize delegates to frame an instrument, to be called a constitution, just as you would authorize your attorney to make out a power of attorney for you to execute, subject to their inspection, control, and revision! But what becomes of that language of the Kansas act upon which so much emphasis is placed, that the people, in framing their constitution and forming and regulating their domestic institutions, have a right to do it in their own way? That declaration has been emphasized and italicized in messages, in speeches, and in political newspaper articles. It was "their way" peaceably to pass a law for an election on the 4th of January, and under that law to reject that constitution. Was not that "their own way"? Have they not done it? And yet we are told, that to regard that act as intervention in the affairs of the Territory. Admit, sir, if you please, that, upon legal principles, this election is a nullity, (and I make the admission only for the sake of the argument,) what then? It is an expression of ten thousand majority of the people of the Territory of Kansas against this constitution. It comes back to the position that I took in December, that a majority of the people being against the constitution, you have no power, under the authority conveyed to you by the Federal Constitution, to admit it into this Union, because "to admit," implies "consent to a request;" and unless the people request it, you have no authority to say yes.

But the President says this election involved a strange inconsistency. Mr. President, I ask your special attention to that argument. Just for one moment recall to mind the then condition of the people of Kansas. The President in his annual message had told them that if they did not vote at the elections that Congress would and ought to take it for granted that they consented to be bound by those who did vote. That annual message, we are told, was telegraphed to the Territory, and read by the direction of Governor Stanton to the Legislature, and published to the people. Therefore, before this election of the 4th of January they knew that the Chief Magistrate of this nation, with that power which belongs to a great man and is incident to his high position, intended to hold them by the voice of the people, as that voice might appear through the votes on the 4th of January. There was a long and heated contest among the people calling themselves free-State people, whether they would vote at all or not at that election. Finally, it was resolved to do so, and about two thirds of them did vote. Now, what are they told by the President of the United States? That although under this declaration of his they voted by ten thousand majority against the constitution as a whole, yet because at the same time they voted for, and secured the election of State officers and members of the Legislature under it, the President tells them they have recognized its validity in the most solemn manner.

Why, sir, this reasoning not only carries us back to the days of Federalism, but it carries us still further back to the days of witchcraft. This is the law of witches. This is the law of their trial. The method, we are told, was to plunge the supposed witch into the stream. If she swam out she was a witch to be shot with a silver ball. If she died in the stream, she was no witch. Here is the same doctrine: if you do not vote at this election, I shall hold that those who do vote bind you; but if you vote, although you may vote by ten thousand against the constitution, yet I shall hold that you have admitted that it is a fair and valid constitution, and that you ought to live under it. That, I repeat, is the law of witches.

The President, as he thinks, having established the validity of this constitution upon the principles of right, proceeds, in his own language, to talk about principles of expediency, and in the outset he says that Kansas is as much a slave State now as South Carolina or Georgia. If that declaration had come from any other source upon earth it would not have been entitled to respectful consideration; but coming as it does from this distinguished man, occupying, as he does, this distinguished and responsible position, let us see what it has for its foundation. "Kansas is now as much a slave State as South Carolina or Georgia." And yet since that constitution was sent here and presented to Congress, or perhaps before it was presented to Congress, the President had appointed a Governor for Kansas. At the very moment when the President made that declaration, the Territorial Legislature of Kansas was in session, passing laws as a Territorial Legislature, not an officer was commissioned in that Territory who was not there commissioned either by the President or elected by the people under territorial law. There was not a State law in existence, not a State officer in existence, not the slightest semblance of a State; and yet the President tells us that it is as much a slave State as South Carolina or Georgia. Why, sir, it was not a State at all, much less one equal to South Carolina and Georgia. Was there a Legislature there? Who were they? Was there a set of State officers there? Who were they? The constitution itself expressly declares that neither the State officers nor the Legislature shall assemble, be qualified, or do any act until Congress has admitted Kansas under this constitution. In the face of all this, the President, in his message to the Senate, makes the solemn declaration, that it was then as much a State, and a slave State, as any State in this Union.

The true theory, in my judgment, applicable to constitutions formed in Territories, is this: whether in virtue of enabling acts, or in virtue of that right that lies with the people always, they are formed, but for a particular purpose. They are formed as the act of the Legislature authorized the delegates at Lecompton to form this one—a constitution to be submitted to Congress. It is an incipient movement for the organization of a State; but if Congress refuse it, it is a constitution no longer. Now, sir, take the case in hand. This Lecompton constitution itself, as I have said, declares that no State or legislative organization is to be had under it until after Congress has admitted the State into the Union. If Congress rejects the application, where is the authority to organize a State government? Sir, we ought to be amazed; the President himself ought to be amazed at such an unqualified declaration as that contained in his message.

But, sir, there is a more lamentable declaration than that connected with it. The President says that if Congress now rejects this constitution because slavery remains in it, it will be offensive to a portion of the States of this Union, will renew agitation, and produce incalculable difficulties. Sir, the people of Kansas do not object to this constitution upon that ground. The people of Kansas object to it, and I object to it, because it seeks to overthrow the great principle which lies at the foundation of this Government—the right of the people to govern themselves. That is the cause of the opposition to it. We go against it because it is not the voice of the people of Kansas; we go against it because it does not reflect the will of the people of Kansas. Sir, this is as offensive language to me, it is as offensive language to the majority of the people in Kansas, as it would be offensive to the President if I were to say to him that he seeks to fasten this constitution upon the people of Kansas because slavery remains in it.

I take the ground that from the commencement of these proceedings down to to-day, the object, intent, and meaning of the spirits who controlled the Lecompton convention, were deception and fraud. Why, sir, what says that constitution in regard to the return of votes? That constitution says that at both of these elections—that of the 21st of December, and that on the 4th of January—the returns shall be made within eight days to the president of the convention; and yet we have the testimony of Governor Denver, taken under oath, that on the next day after Calhoun counted these votes, he asked him how long he was going to continue to receive returns, and he told him he should continue to receive returns—mark it, Mr. President, mark it Senators, mark it the country—"until Congress has acted upon the constitution," although the constitution itself says that they shall be made within eight days. Well, sir, he has been receiving them. Mr. President, suppose you were a canvassing officer in your good old reliable State of Kentucky; that the returns were to be within eight days; and that at the expiration of that time you should take a boat and go down to New Orleans to canvass them, and then write back to the people in your State to know how the thing went, to see whether there had been false returns made: why, sir, you would be held in utter disgrace by every man in Kentucky. Yet this John Calhoun, surveyor general of Kansas, president of the Lecompton convention, resident of the State of Illinois, with a wife and family in Illinois, comes to Washington to canvass the votes of the election in Kansas! When inquired of what is the result of the election, he does not know. Eight days have gone by—thirty, sixty days have gone by—and yet he does not know what the returns are. He has written to Kansas to Governor Denver to find out. The people of Kansas know. They have appointed a committee; they have investigated the fraud at the Delaware Agency; they have ascertained that the whole thing is a gross and contemptible fraud. President Calhoun is in Washington, and does not know anything about it. I tell you, sir, if this course of proceedings was connected with any subject other than the base attempt to force upon a protesting people a constitution that they reject and despise, it would not be tolerated by any respectable man within the boundaries of this Union.

I showed, upon a former occasion, facts patent upon the face of the constitution of intended violence and fraud. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PITCHER] wished me to wait. They said that large and dangerous powers had been conferred upon Mr. Calhoun, and they were solicitous to see how he would exercise them. I applied the old maxim, that you may know an Ethiopian by his skin, and a leopard by his spots, and he has not the power to change them. The man who had practiced the conduct that he did in the course of making that constitution, I said, would do anything and everything to effect his purpose; and I repeat, that he stands here to-day, in this city, I believe, (for I have never seen him in my life, to know him,) with the declaration, in violation of a plain section of that constitution itself, which required the returns to be made within eight days, that he is going to continue to receive them as long as Congress continues to act upon the Lecompton constitution.

The President says, that to the people of Kansas the only practical difference between admission and rejection depends on the fact of whether they can more speedily change their constitution or form another. In regard to this right to change constitutions, I shall speak by-and-by, when I come to allude to the argument of the Senator from Ohio; but for the present I propose to consider this declaration, that the only practical difference is, whether you have a constitution thrust upon you by force and fraud, or whether you may make one for yourselves fairly. Is there no practical difference so far as regards the people of Kansas? Is there no practical difference so far as it regards the safety of the States prospectively in this country? Is Congress prepared to say to-day that it is as fair, as wise, as discreet, regarding it as a practical question alone, to force a fraudulent constitution upon a people, as it is to let that people make one for themselves? With great respect for the opinions of the President, I utterly deny it.

I am happy to agree with the President of the United States in one declaration contained in that message. He says that if the Kansas act is fairly executed, it will allay all excitement. There is the principle upon which we can all stand. It is true, sir, eminently true; and I commend it to the President, and all who are seeking to enforce this constitution. Carry out fairly, justly, wisely, the principles of this Kansas act, and it will allay all excitement. Why? Not because it is the Kansas act; not because it is a law of Congress; but because it involves, in the language of the President, a principle as ancient as free government itself; it is no more nor less than the right of a people speaking for themselves fairly, honestly, and without interruption, or violent invasion, to say what sort of a constitution they will live under. There is the great panacea. There is the path to peace and harmony, not only in Kansas but throughout this Confederacy.

I listened the other day with great pleasure to a most eloquent speech made by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER.] He painted in glowing colors the destiny of this Government if we remained a Confederacy. He alluded to the fact that the great Powers of Europe were now assembled by their navies in the Eastern seas for the extension of empire; and by the way, as he seemed to think, of disreputable contrast, he said that the Senate of the United States were engaged in looking into frauds committed at the Delaware Agency in Kansas; and therein unwittingly that eminent Senator pictured to the Senate the great distinction between the nations of Europe and this American Republic. They, by the strong arm of power, govern their subjects, and extend their dominion. We, by silent, peaceful, but much more potential means, govern ourselves, and consequently extend our dominion, through the medium of the ballot-box. If there be any one thing among the institutions of this country which more than all others should be guarded by the utmost and eternal vigilance, it is the purity of the ballot-box, lest the great principle upon which this Confederacy rests be poisoned at the fountain, and that poison, passing through the arteries and veins of the Republic, shall ultimately reduce the whole to a shapeless, rotten mass. The Senator should have remembered how small agencies produce great results. He had seen the whole working classes of Ireland reduced to the very doors of starvation by a potato disease, the cause of which defies detection. He ought to have recollected there are small agencies that produce islands and continents. He ought to have turned to his own fields, and seen, after his skill and labor had grown up a hundred acres of beautiful grain, how a little insect, not the sixteenth of an inch in length, could destroy all the efforts of man. Sir, that statesman who undertakes to overlook small causes productive of such mighty and disastrous results as frauds at the ballot-box, will find but too late that he has no confederacy to maintain.

Much has been said, in the course of this debate, (as much is always said in the course of a debate involving even remotely this question of slavery,) and in a threatening manner, in regard to the continuance of this Confederacy. Extremes meet here, as they do in Kansas, as they do in these States. A long array of grievances is made out in one section of the Union, and thrown into the face of the other, as if peace and harmony and good will among men could be secured and maintained by constantly taunting each other with their real or supposed defects. Sir, I know no difference between a family of States and a family of men, women, and children. Is there a man who can live a day harmoniously in his own family, unless he acts and talks kindly, and uses conciliation and love? Can brother and sister, husband and wife, go even to the altar of God in peace, if they constantly taunt each other with the defects incident to their nature? Can great States of the American Republic exist, the pride and admiration of the world, the security of the greatest liberty to men, if the time of their Senators, their Congressmen, their statesmen, and their orators, is consumed in thorning the sides of each other? Sir, but a few days ago numbers of the most distinguished of the American people assembled in a neighboring city to see an equestrian statue of the great Father of his Country unveiled; and upon that occasion, I take pleasure in saying, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] pronounced an oration, of which any orator of any country might well be proud. I could but think, sir, when some of these exasperating statements were being made in the Halls of Congress, that if it could be permitted to that great patriot to rise and unveil himself here, every one of these men, like Saul when journeying to Damascus, would by the great light of his countenance be bowed down in silence.

I claim not any excellence of conduct on this subject. God forbid! My theory upon that subject, my creed, which I imbibed in my youth and shall carry with me to my grave, is found in the Farewell Address of that great man to his countrymen. I shall cling to this Confederacy, regarding it as the sheet-anchor of hope for all the people of all the States; supporting it with whatever ability I possess; never uttering a word against it, nor thinking or believing that it can, in any contingency, be destroyed; and, so far as my action and my vote go, frowning indignantly upon the first dawning of an attempt to array one section of this Union against another.

Sir, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] brought forcibly to our recollection, the other day, some of the great controversies through which we have passed. He spoke of those men living in the non-slaveholding States of this Union, who, to use his language, had fought gallantly for the rights of the South clear up to the columns of the Constitution, although many of them, he regretted to say, had fallen by the way, and he said that he honored them. Mr. President, it was a just and beautiful eulogium, ably pronounced. It is true. That great light of patriotism, which sprang into existence at Bunker Hill and culminated at Yorktown, passes this day, with electrical force, not only among the northern, but the southern people. Alike do they love and embrace the great principles of the American Constitution. Shoulder to shoulder, it is true, we have fought the battles incident to discussions of that instrument clear up to its columns. True, sir, too lamentably true, some of the ablest of our soldiers have fallen by the way. But now that the battles for those great principles have been fought, that the victory is won—when we come now amid the giant columns of that Constitution, to overlook the ground and reap the fruit of the victory, what do we see? Where are some of our southern companions in arms? Stuck in the first hedge, sir, dragging a miserable, unsightly corpse along, labeled "John Calhoun's Lecompton contrivance," based upon a miserable technicality, and steeped in fraud and corruption. Let us be met as we meet our friends. In the language of the President, let the Kansas act be fairly executed; let the people of Kansas make a constitution in their own way; let that be presented, and all will be peace.

Sir, there have been grave misapprehensions, (and doubtless some of them exist yet in the country) about this subject. There have, also, been painful apprehensions as to the result of this controversy. As to the latter, I am free to say I never entertained them. Believing that truth is mighty and will prevail—believing that under the guidance of that great principle, fairly and honestly sustained, which sprang into form when our ancestors achieved their independence, and which has since had an existence, and maintained this Government till to-day—these States will go on to cover a continent and a Cuba. I have had an abiding confidence that this monstrous fraud would be by Congress rejected, and I believe it to-day. It has received the condemnation of some of the oldest and ablest men upon this floor. The great Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,]

"Whose head is silvered o'er with age,
And long experience makes him sage,"

has raised his gigantic arm, and struck it a most fatal blow. Sir, was there ever a time in the history of this country, when a great emergency existed, that Kentucky had not men to meet it? The distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has also wielded his battle-ax, and given it a finishing stroke. That gallant State, whether at New Orleans, or elsewhere, has always had a representative to crush the enemies of the people.

Sir, the time is not far distant when there will be peace in Kansas and in the country. The time is not far distant when the people of the whole Union will understand that such contrivances as these, when presented to an American Congress, cannot fail to receive most ignominious destruction. I congratulate Congress and the country that that event is near at hand. If asked what is to be done when you reject this deformity, I answer, in the language of the Kansas act, leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate their institutions in their own way. Sir, they are doing it now. This Legislature which has been called so rebellious has pursued the peaceful and only means of presenting such a constitution here as embodies the will of the people.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate long enough. I said to you in the outset, as I said in December last, that I rose simply to use whatever of ability and power I possessed to secure to the people of Kansas that privilege which they, alike with all others within our borders, possessed of framing a constitution embodying their will. I said that the controversy was in defense of that great principle, and I was willing to stake my reputation upon its success. Gratified am I, then, when I can congratulate the country on so near an approach to its complete success. In a few days, we can herald to the people of this Union that, although feeble, few in numbers, but steady in purpose, the men in Kansas, whether for free State or for slave State, have had their rights secured to them in the legislative halls of the nation; that Lecompton is dead, and the people of Kansas are free. Sir, to have been a participant, however humble, in this great work, is a sufficient consolation to me.

If the Senate will pardon me for a few moments, I will look into a question that has been brought distinctly to the notice of the Senate by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT.] I read from my speech to show that the Senator from Ohio was entirely mistaken when he supposed that in December I considered at all the effect of that provision of the constitution of Kansas which limits or seeks to limit the right of the people to change it. I will trouble the Senate but for a few minutes to submit my views upon that question.

I agree, Mr. President, that there is fair ground for debate as to the effect of the limitation—that is to say, whether it is a limitation until 1864, the language being, that after 1864 the constitution may be changed in a manner therein provided; but I state, as the inclination of my own mind, that when a constitution provides a mode of amendment as to time, place, and circumstance, its fair construction is to exclude all others. But the argument of the Senator from Ohio does not stop at that. He says that no matter what may be the limitations in a constitution, the people have at any and all times the right by legal proceedings to overturn it. To my mind, with great respect for the opinion of the Senator, that position involves a very great absurdity. If he will take the ground that the people, without resort to legal means, have the inherent right to do it, and confine it to a revolutionary right, there will be some consistency in his argument. But by what authority does a Legislature pass a law which is prohibited by the constitution which brought them into existence, and from which alone they possess the power to legislate at all? Can that question be answered? I think not.

The Senator read from the Declaration of Independence, which everybody knows was a grouping together of revolutionary rights, to prove the existence of a legal and constitutional right. Mr. Jefferson and his compeers there embodied those great revolutionary principles which, in their judgment, authorized them to rise, and, by the power of arms, to resist and throw off the power of the British Government; and yet, a Senator, a man learned in the law, reads from the Declaration of those principles to prove an existing constitutional right to be exercised under the forms of law. Why, sir, we have always understood that a law which violated the constitution of a State was a nullity—was no law; and yet, it is said that if the law seeks to overthrow the constitution itself, then it is valid. Well, sir, that would be an easy way of settling a controversy. If, at any time, under any causes of excitement in a State, there should be a controversy among the people as to whether a great bank or anything else should be established, and the minority of the people should point to the fact that the constitution inhibited it, the majority could say, "Very well; we will wipe it out." And yet it is said by the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMMOND] that constitutions are made to protect minorities, which is true; although I cannot agree with his other conclusion that, therefore, minorities ought to make them.

The Senator from Ohio read (and I confess I was amazed at it) from the great argument of Daniel Webster, made in the Rhode Island case, to prove this position. Without looking into the case, a man would know that that could not be true of him. Daniel Webster was arguing that side of the case in Rhode Island which denied the right to change the government; and to suppose that in that argument he proved the contrary would be to suppose what no man would ever imagine who knew Daniel Webster. But on the very page from which the Senator read in that argument, Mr. Webster states his opinions distinctly:

"One principle is, that the people often limit their government; another, that they often limit themselves. They secure themselves against sudden changes by mere majorities. The 5th article of the Constitution of the United States is a clear proof of this."

And yet the Senator declares that the people have a right at all times, without regard to its limitations, to change their constitution, and he calls into his use the great authority of Daniel Webster to sustain that position. Sir, if any man in the presence of Daniel Webster had uttered such an idea as that, and he had turned that immense brain towards him, and given him one look of that immense eye, he would have annihilated the argument, if he did not annihilate the man who uttered it. He never entertained any such notions or opinions as those.

But, says the Senator, (and I mean to be short on this point,) we are the veriest usurpers upon earth ourselves if there is any necessity for submitting a constitution to a vote of the people, because the Constitution of the United States was never so submitted. Now, sir, let us see how a plain tale shall set the honorable Senator right. The 7th article of the Constitution says:

"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

The Constitution itself provided that it should be ratified by the conventions of the States, and a vote by the mass of the people would not have been a compliance with its provisions.

But the Senator says it is not necessary to have any constitution at all in order to admit a State. Well, sir, I read that as a part of the proceedings of a meeting in Tammany Hall, and when I took into consideration the place where it was uttered and the man who uttered it, I confess that it did not surprise me; but that here in the Senate of the United States an honorable member, of the intelligence and ability of the Senator from Ohio, should say that it is not necessary in introducing a State into this Confederacy to have a written constitution, did surprise me. The Senator says that you are under an obligation by the Constitution itself to guaranty to each State in the Confederacy a republican form of government; and therefore he says it is your duty, and your only duty, to see that the constitution presented by the State asking for admission is republican in its form. Well, sir, if it is not written, how are you going to find it out? That is the question. If it is not a written constitution, and you are called upon to say whether it is republican in its character or not, are you going to send to John Calhoun and Jack Henderson to take affidavits? Are you going to send out a congressional roving commission to ascertain what it is? If you do, how long do you think you would have to remain here to hear the evidence; and how do you think that evidence would correspond when you come to get it here? Why, sir, with this Lecompton constitution written, there is a very serious dispute as to its effect. I have contended, and it has been contended by men as distinguished as any in this country—the present Governor of Virginia contends—that patent upon its face it is anti-republican, because it says that the constitution shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection, and that it shall take effect only after that submission; and yet it submits it in such a manner that it is impossible it can be rejected. Well, sir, I agree with Governor Wise that that is wholly and totally anti-republican. By a mere trick, a mere contrivance, to say to the people, "we submit to you a question for adoption or rejection, and yet fix it so that you cannot reject it," is anti-republican; worse than that, it is the trick of a knave.

I confess I was somewhat amazed at the argument of the honorable Senator on this branch of the case. He took up the constitution of Minnesota, and he read there that when the people of Minnesota voted upon the adoption or rejection of their constitution, every man was bound to put his vote upon the same ballot on which he voted for State officers. There, he said, was a perfect answer to the argument that there was any objection to the Kansas constitution. In other words, if you are defending a man for murder, it is a perfectly good defense to show that another man has also murdered, that you might have got two culprits instead of one; and that is a sound argument, and would be a perfect defense! When you come to look into the Minnesota constitution, you find that it was perfectly in the power of the people of Minnesota to reject that constitution. All there was about it was this: there were two parties in Minnesota, as there are everywhere else; they were voting for State officers, at the same time they were voting upon the constitution; and the members of the convention said, and said wisely, (if my opinion might be permitted there,) that they would not have a separate ballot, with constitution or no constitution, but they would have it on the same ballot with that for officers. If a majority of the people of that Territory wanted to reject the constitution, there was nothing in their way. In this Kansas election, however, it was out of the power of the people to reject the constitution. If only three men voted for it, it must be adopted; and yet the Senator, somewhat with a look of triumph, brought this argument to our consideration.

Now, sir, as to this idea of amending constitutions, he amused and edified us for a long time with ancient authorities to prove that the power that makes the law, can unmake it. He read us a great deal of ancient Latin and mongrel French to prove what he could have proven upon the avenue any day by the first man, woman, or child he met, that the legislative power that makes a law can unmake it. There is no doubt about that. We do it every day. Therefore, he says, there is no difficulty in amending a constitution any day, although the constitution itself says you shall not do it. Now, let me test the Senator's principle with reference to the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution of the United States points out a mode of amendment. Does any man pretend that it can be amended in any other way? Is there a man in the United States who dares stand up and say that the Constitution of the United States can be amended by a vote of the people?

But, further, the Constitution of the United States says that it shall never be amended so as to affect the right of representation in this body of each and every State. I commend to the consideration of Senators here the question, are you

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Stuart.

SENATE.

prepared to admit a doctrine which, carried out, will give to a majority of the people, or a majority of the States of this Union, the right to take from the small States the equality of representation in this body? I have heard some men say that could not be done, because this Constitution is a compact, it is an agreement. Well, sir, did it ever occur to you that a constitution is above an agreement? A constitution is that form of organized society which ranks all others. If a constitution prescribes that a certain amendment shall never be made—like this provision of the Constitution of the United States, that an amendment shall never be made to it to deprive the small States of the equality of representation in this body—I ask, is there any other power on earth to change it? I think not. It would require the consent of every State to be thus affected, or it cannot be done. Why? Not because it is a compact; not because it is an agreement; but because it is an inhibition in the Constitution itself, and because that instrument itself declares its own intent and effect; which is, that it is supreme within its sphere above all other constitutions and laws. As I said upon a former occasion, I do not refer to this provision in the constitution of Kansas for the purpose of discussing its validity, at all. I mean that provision of the constitution which prohibits any change of it to affect slave property. I declared at the time that I did it for the purpose of showing the intended fraud upon the people; the attempt to do what it was unjust to do; that is, to take from them forever all control over that or any other question of State policy.

But the Senator thought he had found another very specious argument in the language of that constitution. I should not have referred to it, but for the fact that the Senator really undertook to ridicule the view I or anybody else took. He seemed to think it a most ridiculous thing that anybody should suppose for an instant that that provision of the constitution of Kansas had any validity or force; and he said this is the principle: the constitution of Kansas simply intends to say that the slaves who are now in Kansas shall continue to remain in that condition as long as they live, but that there shall be no effect upon their issue. Now, Mr. President, let us see whose argument ought to be ridiculed, the Senator's or mine. Here is the constitution of Kansas, establishing slavery, as we all agree; it is in that form before us; it provides a means and a time for its own amendment, but it declares that no amendment shall ever be made which shall interfere with the right of property in slaves. Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio, what is the right of property in slaves? Does he tell me that it is only to them while they live? Is that the only right to property in slaves? Does not the right of property in slaves give to the owner the right of property in their progeny? Does any man deny that?

Mr. BAYARD. I do.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Delaware says he does. Well, sir, I shall hear him, when he explains that question, with interest. I know his ability; no man respects or admires it more than I do, as I trust my honorable friend knows; but with this constitution adopted, if the right of property in slaves in Kansas is limited to their lifetime, then it will be a doctrine new to me, and will only add another reason why there never should have been any wish on the part of southern gentlemen to have it adopted. Most completely and fully do I agree that there is a distinction between the right of a State to emancipate a slave, and to declare that his progeny born thereafter shall be free. That is a distinction well defined, clearly understood; but you must declare that intention in unmistakable terms. You must limit the right. You must say that the right to property in slaves shall be limited to their own existence, and shall not extend to their progeny; but when you say the reverse of that, when you say that the right to property in slaves shall in no manner be affected, then you declare its permanency as long as issue shall be born.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] has placed in my hands, and I recollect it very well, the first section in this article upon slavery, in which it is declared:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Adopt that constitution; let that be the organic law of Kansas, and couple with it the other declaration that it shall never be amended so as in any wise to affect the right of property in slaves; and I should like to know if it does not cover their increase?

There is one other topic to which I ask the attention of the Senate for a moment, and that is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. It is in these words:

"Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the admission of the States of Minnesota and Kansas into the Union, by this act, shall never be so construed as to deny, limit, or otherwise impair, the right of the people of the said States, with the assent of their Legislatures, severally, at all times, to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper, so that the same be still republican, and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States."

I call the attention of the Senate to that amendment for two reasons. In the first place, if that amendment is to have any operation at all upon the constitution of Kansas or Minnesota, then I want to ask the President and the friends of this measure if it is not intervention? I want to know of them if it is not intervention in its most obnoxious form that Congress by any power of its own can undertake to say what shall be the limitations contained in a State constitution? I commend that to the consideration of those States who think they are in a minority in this Confederacy. I commend to the Senators and Representatives from those States, are you prepared to say to-day that Congress possesses the power to pass a law to clothe your people with a right of action different from your State constitution? I say if it is anything it is intervention in its most obnoxious form.

But, sir, we are gravely told by the honorable Senator who presented it, that it is not anything. He tells you that he has been groping away back, beginning at the very dawn of Christianity, to prove that the amendment which he has introduced does not amount to anything at all. I think he has been completely successful. I think he has proven, beyond the power of contradiction, that nothing in an act admitting a State into the Union should be, or can be, construed to impair the right of the people to change their constitution. He might just as well have said, nor shall it impair their right to plow before or after the 1st day of April. There is nothing in the law of Congress which proposes to impair or limit that right. It simply admits them into the Union. It does not profess to say a word—it could not say an effective word if it did—as to the right of that people to change their constitution. The extent of the power of Congress under the United States' Constitution is to admit the State. The Senator says, "if I am asked why I presented this nothing here, I will tell you, sir: 'it is to put down clamor;'" in other words, "I have looked around among my compeers in this body; I have come to the conclusion that they do not know what the meaning of this law which we are about to pass is. I have concluded that they are a mere set of infants. They have some vague notion that the people of that Territory, when they come to be admitted under this constitution, may be hampered in their legitimate rights to amend it; but it is such a confused notion that they do not comprehend its meaning; and I have a little sugar pill here—it does not amount to anything, it is not anything—but to stop their clamorous mouths, I am going to drop that pill on their tongues and let them swallow it." So far as I am concerned, I am profoundly obliged to the Senator for the very great labor he has been at to produce nothing. It amounts to nothing, and for that reason I shall vote against his amendment. If it is anything, I am against it. If it is not anything, it shall not receive my attention and vote.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGGS] with I confess some words and some manner which I thought not exactly proper, has advocated the doctrine, not only of the Senator from Ohio, but he has proclaimed here to the Senate of the United States, and to the country, that he is opposed to the submission of constitutions to the people at all. I will consider first his reasons; and, in the next place, his doctrine. I had heard it said by others, that there was no distinction between submitting a State law and submitting a State constitution to the vote of the people. Why, sir, the constitution of a State, which brings into existence the legislative body, points out expressly, and defines accurately, how the legislative authority of a State shall be exercised. When a bill is introduced into one House, passed by a majority, goes through the same proceedings in the other, and receives the sanction of the Governor, the people, in their constitution, have declared that it shall then be the law. They declared, in that same constitution, that the legislative authority of the State shall consist of a House of Representatives and a Senate, to be elected by the people. The legislative authority of the State, therefore, rests in that Legislature, and nowhere else. Hence, I have contended, when these questions have arisen in the course of legal investigation, that for the Legislature to submit a law to a vote of the people at large, and make its existence or non-existence depend upon that vote, is unconstitutional. That is my belief to-day; and I agree with the Senator from Indiana, when he says that that is the better legal authority this day of the country; and those are the reasons. The people have taken away the legislative power from themselves en masse, and have deposited it in a legislative body created by the constitution, and that is the only body that can exercise legislative power.

But, sir, a constitution (that instrument which the people, being unable to make en masse, appoint delegates to draw up and to be submitted to their inspection and adoption) rests upon an entirely different principle. It rests upon the principle by which you employ an agent or attorney to make out your deed. You do not empower him to execute it. He has only to make it out, to put it in form, and submit it to your inspection. And, upon this point, sir, let me show what was the policy and reasoning of the Administration, as stated in their organ, the Washington Union, in June and July last. June 26th, the following article appeared in that paper:

"When the delegates thus chosen shall have completed the business for which they shall have assembled, to wit: the formation of a constitution, there will remain but one question for further division and distraction, and that question will be: Is the constitution thus formed and approved by the people of Kansas, and does it reflect their will on the question, not only of slavery, but upon all others? If it does, every one will say that with that constitution, whether slave, free, or silent on that point, she should be admitted as a State. If it does not, then no one will pretend for a moment that a constitution condemned by a majority of the people should be forced upon them, no matter under what forms and by what authority adopted. Granting the correctness of the proposition just stated, we ask how can that fact, so important to be known, be ascertained? We will not say that there is no other mode of ascertaining it, but we will say that the most satisfactory and conclusive evidence that the constitution is approved by the people, will be the ratification of it by them at the polls. To those who object to the submission of the constitution to the people for ratification, we propound the inquiry: Are you willing to abide the decision of the bona fide citizens of Kansas? We put the inquiry, because, upon looking into the complaints of those who oppose this course, we discover what appears to be an unwillingness to submit to the decision that a majority of the citizens of Kansas may pronounce. To that class of fault-finders we have no argument to offer. Our reasoning is addressed alone to the advocates and defenders of the great principle of the Kansas bill—to those who intend, in good faith, to stand by their principles, whether it works out a favorable or unfavorable result to their personal views and wishes."

And on the 15th of July the following:

"But there is another and stronger reason for the submission. The delegates are mere agents for framing a written instrument. To make their act conclusive would be constituting them the masters instead of the servants of their principals."

"No prudent business man confers an irrevocable power of attorney where he retains an interest. In the business of life no intelligent man consents to be bound by a written instrument, prepared even by his trusted legal adviser, without reading and subsequent approval. The principal best knows what he wishes, and, when completed, he alone can tell whether his intentions have been fully complied with. Under the Kansas law, the delegates, as agents of the people, are simply clothed with power to prepare a draft of a constitution, but they are not authorized to say that their principals shall be bound by what they do. The agent can exercise no personal views of his own, but is bound to conform to the wishes of his principal. No conscientious agent will hesitate or refuse, when he can do so, to submit his doings to his principal before attempting to bind him by his acts. Such an agent would naturally desire the previous approval of what he had done, if right; and if wrong, to allow the principal an opportunity of correction before becoming finally bound. If the pressure of circumstances has, in rare instances, occasioned a different precedent, it is certain that none exist in Kansas which authorize, and much less demand, that such precedents be followed. The refusal by the convention to submit the result of their labors to the people might well raise a suspicion, if not a strong presumption, that they doubted whether they had so performed their duty as to meet the will of their constituents.

"If they desire to be certain that their labors conform to the wishes of the people, after they shall have read the arguments for and against the parts and the aggregate of their work, and formed their opinions thereon, they will not fail to afford them the most ample opportunity to do so. During the last seventy-five years, numerous State constitutions have been framed; and, with few exceptions, they have all been submitted to the people for adoption or rejection. Our national Constitution, when framed, was, through the several States, submitted to the people. So obvious was the propriety of such submission in the present case, that the President instructed the territorial Governor to protect the people when voting for or against its adoption. Under his instructions, both Secretary Stanton and Governor Walker have pledged such protection; and, until recently, and in a few quarters, no one has questioned the propriety of such submission, while its wisdom is too apparent to be doubted, where the will of the people is the acknowledged source of all power."

Mr. President, I commend to the consideration of gentlemen who take this view of the case, that the people have a right to change their mind even after the constitution is made out; just as you would have a right to change your mind after the power of attorney is framed by your agent, and conclude that they will not execute it. They may conclude thus for any reasons of their own; and so far from agreeing with the honorable Senator from South Carolina that there is a distinction on this question against a Territory as compared with a State, I insist that the distinction is in favor of the Territory, and for the very reason that the Senator alleged. Those who are the people of a Territory to-day may not be the people of the Territory six months hence by one hundred thousand; and yet, if six months hence a constitution is to be put into operation, that additional hundred thousand is as much to be governed by it as the twenty thousand who have framed it. Hence, from that very fact, from the very character of the population of the Territory, I say that it ought to be laid down as a general rule by Congress (and in this I agree with the President of the United States in his annual message) that in a Territory the constitution should in all cases be submitted to the people.

This brings to my mind a fact, which but for this line of argument, I regret to say I should have omitted. The President says that this convention, in virtue of the organic act, was bound to submit to the people the question of slavery. They were bound by the organic act he says to submit the question of slavery. What are the words that bound them? What are the words in that act that bound the convention to submit the question of slavery to the people of the Territory. Were they those words which left the people perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way? If so, it uses the language "institutions;" and that certainly means more than one. If that clause bound them to submit the question of slavery, it equally bound them to submit all others. But, Mr. President, this is only another instance of the strange inconsistencies which from time to time have been presented to the American people to induce them to sanction this unhallowed movement.

Sir, the Senator from Indiana has made this declaration: that constitutions, as a general rule, should not be submitted to the people, in the face of the expression of two conventions in his own State, held within the last four months. That convention, which he and his colleague say represented them and their friends, passed a resolution declaring that all constitutions thereafter or "hereafter" made in a Territory should be submitted to the people for adoption. The convention which subsequently assembled did the same thing in unqualified terms. There was no question in regard to the doctrine laid down by the first convention, except as to its relation to this now pending subject. But the Senator will find, that not only the people of Indiana, but the people of every State in this Union, will repudiate that ancient doctrine of Federalism. Whenever he goes before the people, and undertakes to tell them that the delegates they have appointed to be a convention are placed above and beyond them, that the opinions of those delegates are wiser and better and purer than the power that made them, he will be very apt to hear from that people the language, "Depart from me; I know you not." Sir, the people of this Union (I care not by what denomination you call them) would never agree to a doctrine which takes from them the power to govern themselves—never. They do not believe in immaculate agencies. They do not believe that anybody is made by the grace of God, booted and spurred, to ride over and govern them. They believe that the independent private citizen, in the majesty of his own constitutional power, is one of the recipients of all authority—placed in his hands not by the power of a convention, but by the great Creator who made him. That is the reason why the people, in this Government, are the source of all power. It is because they are in the image of God, and possess an intellect graciously vouchsafed by Him to them. Knowing their rights, they have the ability to execute them. Clothed with those rights, and knowing them, they will execute them despite the efforts of all other sources of power, come from where they may.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the questions involved in the debate upon the admission of Kansas into the Union as a coequal State have been so thoroughly and ably discussed upon both sides, that I have hesitated whether I should take part in it, and at one time had abandoned all idea of so doing. Subsequent reflection, however, has satisfied me that it is a duty which I owe as well to my immediate constituents as to the country, to assign the reasons which will control my vote; for though no one can suppose that any vote in this body will be affected by the debate, yet if the views I have to present may perchance change the adverse opinions or remove the lingering doubts of a single citizen as to the propriety of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I shall feel that I have not spoken in vain.

Besides, sir, I am a believer in the capacity of the American people for self-government, and hold that it is by discussion—full, frank, and ardent discussion, if you will—addressed to the intelligence, and not to the passions of the people, that a Republic must be sustained.

In this stage of the debate, I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to those matters which I deem material to the decision of the immediate question before the Senate: whether Kansas shall be admitted as a State under the Lecompton constitution, or whether that constitution shall be rejected, and the people of Kansas be suffered to remain under the territorial government? There are two classes of opponents to the admission of Kansas. One consists of the Republican party, with whom the real and vital objection is that her constitution tolerates slavery; and therefore, irrespective of any other objection, as it is a cardinal rule of their political faith that in the future no slaveholding State shall be admitted into the Union, they object to the admission of Kansas. The second class consists of Senators who have hitherto acted with the Democratic party—fortunately but few—who, disclaiming any objection to the admission of Kansas on the ground that her constitution tolerates slavery, hold that it was adopted in violation of the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and that, in its mode of adoption, the great principle of popular sovereignty was violated.

Now, sir, there are three rational grounds, if sustained, (and a fourth question may be added,) which would form valid objections to the admission of Kansas or any other Territory as a State. The first objection is, the want of sufficient population; the second, that the constitution is not republican; the third, that it is not the result of the legally expressed will of the people. To these I would add a fourth question: whether the admission or rejection of Kansas will be most conducive to the interests, the peace, and the prosperity of the Federal Union? On the first two grounds no objection is made. The sufficiency of the population of Kansas has been either admitted or waived throughout the debate. As to the second, it will scarcely be denied that the inchoate State has presented a constitution republican in form. The third ground, whether this constitution is the result of the legally expressed will of the people, presents most of the points of contest except those which arise from the determination on the part of the Republican party in future to admit no slaveholding State into the Union.

In considering this third ground, we must look first to the power of Congress over a Territory acquired for the common benefit of the people of all the States. I do not doubt as to the extent of their authority, nor do I mean to enter into any discussion as to its origin. I am satisfied to accept it as it has been hitherto exercised. Since the origin of the Government, Congress has always exercised the right to dispose of the soil, to permit or restrict its settlement by the citizens of the country, and to organize territorial governments where the settlement was permitted, with a view to the formation of future States; and in the exercise of this authority, Congress, in the early stages of the Republic, delegated to the people of the Territory the power of self-government more sparingly than has been the usage in later days.

Formerly, many of the Territories were governed by the judges and Governor; in others, there was an Assembly who were allowed to nominate members of a Council, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and the two together, with the Governor, governed the Territory. In some cases, the Governor had an absolute veto on the acts of the Legislative Assembly. In others, the laws were required to be submitted to Congress for approval. This was the earlier course of action in the delegation of power by Congress; and I admit that, whilst the people occupy a Territory of the United States, their right of government within the Territory is a delegated right.

Gradually, in accordance with the spirit of the institutions of this country, Congress has enlarged the popular control over the government of the Territories, in their territorial form, until finally, in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, nearly full powers of government were delegated.

In the true construction of that bill, and drawing the intent of Congress, not from the views which might have been entertained by individual legislators at the time of its passage, but from the language used by the Legislature as expressive of their intent, the conclusion seems irresistible that its provisions delegated to the people and Territorial Legislature of Kansas all the powers that we could constitutionally exercise in the Territory; except those which are expressly excepted in the act itself. Subject to the Constitution of the United States, and the express exceptions of the act, all powers of legislation are vested in the people of Kansas, through their Territorial Legislature.

I am aware that the objection is made—I believe in the paper presented by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] as the views of one of the minority of the Committee on Territories—that, without an express authority from Congress, the Territorial Legislature, with the assent of the people, have no right or power to prepare the Territory for admission into the Union as a sovereign State; and secondly, that they cannot at their own will and pleasure resolve themselves into a sovereign power, abrogate and annul the organic act and territorial government ordained by Congress, and establish a constitution and State government upon their ruins, without the consent of Congress. I differ with him as to the law on the first ground. I admit fully the doctrine stated in the second, but deny its application to Kansas, or that there has been any attempt to subvert the territorial government without the consent of Congress. That I may do no injustice, I will read from the views of the Senator from Illinois at page 62 of the document containing the report of the committee and his minority views. After citing the authority of the Attorney General of the United States under the administration of Andrew Jackson in reference to the territorial organization of Arkansas, he says:

"Thus it appears that under the administration of General Jackson, the doctrine obtained, and I have never heard its correctness questioned until the present session of Congress, that a convention assembled under the authority of a Territorial Legislature, 'without an express authority from Congress,' had no right or power to prepare the Territory for admission into the Union as a sovereign State, and thereby abrogate or impair the authority of the Territorial Legislature over all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the organic act."

In support of this doctrine, he makes quotations from the opinion of Mr. Butler, then Attorney General of the United States. I shall read two clauses of that opinion, to show both the terms of the act upon which the opinion was given, and the conclusion at which the Attorney General arrived; and shall then endeavor to show there is a broad distinction in the delegation of power between the authority delegated by the United States to the people of the Territory of Arkansas, and that which is delegated to the Territory and people of Kansas by the Kansas-Nebraska act. In the "Opinions of the Attorney General," volume 2, page 728, on "The right of Territories to become States," this is the language of Mr. Butler:

"The act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri, approved June 4, 1812, and which is adopted in the laws relating to Arkansas as defining the powers of the legislative department, declares 'that the General Assembly shall have power to make laws in all cases, both civil and criminal, for the good government of the people of said Territory, not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the Constitution and laws of the United States.'"

This gives the language of the act establishing a territorial government for Arkansas. The conclusion at which the Attorney General arrived upon the authority delegated in such terms, is to be found at page 732, and it is:

"No law has yet been passed by Congress which either expressly or impliedly gives to the people of Arkansas the authority to form a State government. For the reasons above stated, I am, therefore, of opinion that the inhabitants of that Territory have not, at present, and that they cannot acquire, otherwise than by an act of Congress, the right to form such a government."

Now, Mr. President, what are the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska act? The delegation of power to the Territorial Legislature of Arkansas was that they might make all laws, both civil and criminal, for the good government of the people of the Territory, not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the Constitution of the United States. When the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, every one knows that the great object of extending the powers of the Territorial Legislature was that the agitating question of slavery might be withdrawn from the Halls of Congress. It may have failed in effecting that object, but the failure does not alter or affect the intent and construction of the law. The Kansas-Nebraska bill, in the nineteenth section, after describing the boundaries of the Territory of Kansas, provides that the Territory within those boundaries is "hereby created into a temporary government, by the name of the Territory of Kansas; and when admitted as a State or States, said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission." Section twenty-two, in conferring legislative power, gives it in the broadest language that is possible to be employed. It provides that "the legislative power and authority of said Territory," not for any particular purpose; not confined as in the case of Arkansas, but "the legislative power and authority of said Territory shall be vested in the Governor and a Legislative Assembly." Then in section twenty-four comes the limitation, "that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act." The act then specifies three exceptions; that there shall be no law passed by the Territorial Legislature, interfering with the primary disposal of the soil; that no tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; and that no greater tax shall be imposed upon the property of non-residents than on the property of residents. These are the only exceptions, other than those imposed by the Federal Constitution.

On all legal reasoning, with a general grant of legislative power over all rightful subjects of legislation, inasmuch as this Territory was formed for the purpose of becoming a future State, is there not an implied power to take the preparatory steps for a State organization? The authority to make a State is twofold: first the people of a State forming a State constitution, which we have no right to prescribe or form for them; and next, the consent of Congress to the admission of that State into the Union. Is there not under this law full authority given to the people of Kansas, under territorial legislation, to prepare and form a State constitution with a view to admission into the Union with the consent of Congress? Congress did not delegate the power to come into the Union, because that would be an infraction of the Federal Constitution, and the grant of legislative power is subject to the Constitution. The admission into the Union must be an act in presenti—an act of Congress, no matter what its form. The admission, or the recognition, or consent of Congress, if you so please, must be an act in presenti after the State constitution has been formed. Is there any restriction, then, in the general grant of legislative power, which prohibits what the people of Kansas have done? Is there the remotest resemblance or analogy to be drawn from the Arkansas case as to the intent of Congress to authorize the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas to provide for holding an election at which the will of one of these authorities necessary to form a State was to determine whether it would form a State constitution? The authority of the Territorial Legislature to ascertain by election the will of the people of Kansas, comes within the general grant of legislative power; and most certainly it cannot be contended that a general grant of power may not, by necessary implication, convey authority as fully as an express grant of the particular power in question; and in reference to the Kansas bill, the expression of the exceptions out of the general grant renders the implication irresistible that all other acts of legislation consistent with the Federal Constitution legitimately belonged to the territorial government.

But, sir, the qualification of the opinion of the honorable Senator from Illinois is, that they have no authority to form a State constitution for the purpose of subverting the territorial government, without the consent of Congress. Who contends that they have? Here is his language as employed at page 53 of the document containing his views:

"By the Kansas-Nebraska act the people of the Territory were vested with all the rights and privileges of self-government on all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with, and in obedience to, the organic act; but they were not authorized, at their own will and pleasure, to resolve themselves into a sovereign power, and to abrogate and annul the organic act and territorial government established by Congress, and to ordain a constitution and State government upon their ruins without the consent of Congress."

I concede, Mr. President that no such power exists; but the answer is, that no such power was attempted to be exercised by the Territorial Legislature and people of Kansas. The subversion of the territorial government without the consent of Congress, is an act widely different from the authority exercised by the Territorial Legislature in authorizing, by law, the taking of the sense of the people of Kansas, who, and who alone, could form a State constitution; and when their wishes were ascertained, framing a State constitution to go into effect by actual organization under it, when, and not until, Congress should agree to admit Kansas as a State. The two things are essentially different. It seems susceptible of demonstration, that no act done by the people of Kansas under the authority of the territorial government, was intended to subvert that government without the consent of Congress; and, therefore, the objection falls to the ground, because it is not supported by the facts of the case.

The honorable Senator from Illinois recites a clause of the constitution of Kansas, as adopted and sent to us, which declares that—

"This constitution shall take effect and be in force from and after its ratification by the people, as hereinbefore provided."

That is a very proper provision, but the declaration must be taken in connection with the other clauses of the instrument; and, referring to them, you find that there is to be no organization of government, and that none was contemplated or intended, until Congress should assent to the State constitution, and admit Kansas into the Union. The object of the clause in question is very obvious. The State constitution was to take effect from the time of ratification, provided Congress should sanction the proceeding by admitting Kansas as a State. If Congress did assent to the action of the people under the authority of the Territorial Legislature, then the retrospective operation would be to give a legal effect to the elections held under the State constitution, and nothing more. The validity of the elections was made dependent upon the will of Congress; and the principle involved, and the object to be attained, was in accordance with the principle on which Congress has frequently acted in admitting Senators from States, elected before the States were admitted as members of the Union. Acting on the principle, omnis ratihabitio retrotrahitur et mandato equiparatur, this declaration was made for the purpose of giving a retrospective effect and validity to the constitution, after the action of Congress should have called the organization of the Government into existence. This does not rest on mere argument. Now for the facts. Provision is made that—

"This constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next ensuing session, and as soon as official information has been received that it is approved by the same, by the admission of the State of Kansas as one of the sovereign States of the United States, the President of this convention shall issue his proclamation to convene the State Legislature at the seat of Government within thirty-one days after publication."

It is very evident that no government could have been contemplated in subversion of the territorial government except with the consent of Congress, because the legislative power was not to come into existence by organization until after Congress had approved the law; but the provisions do not stop there; not only is there no time prescribed for the assembling of the Legislature until after Congress have admitted the State, but in the same constitution it is provided:

"The first general election in this State shall be held on the day and year provided by this constitution, and all general elections thereafter on the day and year provided by subsequent legislative enactment."

Without assembling the Legislature, there can be no State organization, and no subsequent elections of any kind; and it is provided that the State Legislature shall not assemble until thirty days after proclamation that Congress has admitted Kansas as a State into the Union. The evidence, however, becomes conclusive. The twelfth section of the schedule declares:

"The Governor, and all other officers, shall enter upon the discharge of their respective duties as soon after the admission of the State of Kansas as one of the independent and sovereign States of the Union as may be convenient."

Sir, with these provisions standing in this constitution, can it be seriously urged that it was the intention of the Territorial Legislature, or the people of Kansas to subvert the territorial government without the consent of Congress? They provide for an election of State officers, but it passes for nothing, and those officers are never to enter upon the discharge of their functions, unless Congress shall ratify the act of the Territorial Legislature, and the people of Kansas, by admitting her as a State into the Union. There is no room for controversy that the State organization was made dependent upon the will of Congress. Then the objection, in fact, does not apply. The authority we delegated was a right to legislate for the purpose of ascertaining the will of the people of Kansas, and the right to form a State constitution subject to our consent, and Kansas has been strictly legal in her course. The Legislature prescribed an election for that purpose, and the will of the people was expressed at that election. Subsequently they provided for the election of delegates to frame a constitution. The people of Kansas elected those delegates, and they provided in their own way for the submission of the constitution as formed for the ratification of the people; and it was ratified by the people of Kansas.

Can I be told, then, that the legally expressed will of the people of Kansas is not embodied in this constitution, or that there was anything revolutionary in their action? That action does not contemplate the organization of a State government, as the Topeka constitution did, (which I shall show hereafter,) without the consent of Congress. If you choose to reject the Lecompton constitution, you leave Kansas in her territorial condition, and everything contained in it is a perfect nullity. It is to go into effect, for all practical purposes, as an organized government, only after Congress has admitted Kansas into the Union. Is there revolution in that? Is there anything illegal in such an exercise of power? Was it not competent for Congress to grant, under the Nebraska bill, power to the Territorial Legislature to ascertain the will of the people of the Territory, upon a subject-matter on which Congress could not act without the expression of their will; and had not these people the right to form a constitution, without claiming or attempting to derogate from the authority of Congress, by the organization of a State government without its consent.

Believing, therefore, that it was perfectly competent, under the grant of powers to the territorial government and people of Kansas, contained in the organic law called the Kansas-Nebraska act, for the Legislature to ascertain the sense of the people, and to provide for forming a State constitution, which was to be organized after our consent was given, and considering all this to be strictly and perfectly legal, the question arises: what were their acts, and has the will of the people been expressed in a manner that authorizes us to admit Kansas as a State? whether, in other words, under the lawful authority vested by us in the Territorial Legislature and people of Kansas, the Legislature have authorized the people to express first their sense that a State ought to be formed; whether they afterwards authorized delegates to be elected to form that constitution; and whether that constitution, as it is presented to us, is the will of the people of Kansas legally expressed. Ay, sir, and fairly expressed, for if it is, there can be no objection to her admission as a State, unless on the ground that her constitution tolerates slavery.

The first election in the Territory of Kansas took place on the 30th of March, 1855. The organic act vested in the Governor the right to canvass the returns, and to give the seats to such members as, on that canvass, he ascertained were entitled to them under that law. There could be no other mode in which the canvass could be made. The Governor (Reeder) certainly cannot be accused of any proclivities against Free-Soilism. He has disconnected himself, throughout his career in Kansas, with the intentions and wishes of the Democratic party; he seems to have had no desire for a peaceful settlement of the Kansas question, but a disposition, for some purpose—I shall not pause to investigate his motives—to create difficulties, and throw that Territory into hostile relations to the Government of the United States. This Governor, to whom the authority was delegated, gave seats to more than a quorum of the members of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, in 1855. Some seats were vacated by him, and he ordered new elections. When the Legislature assembled, the right of investigation and decision being vested in them, under the organic law, they filled up their own body.

I am perfectly aware that, on the other side, it is said, not that there was fraud in the first election—that is not the allegation—but, by an afterthought, after the Legislature had assembled, it was charged that the election was carried by an armed invasion from the State of Missouri. I shall not enter into that question. It has been decided by the Congress of the United States to be a valid election. It was conducted under all the forms of law; as I believe, rightfully conducted. It was ratified by the verdict of the American people, in the election of 1856, by which the present President became Chief Magistrate of the Union. I hold, therefore, that there can be no shadow of doubt—and I presume Senators on this side of the Chamber who are opposed to the admission of Kansas will not now question it—as to the validity of the Territorial Legislature elected in March, 1855. If they do not question that, it would seem difficult for them to escape from the conclusion that the will of the people of Kansas has been legally expressed to us in their subsequent elections, and that we are bound to take the constitution presented as the result of that legally-expressed will.

After the Legislature was organized, there was a portion of the people of the Territory of Kansas (whether a majority or a minority outside of the legal expression of their will is perfectly immaterial) who questioned the validity of the organization of the Territorial Legislature, as, indeed, it was questioned by the party with whom they acted in concert in this body and in the House of Representatives of the United States. This minority, as I believe they were then, whatever they may be now, assumed a revolutionary attitude—which I shall comment upon hereafter—and refused to vote at any election between the month of March, 1855, and the month of October, 1857. I presume it will not be denied that a portion (on the other side it is alleged that a large majority) of the people of Kansas refused to vote at the elections held in October, 1856, and June, 1857. Then what is the rational rule applicable to such action? The only principle on which a republican government can stand is that a majority of the votes cast shall be held to be a majority of those entitled to vote, and therefore obligatory; subject, of course, to inquiry into the legality of the proceeding by the body to whom the inquiry rightfully and legally belongs. In elections in the States, under that rule of order, we constantly admit elections by plurality alone, and sometimes pluralities constituting not one third of the whole number of actual votes cast. A plurality elects members of Congress, Governors, and other functionaries throughout the Union in most of the States. What induces it? Because it is a necessary rule of order to prevent convulsion and revolution. Whether a majority of the people do not vote, from indifference or from any other cause, resting on their own volition, is immaterial. Those who do not vote must be understood, under the necessary rule upon which republican governments are founded, as consenting that the majority of those who do vote shall decide for them. On no other implication can a government of numbers be preserved. The implication is not that those who do not vote are satisfied with the action of, or would vote in the same way with the majority of those who do vote; but it is a presumptio juris et de jure necessary to the very existence of a republican government that those who do not vote, having the opportunity to vote, must be considered as assenting that the question to be decided shall be decided by the majority of those who do vote.

But, Mr. President, it is said that frauds have been perpetrated. This may be so. I think it not improbable. When you look to the agitation that took place immediately after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the organization throughout different parts of the country—I make no allusions to particular States—for the purpose of sending into the Territory of Kansas, not emigrants in the natural course of settlement, but emigrants for the purpose of establishing there an abolition State, it is not improbable that the people of the neighboring State of Missouri, bordering on Kansas, naturally became excited by the danger of such a population to their own institutions; and that as there were lands there suitable for their purpose, they should flock there for the purpose of making a settlement, so as to prevent the establishment of a government by persons so hostile to the vital interests of Missouri. Under these circumstances, in a border country, it would be idle to suppose that no irregularities, (or frauds, as they are called,) that no illegal voting should occur or no violence should be used. I have little doubt that irregularities, illegal voting, and frauds, may be charged upon both sides; but as regards statements taken from newspapers, or testimony even upon oath, as to specific acts of fraud derived from partisan sources, I have seen too much in a forensic life of the liability to bias and misstatement in human testimony, under less exciting causes, to place the slightest reliance upon such testimony, unless under the most rigid cross-examination and subjected to the severest scrutiny. But, sir, the question is not whether there were frauds or irregularities committed in any election in the Territory of Kansas, but whether we are the appropriate body to inquire into allegations of that kind. Under the principles of the Nebraska bill, which meant to vest sovereignty in the people and Territorial Legislature of Kansas, Congress intended they should determine all these questions for themselves. The very object of the bill was to withdraw from Congress struggles connected with the exciting passions of the character which have led to the disorganization in Kansas.

But, sir, I believe it is a maxim of all philosophy, that, when you find one sufficient cause for a result, you ought never to look further. I hold that there is an all-sufficient cause, without reference to any allegations of fraud, to account for the vote of the people of Kansas, as expressed in their different elections, in the fact that those who were called the Topeka party by their opponents, (whether a majority or a minority,) refused to vote; refused to exercise their elective franchise, no matter under what pretense. Whether that refusal resulted from indifference, or whether it resulted from the assumption that their votes would not effect their purposes, they cannot complain that, whenever they refused or neglected to exercise their right, others should decide for them. Does any Senator doubt that, at the election in the fall of 1856, in which the people of Kansas determined their will was that a State constitution should be formed; that the election in June, 1857, when they elected delegates to form a constitution; or that, at the vote taken for the purpose of ratifying it under two aspects in which it was presented, there was a bonafide majority of those who voted, who were in favor of forming a State constitution, of electing the delegates, and of ratifying the constitution, in the manner in which it is presented? I presume not. There was, in those elections, no necessity and no object to induce frauds. The truth is, that one party voted, and one party alone; the other declined to vote. This cause, then, is all-sufficient to account for the mode of forming and the adoption of the constitution without reference to these profuse allegations of fraud. We come, then, to the practical principle, that those who, having the right to vote, by their own default in refusing to vote, or attempting to vote, are, in reason and justice, not by any narrow technical rule of estoppel, but on every principle of order in human government, estopped to question the decision of those who, abiding by the law, exercised their rights as voters. What other principle has been adopted in any State to ascertain the will of the people? and on what other principle could any election be sanctioned or sustained? In the great State of Pennsylvania, when amendments to her constitution were submitted to the people of the State, not one half of those who voted for Governor at the same time voted on those amendments; yet no one ever questioned the validity of that vote, and that a majority of those who did vote settled the question. There were, say twenty thousand votes against one hundred thousand on those amendments, while the actual vote of the State for State officers was over three hundred thousand; yet a majority of those who did vote on the constitutional amendments must be, and were, considered as carrying the assent of all; not that all agreed with them in opinion, but that all who did not vote agreed that those who did should decide the questions submitted. This is an essential rule from the form of our republican governments, and without it no organized government of numbers, founded on the principle of self-government, could be maintained.

I hold, then, sir, that, no matter what the cause, if the fact be (and I presume it will scarcely be denied) that a large portion of the people of Kansas, whether a majority or minority is immaterial, willfully and deliberately refused, on any pretense whatever, to vote at the election which authorized the constitution to be made, and at those which elected the delegates and ratified the constitution, those who did vote must be considered as embodying the legally and fairly expressed will of the people of Kansas, not on technical grounds, but on the only grounds upon which the government of any State in this Union does or can stand.

I conclude, therefore, both that there was plenary power in the Territorial Legislature to authorize these elections, as the legitimate evidence of the will of the people of Kansas, and that they were not merely lawful, but strictly and perfectly legal; and that the constitution formed under them does not contemplate a subversion of the territorial government without the consent of Congress. That when the Legislature had thus authorized these elections, and the people of the Territory had voted, the decision of those who did vote must be held to be the legal expression of the will of the whole people, which the indifferent, the negligent, or the factious, are estopped to deny or question.

But, sir, all these allegations of fraud have, in fact, no application whatever to these elections. I have heard no pretense or specification that, at the election to decide whether Kansas should form a State constitution, there were any frauds committed in the votes taken. Nor has any fraud been alleged in reference to the election of delegates to the convention which framed the constitution, nor at the election in December last, when it was ratified. The allegation of frauds relates to the election subsequently held for members of the Legislature, under the constitution, in January last. Over that election we have no pretense of authority. We might as well interfere with the election of Representatives of a State Legislature; because, if this constitution was legally formed, and legally expressed the will of the people, we are under an implied obligation, under the treaty with France, and the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, to admit the State; and if we admit the State, our admission gives effect to the constitution from the time of its ratification. Of course the authority of the Legislature, when it meets, to inquire into the rights of persons to seats in that body will be the same in the State of Kansas as in any other State of the Union. The returns were, in the first instance, to be made to the president of the convention. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] objects to that as an unauthorized action, on the ground that the convention could give no such authority to its president; yet in this famous Topeka constitution, for which he voted two years ago, the provision is not only that the chairman of the executive committee should be the judge of the returns; but that—

"Until otherwise provided by law, the chairman of the executive committee of Kansas Territory shall announce by proclamation the results of the elections and the names of the persons elected to office.

"No person shall be entitled to a seat in the first General Assembly at its organization except the members whose names are contained in the proclamation of the chairman of the executive committee; but after the General Assembly is organized, seats may be contested in the usual way."

This far exceeds the authority conferred on the president of the constitutional convention assembled at Lecompton, because he was simply to investigate the returns, and duplicates were to be left in the hands of the judges, and he was to certify the result of the election. The other is a broad power to the chief of an executive committee of a revolutionary party, organizing themselves as they did, that his proclamation should be conclusive evidence of the rights of all members to seats in the first Legislature, and then that the matter should be referred to them. It was not a power of investigation; it was simply a right of proclamation—in other words, the chairman of the executive committee had the right to seat whom he pleased, according to the Topeka constitution. If such a power could be vested then, and supported by the Republican party in this body and the House of Representatives, I ask with what semblance of consistency can that party now question the authority of Mr. Calhoun? I notice this only in passing, not that I suppose any weight can be attached to such an objection.

I have said there is no allegation of fraud as to any elections which we should supervise for the purpose of determining whether Kansas should be admitted as a State. There are no alleged frauds, no specifications, no scintilla of proof as to frauds in the election by which the people of Kansas authorized a convention to be called. There was no opposition to the delegates elected to the convention, because a portion of the people refused obstinately to vote, standing in a rebellious and revolutionary attitude. There were no frauds in the ratification election, even if ratification was essential. The constitution, therefore, comes to us as the legally-expressed will of that portion of the voters of Kansas who chose to vote under a perfectly legal enactment; and if others did not choose to vote, of course their assent must be implied, or the structure of your Government must fall. Whoever heard or contended that frauds, if they existed, would vitiate an election, unless the result would have been different if the frauds had not have taken place? There is no pretense, in any of these elections, that the result would have been different, fraud or no fraud.

In order to vitiate the election, it must be shown that the fraudulent or illegal voting has been sufficiently extensive to alter the result; or, at least, to render it uncertain. But, where frauds have not existed to such an extent as to prejudice the rights of bona fide voters and overrule their decision, however worthy of condemnation, they cannot vitiate the election. If they did, the fraudulent might always defeat any election, and so disorganize government.

The next question, Mr. President, is whether it is essential to the validity of this constitution that it should have been ratified by a vote of the people of Kansas, and if that be necessary, whether it has been so ratified? I cannot doubt that when the people elect delegates with authority to form a constitution, they vest in their delegates, if there is no limitation of power in the law under which they are elected, the absolute and entire sovereignty of the State; and those delegates may form a constitution which will become valid and obligatory without any subsequent action of the people; or they may—and, in my judgment, it is safer and wiser in a republican Government—submit that constitution to the people for ratification.

I held this doctrine in a convention assembled in my own State a few years ago, and have been charged in some papers there, mingled with something of personal bitterness, and also in papers here and in Pennsylvania, with action inconsistent with the opinions I then expressed in advocating the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Sir, I have changed no opinion I then entertained. I claim no exemption from error incident to humanity, and shall never hesitate, when I do change a previous opinion, to avow the change, and give the reasons which produce it.

In this case I have no admission to make; for I thought then, and think still, that it is better—that it is the duty of a convention, for a reason which I shall state—to submit the constitution which they frame to the people. It is in their discretion. They have the power to make a constitution which is as valid without as with submission. Of that there can be no doubt. To admit the doctrine—for which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] did seem to half contend—that a constitution would not be valid unless it was submitted to and approved by the people, would invalidate the constitutions of all the earlier States of the Union. Sir, I was born, and have lived, and live now, under a constitution which never was submitted to the people; yet never for a moment have I doubted its validity and obligation. Perhaps I might question the wisdom, the propriety of action and adherence to duty of a delegate to a convention who refused to submit a constitution framed by him to his constituents for ratification. Such would not be my own course, with my present and former convictions; and for this reason, in forming a constitution founded upon the social compact, the people at large being the basis of power, I think it wiser, with a view to its permanence and stability, and in order to prevent mutability, that it should be ratified by the vote of the people over whom it is to exist as the organic law. That is the only reason. But what right has Congress to control the mode of forming the constitution of Kansas? Just what it would have had if the convention in Delaware, in 1853, had determined not to submit the constitution they formed to the people. Your interference would be unwarrantable in either case. Of what concern is it to the Congress of the United States whether a convention of delegates who form a constitution in Delaware, or any other State, determine to act finally themselves, or choose to submit it to their constituents? The responsibility is there, not here. Of its validity there can be no doubt; and when Kansas is forming a State constitution, you have as little right to inquire into the mode in which she pleases to form it as you have to inquire into the mode in which any other State has formed her constitution. It is sufficient for Congress that it is republican in form, and that it represents the will of the people. Even if Senators or members of the Kansas convention would have considered the submission of the constitution to the people as the rightful and proper action on the part of that body, we have no right here to interfere with that question without an invasion of the rights and duties of others.

But, Mr. President, there is another point connected with this doctrine of submission, and that is the mode of submission. Submission does not merely mean submitting the whole constitution for the purpose of public approval or public dissent. That course may be adopted, and in some instances, may be preferable; but, in my judgment, the true mode of submitting constitutions for the ratification of the people is to select the great principles, the leading provisions on which the people are known to be divided in opinion, and thus allow them to ratify those which they approve, and reject those which they do not. In this way, you will have in the result the true will of the State; but in the submission of a constitution as a whole, even though a majority may ratify it, it may embody many provisions which the same majority, if they had been submitted separately, would have rejected. The submission, therefore, should not include mere formal provisions, about which there is no difference of opinion; but the good faith required on the part of the representative who forms the constitution is that, having formed an organic law, he should fairly submit, for the decision of the people, those questions on which he knows or believes there is division of sentiment among his constituents. This seems the true and proper mode of submitting constitutions for ratification, and the only mode in which submission can correctly ascertain the will of the people. In my own State we have had an illustration of the necessity of this rule. When the last convention met, there were three great questions to be decided: first, representation in proportion to population; second, the prepayment of taxes as a qualification for voting. The amendments on both these subjects, I was decidedly in favor of; but there was a division of opinion in the State on another question, whether we should alter the existing judicial tenure of good behavior. To such an alteration I was as decidedly opposed. Can it be supposed that every man who differed on these questions would not have preferred that they should be submitted separately to the people? And would not the will of the people of Delaware have been more truly ascertained by submitting them distinctively, than by the submission of the amendments as a whole? Had I remained a member of that convention to its close, I should have advocated that mode of submission, because I desired to defeat one proposed amendment, and was equally desirous to adopt the others.

In reference to this mode of adoption, let me now consider the present case. According to the Kansas-Nebraska bill we agree that the people of Kansas are to form their domestic institutions in their own way. The organic law by which those domestic institutions are ultimately to be established must certainly be formed in their own way, or they have not the control of their own institutions. The material question is, whether the mode of ratification adopted by the convention did not submit to the people of Kansas, if they had chosen to vote, the only question about which there was difference of opinion among the people, and submit it fairly? According to all that I have read or heard in reference to the dissentient opinions that exist in Kansas, there is but one ground on which the people have differed, and which has formed them into hostile parties; and that is, whether the institution of slavery should or should not be established. There is a provision of the Kansas constitution that free negroes shall not emigrate into the State. The same provision was inserted in the Topeka constitution, or in an ordinance annexed to it; and whether called an organic ordinance, or a part of the constitution, is immaterial. On this question the two parties did not differ. I know, then, of no dissentient opinions whatever among the people of Kansas as to the provisions which should exist in their State constitution, except as to the establishment of the institution of slavery. There is high and conclusive evidence of this. First, what was the question submitted? The Kansas constitution provided for holding an election on the 21st of December, the ballot-boxes of which were to be kept by clerks appointed by the judges; and then that the ballots cast at said election should be indorsed "constitution with slavery," and "constitution with no slavery." That is clearly, in the natural import of the words, a direct submission to the people of Kansas of the question whether the institution of slavery shall be prohibited by the organic law of Kansas, or whether it shall be tolerated by that organic law. What follows? If the majority is for the constitution with slavery, the president of the convention is to submit to Congress the constitution unaltered; but, if "a majority of the legal votes cast at said election be in favor of the constitution with no slavery," then the article providing for slavery shall be stricken from the constitution by the president of the convention, and slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with."

The general proposition is, that, if the people vote for the constitution with no slavery, the article allowing slavery shall be stricken out, and that slavery shall not exist in Kansas, except as regards the right of property in existing slaves. Such was the question submitted; and I have said that the only question on which the people of Kansas were divided was, whether the institution of slavery should be established in Kansas. I hold the evidence of it in my hand; not a newspaper report, not a telegraph dispatch, but "the proceedings of the people of Kansas in mass meeting at Topeka on the 4th of July, 1856," when we were deliberating here in reference to their admission under the Topeka constitution. I take it for granted that the facts asserted in their resolutions will not be denied by their supporters here. These resolutions were sent to me at the time in a letter from Chicago, and I presume other Senators received similar letters during the session of 1856, inclosing the proceedings of the Topeka mass meeting, after they had elected their Legislature and organized their revolutionary government. I shall refer to another of their resolutions hereafter, for a different purpose:

"We, the people of Kansas, in mass convention assembled at Topeka, July 4, 1856, in favor of preserving forever the freedom of this Territory and State, and the total exclusion of slavery, do herein distinctly state our position and our cause, that our fellow-citizens in the North and the South, at the East and the West, as well as at the Government of the United States, may rightly appreciate our motives and conduct.

"1. We do most solemnly declare before God and our fellow men, that we have asked no more than a fair and impartial vote; a free vote on the part of the citizens of this Territory as to whether the institution of slavery should or should not be established in this Territory."

These resolutions were adopted on the 4th of July, 1856. In October, 1856, under a law passed in July, 1855, by the Territorial Legislature, an election was held to determine whether a convention to frame a State constitution should be called, and the people of Kansas decided that it should be called. At this election none of these people voted. They adhered to the Topeka constitution, and continued in a revolutionary attitude. The Territorial Legislature, in obedience to the decision of the people, in February, 1857, passed an act prescribing the time, place, and manner of electing delegates to a convention to form a constitution; and the act was framed on the model of the bill rejected here by the House of Representatives in the summer of 1856. Was this law not fair? Did it contain any of those test oaths or restrictions on the right of voting which were the grounds of objection to voting in 1856? None whatever.

The election of delegates, under this act, was held in June, 1857, and the Topeka party still refused to exercise the right of suffrage, though it was fully secured by the provisions of the law. If they had the majority, which is alleged, and had performed their duties as citizens, they might have elected a majority of the delegates, and formed such a constitution as they desired. The delegates elected by the law-abiding citizens of Kansas at this election, formed a State constitution with a view to admission into the Union as a State. They had the authority, as there was no restriction in the law under which they were elected, to form a valid constitution without submitting it for ratification; but they did submit this, the only question upon which the Topeka party solemnly declared they asked for a fair and impartial vote—"whether the institution of slavery should or should not be established" in Kansas.

The election was held December 21, 1857, and still this alleged majority, notwithstanding their declaration, refused to vote.

The objection that they were compelled to vote for the constitution whichever way their vote was cast, is the mere pretense of disorganizers. On their own declaration, all they wanted was a fair vote on the question of slavery. It was given to them; but when it was given, the same spirit of disorganization which originally led to the Topeka constitution existed to a sufficient extent to prevent them, in disregard of their own declaration, from voting at an election at which, if they had a majority, they might have determined that the institution of slavery should not exist in Kansas. It is by their own default and wrong that the constitution of Kansas presented to us tolerates the institution of slavery; and unless every rule of law and order is to be abandoned, that constitution has been ratified by the people of Kansas.

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] with the aid of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] attempts to establish that this is all a trick; that the constitution as submitted, even if the people had voted for striking out the slavery clause, would have left slavery as a permanent institution of the State, not only as to the right of property in existing slaves, but as to the issue of all existing slaves, and would have prevented manumission. The minority of the committee, in the views which they present, at page 86, say:

"They framed a constitution establishing slavery in two forms—first, for perpetuating in slavery all slaves then in the Territory and their progeny, and prohibiting abolition; second, allowing their unlimited introduction with their owners for settlement. They then provided for submitting this constitution to the people, professedly for their approval or rejection, on the 21st day of December, 1857, but in this form only, that they might vote 'the constitution with slavery,' or 'the constitution with no slavery.' If the former had a majority, the whole constitution was adopted; if the latter had a majority, it rejected only that clause allowing the further importation of slaves. They were not allowed to vote against the constitution; so it was to be adopted, however objectionable, and to be a slaveholding State, in any event. In this manner the first object was to be effected."

The honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] in his remarks, is more explicit; and so is the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] I will read what the honorable Senator from New York said, because the view taken by both is precisely the same; and I mean to controvert it. In the pamphlet speech of the honorable Senator from New York, at page 9, he uses this language:

"Each voter was permitted to cast a ballot 'for the constitution with slavery,' or 'for the constitution with no slavery;' and it was further provided, that the constitution should stand entire, if a majority of votes should be cast for 'the constitution with slavery;' while, on the other hand, if the majority of votes cast should be 'for the constitution with no slavery,' then the existing slavery should not be disturbed, but should remain, with its continuance, by the succession of its unhappy victims by descent forever. But even this miserable shadow of a choice between forms of a slave-State constitution was made to depend on the taking of a test oath."

The allegation is, that slavery was to remain forever the condition of the issue as well as of the parents. That is the point in question between us. I hold that, by the practice of every State in this Union which has ever emancipated slaves, unborn issue has never been treated as property. It is an expectancy; it may or it may not be born. It might as well be contended that, if the law of primogeniture existed in a State, and there was an heir apparent, the Legislature could not alter the law of descent, because, if it were not altered, the heir apparent would inherit the whole to the exclusion of his brothers and sisters. The law of entail affords a more striking illustration; and yet most States of the Union have abolished it without considering that they violated any right of property. The right of the heir is an expectancy alone; it is not capable of sale; it is not property. So, too, in the case of slaves, the right to the issue is a mere expectancy; it is not capable of sale; it is not property until the issue is born, because there is nothing upon which the right of property can attach; and that I suppose to be settled law. There is no State of the Union which has not acted upon this principle in abolishing slavery. In my own State, in several instances, laws have been passed setting free the issue born after a certain day, where the Legislature would not have ventured to affect the right of property in the individual who was actually existing as property.

It is true that, through the ingenuity and ability of the honorable and learned Senator from Vermont, we are referred by the Senator from Michigan to the first clause of the constitution of Kansas in relation to slavery, as showing what its framers thought of the right of property in slaves. By the provisions, however, of the clause authorizing the vote upon slavery, that article was to be stricken out, and therefore could have no obligatory effect if the people voted for the constitution "with no slavery." But the article remains in the constitution as adopted, but in reality is nothing more than a general declaration, and, like many other general declarations in constitutions, has no legal effect whatever. The language of the first section of the seventh article is:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

But be the construction of this article what it may, it was, in the event of the vote being in favor of the constitution "with no slavery," to be stricken out, and if stricken out, its provisions could have no legal effect or bearing, even for the purpose of interpretation, on the construction of that which remained as part of the constitution. The construction would rest upon the legal principles properly applicable to the interpretation of any constitution.

If the people of Kansas had voted for the constitution "with no slavery," the first section of the seventh article being stricken out, the provision in relation to slavery reads thus:

"And slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with."

If slavery is no longer to exist in the State of Kansas, and the exception merely being that no interference shall be had with slaves now in the State of Kansas, can there be a rational doubt that persons born afterwards are not now in the State of Kansas, within the plain import of the language? I do not say that this language would not cover an infant en ventre sa mere, but it would go no further. The right of property in issue does not exist until the issue is born, and by the provision slavery is positively prohibited, with the exception, that the vested right of property in slaves then in the Territory, is guarded against confiscation.

The Legislature of every State in the Union which has abolished slavery, has always guarded and protected the sacred right of property in existing slaves precisely as Kansas provided in her constitution, in the event that the decision of the people was against the continuance of the institution of slavery. In an ordinary act of legislation abolishing slavery after a given day, and excepting the right of property in existing slaves, on no rule of legal interpretation could the issue of a slave born after that day be held as a slave; for such a construction would make the exception overrule the general object and intent of the law, as well as the natural import of the words, which is entirely inadmissible. The same rules of interpretation would be applicable to the constitution of Kansas, if it had been adopted "with no slavery;" and in that event the issue of a slave born after its adoption would have been free, for a contrary construction would be in conflict, not only with the language, but the general intent of the clause which declares that "slavery shall no longer exist in Kansas."

So strong has the conviction of the necessity of guarding property against legislative confiscation always been in the minds of the people of this country that, although the clause which prohibits the taking of private property for public use without compensation did not exist at its original adoption in the Constitution of the United States, it was ratified by some of the States with the express proviso that such a clause should be inserted, and it was among the first of the amendments adopted. I presume there is not a State of the Union whose constitution does not contain a provision which guards the right of property against seizure by the public, except upon compensation given. What more in any legal intentment, or any rational construction, does this exception in the constitution of Kansas do than secure the right of property in existing slaves in Kansas, at the time of the adoption of the constitution. The general provision is that slavery shall no longer exist in Kansas if the people so will. If it had stopped there, can any one doubt that the effect would have been, as the Constitution of the United States does not interfere, to set free every slave in Kansas? But then comes the exception looking to and guarding the right of property, which is done in all civilized communities, and certainly it would be a reproach to any State in this Union if she confiscated or destroyed that which was held and treated previously as property, founded upon any freak of fanaticism, or even any real public good, moral or material in its character, without compensation to the owners of that property. That is all that the constitution of Kansas provides in the event that the people of Kansas determined that the State should not tolerate slavery.

If, then, Mr. President, the revolutionary portion of the people of Kansas had chosen to vote for the ratification of that constitution without slavery, at this day no slave could exist in Kansas who was not there in existence at the time when that constitution was ratified, unless we reject the constitution, and then slavery will remain the law of the Territory, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, until the people of Kansas form a State constitution prohibiting it. The convention properly and fairly, by no trick, but in accordance with this very Topeka resolution, which, in July, 1856, announced, before God and their country, that the only question which they desired to see fairly decided by an election was whether the institution of slavery should be established in Kansas, submitted to a fair vote of the people the only question which they said they desired to have so submitted for their decision. After the declarations at the Topeka mass meeting of their own proteges, the other side are precluded from saying there was any other question of dispute between the people of Kansas than that of slavery. All they asked was granted, and I think I give the legal interpretation of this constitution, as it would be decided in any court of justice in this country.

The honorable Senator from Michigan seems to admit, apart from the seventh article of this constitution, that the Legislature would have a right to abolish slavery without making compensation for unborn issue of slaves. If they have the right to do that—and it has been done unquestioned in every State of the Union which has become a non-slaveholding State—yet I believe in every State which has hitherto abolished slavery, they have sacredly guarded existing rights of property. They have suffered the existing slave to remain the property of his master, or provided for compensation. If I mistake not, in the State of my honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. Thomson] there are slaves still in existence; and also one or two in the State of Pennsylvania; although slavery has been abolished there for years. The men of that day, whatever may be the spirit of reckless fanaticism in ours, regarded property, no matter what it was founded upon—recognized property as a thing which no civilized community could touch without compensation.

Mr. President, there is another question connected with this Kansas constitution which shows how unjustly there have been attributed to the men who formed it designs of fraud, violence, and trickery, and other terms of opprobrium, which have been so lavished upon them by the honorable Senator from Michigan. I am aware that fraud is a very resonant word, and that repetition of the charge—mere repetition—too often creates a belief in its existence; but it should not be forgotten that assertion is not proof, nor violence of invective, evidence of rational conclusions. This very constitution of Kansas, which, it is said, as adopted, is meant to establish slavery, does not, in fact, establish it beyond legislative control. It only tolerates and authorizes slavery, but it leaves the Legislature of the State, on the principle of compensation for property, without any change of the constitution, at liberty to abolish slavery in Kansas, and to prevent the migration of slaves into Kansas whenever they see fit. Such is the provision. I will read it, and we shall then see how causeless is this outcry about the attempt to restrict the rights of the people. The right is given to a Legislature elected biennially by the will of the majority, on simply respecting existing rights of property, if they consider it necessary for the public benefit, whether material or moral, in their discretion to abolish slavery in Kansas by the payment of a sum not exceeding $150,000. Here is the provision. Article seven, section two, provides:

"The Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners, or without paying the owners, previous to their emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated."

The article does not establish slavery; it leaves it in the power of the Legislature, if the owner of the property consents, or if he does not consent, on the payment of the value of his property, to emancipate the slave for the general purposes of the public. Is that an establishment of slavery? The further provision is:

"They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to the State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States or Territories, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this State."

These provisions are the only restrictions upon the legislative control of slavery in the constitution of Kansas. The Legislature which has been elected, when it organizes, upon payment of not more than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, can set every slave free in Kansas, and prohibit the future introduction of slaves from other States. There can be no doubt of the correctness of this construction by any intelligent lawyer who will read the section. It does not provide that slavery shall not be prohibited by the Legislature of Kansas, but that it shall not be prohibited except with the consent of the owners, or on payment of an equivalent in money for the value of the slave emancipated. It does not provide that the Legislature shall not prohibit the immigration of slaves from other States recognizing slavery into Kansas, but that it shall not prohibit them as long as Kansas has similar property recognized and existing within her limits. Now, we have the authority of Governor Walker, which at this moment, I suppose, whatever might be the case formerly, gentlemen on the other side, or those who differ with us on this side, will hardly dispute—it is a matter with which he must have been acquainted—that there are not three hundred slaves in Kansas. Suppose we average them at $500 apiece—I think, myself, the soil and climate of Kansas are only adapted to slavery in a small portion of the Territory, and the probabilities therefore are, if you take into consideration the state of sentiment there and the insecurities of that kind of property, that the average would be overestimated, if you value a slave at $500; you have, then, as the outside limit the people of Kansas would have to pay for obtaining this great good, and for getting rid of this enormous outrage which has been fruitful of so much declamation, $150,000. We have been told that slavery is established there by this constitution, so that it cannot be interfered with until 1864, and yet I have shown you that, for $150,000 paid to the owners of slaves, or probably for a much smaller sum, the Legislature, without any change of the constitution, can abolish slavery in Kansas and prohibit the introduction of any more slaves into the State by a mere law, whenever the people who elect them as the exponents of their will, see fit to require such action. It is clear, therefore, that the present constitution of Kansas tolerates but does not establish slavery, and that it is in the power of the Legislature, on the simple condition that they shall not violate the right of property in existing slaves without compensation, to make Kansas a free State to-morrow if they were in session.

I am aware, sir, that I have consumed much time, and I may have to consume much more if my strength does not fail; for there are many and varied objections made to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution which should not be passed unnoticed. I have discussed such of them as I deem most material; but there are two more which I cannot pass without comment.

The honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE], who, I have no doubt, entertains his opinions quite as conscientiously as I do mine, and always enunciates them with great frankness and boldness, though sometimes, perhaps, when under the excitement of debate, with a harshness of expression as regards the opinions or conduct of others, which his own calmer judgment would not subsequently ratify—the honorable Senator from Ohio, in the speech which he made in this debate, alluding to the action of those who organized the Topeka constitution, (whom I intend to show were revolutionists and rebels,) said:

"There was no rebellion in the action of these people; nothing unlawful in it. Whatever they may have said—and I do not know what they said, for I do not watch men's words much; their actions are what I take cognizance of; their actions are what the law takes cognizance of—the people of Kansas, in framing that constitution, have done nothing more than they had a perfect right, as American citizens, to do; and I challenge all the legal acumen of this body to contradict what I now declare."

Again, he said of their action:

"But did they promise to organize under it in defiance of the laws of the United States? Not at all. From the time they called the convention, they always accompanied their action with a notice that it was to be submitted to the Congress of the United States for their approval or disapproval. It took barely the form of a petition; nothing more nor less."

Much as I may respect the honorable Senator from Ohio, I stand at issue with him here. I have before me the House document which contains the Topeka constitution, and I intend to refer to it. I agree with him that actions are more to be relied upon than words. We are not to judge by what they said alone, but by the acts which accompanied what they said. The Senator from Ohio declares that the friends of the Topeka constitution did not assume a revolutionary or rebellious attitude; that their government was intended to be provisional only, and not to go into effect but with the consent of Congress. That is what I have contended for as to the constitution framed by the people of Kansas under the authority of the law. I shall endeavor to show that such is not the character of the Topeka constitution.

The Senate will recollect that under the Lecompton constitution no organization is to take place until Congress have admitted the State, because the Legislature is never to assemble if the State be not admitted. No officer is to be sworn in or enter upon the performance of his duties until after Congress have admitted the State into the Union. There can be no doubt that the intention was to create a government only with the consent of Congress.

Now, let us examine the Topeka constitution. In the month of August, 1855, after the meeting of the first Territorial Legislature, a determination was made on the part of a portion of the inhabitants of Kansas, incited, as I suppose, by exterior influences, to set the territorial government at defiance. They held a mass meeting; they determined to have an election in disregard and in defiance of the law of the Territory, and they appointed judges for the purpose of holding this election. They did hold it; they elected delegates to a convention, and they adopted a constitution which was submitted for ratification to the people in 1855, and was reported to have been ratified by a vote of between seventeen hundred and two thousand persons—the number is immaterial. Their action was without color of legal authority, and revolutionary and lawless throughout. In the schedule which accompanies the Topeka constitution, the provision is:

"The General Assembly shall meet on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1856, at the city of Topeka at twelve, m.: at which time and place the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, judge of the supreme court, treasurer, auditor, State printer, reporter, and clerk of the supreme court, and attorney general, shall appear, take the oath of office, and enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices under this constitution; and shall continue in office in the same manner and during the same period they would have done had they been elected on the first Monday of August, A. D. 1855."

Nothing is said as to the consent of Congress; no provision is made in regard to admission into the Union as a State; but a time fixed when the officers are to be sworn in and enter upon the performance of their duties. Every officer elected by these people under their revolutionary action was to be sworn into office, and a government to be organized without application to Congress. Is not that revolution? What is the meaning of revolution and rebellion? I am aware that, in the primitive or original sense in which the word revolution or revolutionary was used, it meant simply a change of government; but the words have long since lost their primitive meaning. The English revolution of 1688 was a revolution. Why? Because it was in defiance of the existing government of the country. The Lords and Commons deposed the Crown, which constituted the third estate of the realm; and the act, therefore, was a revolution, because it was not in accordance with law, but in defiance of the existing legal authorities. As to the character of the revolution in France, no one doubts. Our own Revolution in this country was a revolution, because the Colonies owed allegiance to Great Britain; and they determined to break that allegiance, though they legally owed it, by revolution, on causes which justified revolutionary action. Revolution, in the sense in which the word is now used, designates precisely what rebellion meant formerly. It means acts done in defiance and resistance to the laws, with the intent to subvert or change the form of government without the consent, or against the consent, of the existing authorities.

I do not deny the right of revolution—that there are moral causes which will justify revolutionary action. Our fathers were rebels; but they were justifiable. Revolution almost invariably leads to war. The revolution of 1688 in England, though peaceable at its occurrence, owing to the want of power on the part of the Crown did lead ultimately to war, resulting in the invasions of 1715 and 1745 in England, and was the cause of infinite bloodshed. Such must generally, if not invariably, be the consequence of revolutions. Though peaceful at the time, if war does not immediately ensue it will be an almost inevitable consequence. But that is no reason against the existence of the right of revolution or the propriety of its exercise, if the moral causes will justify that exercise. The oppression must be intolerable, the grievance must be great, and, further, all other modes of redress must be exhausted, before revolution becomes justifiable by any people. Now, what was the position of these people in Kansas? I have shown you that they did form a government, called into existence and organized without the consent of the Territorial Legislature, in defiance of it, and in defiance of the authority of the United States. Is not that a revolutionary act? In point of fact, they engaged in revolution and rebellion, and only stopped short at the line which separates treason from rebellion, because they feared the penalties of treason.

Mr. WADE. I wish to inquire of the Senator in what consisted the treason of these persons? What were their overt acts?

Mr. BAYARD. I am speaking of the organization of a government under the Topeka constitution; not the formation of the constitution, but the organization of a government under it. I say that was an act of rebellion.

Mr. WADE. I do not know that I understand the Senator. Treason consists, in this country, I believe, in levying war against the United States or adhering to the public enemies. I want to know which of these acts these people were guilty of, or what overt acts they committed amounting to treason?

Mr. BAYARD. I will endeavor to make the honorable Senator understand me. I did not say that they had been guilty of treason. I said they had stopped short at the line of treason, whatever they might have contemplated. Though they committed a revolutionary act, an act of rebellion, in forming a State constitution, and organizing a government under it without the consent of the United States, and in defiance of their authority, and in defiance of the territorial government, they did not commit treason unless they had attempted to sustain it by force of arms.

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman inform me whether rebellion is a crime in this country? He speaks of a difference between treason and rebellion. I do not understand any such difference; but if there be rebellion, it is not criminal to my knowledge.

Mr. BAYARD. Treason is a legal offense; there must be an overt act accompanying it. You may speak of an act sustained by force of arms as rebellious or revolutionary, which is not treason—I use the words in the same sense precisely—where an act is done contrary to law, and subversive of legal authority. An organization may be effected for the purpose of revolution; and yet, if an overt act is not committed, and sustained by force of arms, it would not be treason. The distinction is very apparent. I mean to say that any Government is revolutionary in its character which is set up in defiance of the existing Government. Look back to the revolution of 1688, in England, and you have an illustration. The Crown was one of the estates of the realm. The Constitution could not be changed without the concurrent authority of the three estates, the House of Lords, the House of Commons, and the Crown; but the Lords and the Commons deposed the King, altered the line of succession, and drove him from his throne without his consent. That was a revolution because it was in defiance of the existing law and the existing authority.

What is the case here? The United States authorized the formation of a territorial government in Kansas. It was organized. No matter whether there were irregularities or not, the lawful authority to determine and certify the election of sufficient members for the organization of the Legislature, having inspected the returns, did authorize the organization, and it was recognized by Congress, and has been recognized since. A portion of the people of Kansas chose to denounce this Legislature as a fraud, as the result of an armed invasion from Missouri; and on this pretense, in defiance of the existing government, and against the authority of the United States, called a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. That they had a right to form a constitution and present it to us for recognition, if they had not attempted to organize a government under it, I do not deny—that would be a mere petition for redress of alleged grievances; but they went further, and organized a government under it. Every officer whom they elected was sworn into office, and sworn to perform his duty, and continue in the discharge of his functions without reference to any authority or consent of Congress, or any admission into the Union. That was an act of revolution and rebellion. Where is the difference between the Utah case and the conduct of those who supported the Topeka movement, except in two respects? One is, that the people of Utah stand in defiance of the laws of the United States, in defense of the doctrine of polygamy; and the Topeka people took their position in defiance of the laws of the United States on account of their determination that under no circumstances should slavery become an institution in the Territory of Kansas, whether legally established or not. The people of Utah, being more numerous and more remote, have chosen to resist, by force of arms and military organization, the Federal Government, and have become traitors as well as rebels. The Topeka people stopped short, as I have stated, at the line which separates rebellion, or revolution, from treason. Though they had organized a government, and sworn their officers to support it and perform their duties without reference to any action of Congress, they shrank from placing themselves in a treasonable position by attempting to sustain it by armed force. I am glad they paused, and should have regretted deeply such a result. Yet it is an undoubted fact that, such was their attitude in support of the government which they had organized under the Topeka constitution, that it required the forces of the United States to be kept there for the purpose of preserving the peace and enforcing the laws; and that is one of the great evils which will be remedied by the immediate admission of Kansas as a State.

I have admitted a revolution would be justifiable if the evil was intolerable, and there were no other means of redress. Had not these people other means of redress? They aver they have a majority of the inhabitants of the Territory, and have had it for a long time. The election was held for delegates to the constitutional convention in June, 1857. Would they vote? No. Had they not a right to vote? Look at the bill, and you will see that it secured a fair and full right of voting to every citizen. When the delegates were elected, they would not vote; nor would they vote when the constitution was submitted for ratification, although the opportunity to do so was fully and freely accorded. They were unwisely dissuaded, or perversely abstained, from the exercise of their rights, at both these elections. If they be a majority, they had the remedy in their own hands; and if they be not a majority, they have no right to deny that this constitution is the will of the people of Kansas, but are bound to obey it. If they had the majority they could have elected the members of the convention in June, 1857, and adopted their Topeka constitution, if they had seen fit, and ratified it by a vote of the people in such manner as the convention deemed advisable; and we could not, and would not, have denied the State admission into the Union under it. Instead of taking this orderly course, they stood aloof from all the legal elections down to October, 1857. It does not lie in their mouths now to object to the legality of the Territorial Legislature, after voting and carrying an election under its laws. The truth is, that they adhered to the Topeka constitution, and maintained their lawless and rebellious attitude down to October, 1857; and then, being better advised, or finding it perilous to assist in this course, they abandoned it, and voted at the legislative election in October, 1857; but still, the spirit of revolution or rebellion predominating, they would not vote on the ratification of the constitution on the 21st of December, 1857, though they did vote at a subsequent election, the effect of which I shall consider hereafter.

They had then a peaceful remedy, and therefore a revolutionary course was not justifiable. I have endeavored to show that they stood in an attitude of rebellion to the territorial government—or a revolutionary attitude, if that phrase be more agreeable to Senators—an attitude of resistance to the laws of the United States, for no one can deny that the Territorial Legislature was recognized by the Executive Government of the United States from the time of its origin, and that it constituted the lawful government of the Territory, and resistance to it was revolution.

But, sir, there is something more. The people at Topeka, those who there resisted the legal organization, and had nearly produced civil strife by an attempt to inaugurate a government without color of law, did not stop in their revolutionary movements with Kansas, but carried their designs still further, and sought to involve this whole Union and disorganize the Federal Government. I will read the eighth resolution passed at the mass meeting held at Topeka on the 4th of July, 1856. The Senate will recollect that we had very arduous struggles here, during the last Congress, about passing the different appropriation bills, unless with riders placed upon them, by a majority of Republicans in the House of Representatives recognizing the action of these Topeka revolutionists as legitimate and proper—no riders of ours, but theirs. I find, in this eighth resolution, where those extraordinary movements originated. That resolution is in these words:

“8. Resolved, That having hitherto invariably acted in accordance with the spirit and letter of the American Constitution, and having framed by our delegates, regularly elected, a State constitution; and believing that the only measure by which peace can be secured to this section of the Republic, and justice done to ourselves and posterity, is the immediate admission of Kansas into the Union under our present constitution, we earnestly call upon our friends in the National House of Representatives to stop all supplies until the Senate and Executive are compelled to admit us.”

Is not that a revolutionary attitude? Is that the sentiment of law-abiding citizens? Because they choose to form a government against the will of the legal government of Kansas, without color of law, and an accidental majority of their friends is obtained in one branch of the Federal Legislature, they advise those friends in the House of Representatives to disorganize the Federal Government, unless it will submit to their acts of revolution and rebellion. Such was the advice. Ah! Mr. President, was it not acted upon? Do we not all know that the appropriation bills were put in hazard? Do we not all know that the Army appropriation bill was lost under the advice contained in that resolution, and that an extra session of Congress had to be assembled, for the purpose of keeping the Army from actual disorganization, and preventing the country from being left a prey to disorder? There were provisos in other appropriation bills, which were ultimately given up; but in regard to the bill for the support of the Army of the United States, involving some fourteen million dollars, the House of Representatives tacked to it a proviso—

“That no part of the military force of the United States, for the support of which appropriations are made by this act, shall be employed in aid of the enforcement of any enactment heretofore passed by the bodies claiming to be the Territorial Legislature of Kansas."

That is the last form in which it appeared. In its first form, it was still more objectionable. On that issue, the House of Representatives adjourned, and the Army appropriation bill was lost. Is not that in accordance with the advice given in this resolution, that unless we should sanction revolution and rebellion against the authority of the United States, and admit Kansas into the Union as a State, under a constitution formed without color of law, and in defiance of existing authority, the Government of the United States should be disorganized? Do we not know, if that course had been persevered in, and the passage of the Army bill had been finally defeated, an entire disorganization of the Army throughout the country would have resulted, which would have cost the country millions of dollars for reorganization, independent of the difficulties and evils which must have been consequent upon such indefensible action? Congress adjourned on the 18th of August, the Army bill having been lost by the adherence of the House of Representatives to this proviso, and on no other ground. Congress was reassembled, and new bills were introduced, and the proviso was still adhered to. The last bill finally came to us from the House of Representatives, with the proviso I have read, on the 29th of August. In the Senate, the proviso was struck out by a strict party vote. All the Senators on the other side, who were present, with the single exception of the honorable Senator from New York, who did not vote, because he stated he had paired off, voted against the passage of the bill, with the clause struck out. The vote stood 7 to 25—every one of the seven being members of the Republican party. The bill, with our amendment, went back to the House of Representatives, and there, upon concurring in the amendment, the vote stood 101 to 98—the 98 nays being composed entirely of members of the Republican party, and the 101 yeas, of the American party and the Democratic members of the House of Representatives. The bill thus was finally passed, which prevented the disorganization of the Army, and the stoppage of supplies so as to affect the Government generally, as well as keep up the disorganization in Kansas, in accordance with the wishes of these peaceable, orderly citizens, who stood in no revolutionary attitude to the Government of the United States!

Mr. President, there is another question which I propose to notice briefly—the vote under legislative authority on January 4, 1858, which is claimed as evidence that this constitution is not the legally-expressed will of the people of Kansas. Now, I have already stated what I consider the only legitimate evidence which we can accept of the will of a people—their vote, when a question is rightfully and legally submitted to them. I have endeavored to show that at previous elections this matter was legally submitted. There were ten thousand two hundred votes polled at this election on the 4th of January. The answer is, that after the Territorial Legislature once appealed to the people of Kansas to decide whether they would form a State government, and the people had responded to them by authorizing the call for a convention, and a convention had been elected and formed a constitution, no subsequent Territorial Legislature had authority to control the action of that convention; because, whenever the people have authorized the assembling of a convention to form a constitution, its power is paramount over the existing territorial authority. Take the case of the Legislature of any of our States: the legislative power is superseded, because, when the Legislature pass a law to ascertain by a vote of the people whether a convention shall be held, and the people authorize it, the power springs from them; and then comes the act of the Legislature regulating the time, mode, and place of electing delegates, in obedience to the public will; but when the constitution assembles, is it not paramount to the legislative authority? and has any subsequent Legislature authority to qualify, or in any way interfere with, the acts of that convention? It represents the entire sovereignty of the State, and may adopt a constitution with or without submission for ratification by the people. It may submit for ratification the constitution it has formed, in such mode as is deemed advisable, either as a whole, or in different parts; but no subsequent Legislature can stand for the purpose of amending the constitution in any other position than as subordinate to the paramount power which the people have vested in the constitutional convention. Such would be the case in a State. The Territorial Legislature of Kansas, which called the convention, stood in precisely the same relation to subsequent Legislatures after the members of the convention had been elected, that a State Legislature would stand to its successors; and a subsequent State Legislature has no authority to interfere with the action of a State convention. It is for the people, and for the people alone, to remedy their action when the constitution has been adopted, or is submitted for ratification by the convention.

The law authorizing the vote in January was utterly irregular—not revolutionary; because it was the act of one existing authority in the State; but it was an excess of power, and therefore nugatory and void. The Legislature had no right to interfere with the action of the convention. Its interference was irregular and unlawful, but not revolutionary. I cannot regard the vote taken under the action of the Territorial Legislature as the will of the people of Kansas legally expressed. I cannot go behind the election of delegates to form the constitution when all might have voted if they had seen fit. I cannot admit that the Legislature may interfere with and abrogate the action of the constitutional convention which was legally authorized. I therefore should disregard this vote, without reference to its amount, as evidence of the legally expressed will of the people. There is, however, a further answer. On the same day, and under a power which the convention undoubtedly possessed, an election was held for the purpose of choosing the officers of this inchoate State which was to become a State whenever Congress should recognize and admit it into the Union. At that election on the same day, under legitimate authority, there were between twelve and thirteen thousand votes polled for State officers. It is true the result of that election, as now announced, has given the State into the hands of those who are opposed to me in political sentiments. I care not for that; but beyond all controversy, those who voted at that election recognized and ratified the constitution under which they voted for the election of officers. At that election, the aggregate of the votes polled exceeds by two thousand any vote ever before polled in Kansas, and it must be looked upon as operating as a confirmation of the constitution, because a large majority of the people, larger than any number that ever voted against, voted under it. I may be told that a portion of those who voted for officers under this constitution were the same persons who voted against the constitution on the same day under an irregular election. My answer is that the acts would be inconsistent, and the regular act must prevail. I cannot assume it. I do not know it. It may be that they were totally distinct men. It may be that the ten thousand who voted against the constitution, or a part of them, belonged to that portion of the people who, seeing the destruction of their own interests arising from continual feuds and continued disorganization in Kansas, had come to a determination to abide by the laws; and that that portion of the free-State party and the opposite party combined outnumbered those who still wished to maintain Kansas in a state of disorganization and revolution. I think that not improbable; though the opinion is merely conjectural, and the fact immaterial. I find a legal vote, taken under legal authority, in the one case, and an irregular vote in the other. The legal vote so taken shows two thousand majority over this irregular vote, with all its boasted effect; and I hold, therefore, that it operates of necessity as evidence that the will of the people of Kansas is that this constitution shall stand until they see fit to amend or abrogate it. It shows, further, that the less partisan portion of the free-State party have determined to return to a government of law and order.

Mr. President, there is another question which I shall endeavor to treat succinctly, but it is too important to be passed without notice, and has been made the subject of extended comment by the Senator from Michigan; and my opinions are so entirely at variance with his, that I cannot hesitate to declare them, and give the authorities by which they are supported. It is contended by him, and also by the honorable Senator from Illinois, that where a provision exists in the constitution of a State, prescribing a mode in which that constitution may be amended, it follows that though the right may exist in the people at large to alter their constitution at all times, yet the exercise of the right would be revolutionary, and that no amendment can be constitutionally made, except according to the terms prescribed in the constitution. I hold not only that there is no obligation to follow the mode prescribed in the constitution, though it may be the more convenient course, but that if a constitution expressly prohibited, as the Topeka constitution did, any convention from being held prior to the year 1865, the provision would be merely void and of no validity, as against the right of the people to change it; and that the right can be exercised, notwithstanding the provision to the contrary, by perfectly peaceful means, without revolution. On this question it is requisite to state my view of the principle on which our State governments rest, and I shall then proceed to point out the distinction applicable to the Federal Government.

What is the basis of all our State governments? That from the nature of man it necessarily results that in the formation of mankind into distinct communities, the only admissible axiom is, that the power of self-government is inherent in the people at large, and of necessity to be exercised by a majority.

Two propositions are essential parts of the axiom. First, that the right of government vests in the people at large; and secondly, that a majority of those who choose to act may organize a government; and the right to change is included in the principle which gives the authority to organize.

The constitution of a State cannot restrain or impair this right; because it exists in the people outside of the constitution. It is the political axiom upon which the constitution itself is founded.

In governments founded on the social compact, no express or actual contract exists between the different members of society; but the theory is that the consent of all is implied, and an indefinite authority exists in the majority to bind the whole.

This assumed right of the majority under the axiom must exist at all times, and cannot be controverted, except by those who place the right of government on some other foundation.

Whence does the right of the majority spring to form governments, if not from the assumed principle, the doctrine of implied compact as the true basis of government?

If the people of one generation have an inherent right to form governments, the same inherent right must exist unfettered in those of a subsequent generation.

The right of the majority to organize a government under the law of the social compact, precludes any power in that majority to render the government they form unalterable, either for twenty or ten years, or for one year; because such a restriction is inconsistent with their own authority to form a government, and at war with the very axiom from which their own power to act is derived.

The Senator from Illinois admits the right; but considers that, where the constitution prohibits change, or specifies a mode of change, alteration in any other mode would be an act of revolution. In this I differ with him. The change of organic law in modes other than those specified in the constitution, may be made without revolution in the present received sense of the word. Wherever the ultimate power of government rests, there the power to change its form must rest.

I have stated the principle without enlarging upon it, on which, I suppose, all national governments rest, and all the governments of these States are national. They have no other basis, if it be not the doctrine of the social compact. They are national because they were all independent sovereignties, constituting separate nations, when they entered into a Confederacy, and subsequently formed the Federal Government which now exists. They parted with certain powers of sovereignty, but their distinct nationality none the less exists. They are national governments, as contradistinguished from the Government of the United States, which is Federal; and the social compact is the only basis supported by reason or authority for forming a government by the will of the majority. The law of that social compact which renders obligatory the action of a majority, can rest only on the political axiom I have stated, and the axiom as necessarily continues the right in posterity to alter as it assumes the original right to form governments. As to the mode of exercise being revolutionary, the answer is obvious. Wherever the ultimate power and the legislative power are in one and the same body, the change of government may be made without revolution at any time, by mere legislation. Take England: if the Crown, Lords, and Commons, which constitute not only the legislative but the ultimate power, see fit to change the British Constitution, either by a reform bill, altering the structure of the House of Commons, or by making peers of the realm elective, as tenants for life instead of hereditary, or by abolishing hereditary descent of the Crown, or altering the line of succession and providing for the ascent of some other family to the throne; if the three estates of the realm constituting the ultimate power of sovereignty—the Crown, the Lords, and the Commons—assent to such change, they possessing, also, the legislative power, of course there could be no revolution. Revolution must include resistance to existing governmental authority. The change must always be peaceful and strictly legal when made by the authority of the ultimate power and legislative power combined in the same persons. The difference in our Republics is, that the ultimate power reposes in the people. The honorable Senator from Michigan, and the honorable Senator from Illinois, do not deny the right of the people to change a Government whenever they see fit. Such denial would be very inconsistent with their doctrines of popular sovereignty; but they contend that the people cannot exercise the right except by revolution, unless in the mode prescribed in the Constitution. If a majority of the people have the right to change their form of government, as they have the means always of bringing the legislative power into accord with the ultimate power, all that is necessary is to elect a Legislature which will provide for holding a convention, and as the right exists, of course the exercise of the right cannot be revolutionary if it is in accordance with the will of the existing government. I am right in my principle as to the basis of all governments founded on the social compact, the very authority to form a constitution of necessity includes the right of change in the people, and that right of the people need not be exercised in a revolutionary manner because having at all times the control over the Legislature, and revolution consisting in resistance to the existing authority, the people can always bring their Legislature into accordance with the ultimate power in themselves, and so exercise their right peacefully and without revolution.

But, sir, it may and has been said that this doctrine is dangerous; that it is revolutionary; that it would lead to constant changes of government, if not to anarchy. Mr. President, the man who believes in the capacity of the people for self-government, cannot assume that because the right to change exists, it will be exercised without cause. There exists, on the contrary, indelibly implanted in the human heart a spirit of resistance, which prompts to the assertion of a real or supposed right from its mere denial; when the right is conceded, the individual would care little for its exercise. The same spirit of resistance exists with greater force in communities of men, and therefore restrictions upon the acknowledged right inherent in the people at all times, in national governments, to form or change their governments, inserted in a constitution, but tend to stimulate the assertion of the right, when otherwise no change would be desired or thought necessary. The right will be asserted because the attempted restriction involves its existence; and the importance of that principle quickens the spirit of resistance, without regard to the extent of change which may be desired. In a community capable of self-government, the right to change their form of government without restriction, at all times, will not conduce to mutability by its too frequent exercise. It will be sufficient for them that the right is acknowledged to exist.

The doctrine for which I have contended does not stand upon theoretic reasoning alone. It is supported both by practice and authority. In many of the States of this Union, certainly in New York, in Maryland, and in my own State, it has been acted upon, and constitutions changed in modes other than those prescribed in them, without revolution. It was sustained in practice in my own State to its fullest extent, and sustained by men who understood the principles of republican government quite as well as their posterity at this day. The first convention to form a constitution in the State of Delaware was held in the year 1776. It provided for no convention whatever to change the constitution, but contained this provision:

"No article of the declaration of rights and fundamental rule of this State, agreed to by this convention, nor the first, second, fifth, (except that part thereof that relates to the right of suffrage,) twenty-sixth, and twenty-ninth articles of this constitution, ought ever to be violated on any pretense whatever. No other part of this constitution shall be altered, changed, or diminished, without the consent of five parts in seven of the Assembly, and seven members of the Legislative Council."

The Legislative Council consisted of nine members, and therefore it required seven ninths of one body, and five sevenths of the other, to make any alteration of that constitution; and it was to be altered in no other mode according to its terms. The people of Delaware, in the year 1791, becoming satisfied that the constitution required alteration, the Legislature without hesitation passed an act in which they recited the principles which I have mentioned as the foundation of government. The recital reads thus:

"By the thirtieth article of the constitution of this State, the power of revising the same, and of altering and amending certain parts thereof, is vested in the General Assembly; and it appears to this House that the exercise of the power of altering and amending the constitution by the Legislature would not be productive of all the valuable purposes intended by a revision, nor be so satisfactory and agreeable to our constituents; and that it would be more proper and expedient to recommend to the good people of this State to choose deputies for this special purpose to meet in convention."

Then follows the enacting clause authorizing the election of delegates to a convention to change the constitution. Delegates were elected and the constitution was changed, and no man in the State of Delaware questioned the legality of the act or pretended that it was revolutionary, and yet here was an express inhibition against any other mode of change than the mode specified. The next constitution, adopted in 1792 by a convention of which John Dickerson was a member, contained a provision which it would be well, in my judgment, to insert in every State constitution. It provided, in accordance with the principle of the right of the people to self-government, that at every annual election the people might vote for holding a constitutional convention, and if they did so vote, it was mandatory on the Legislature to call a convention. It is strong evidence that mutability of government is not a consequence of yielding to the people unrestricted right to change, in a legitimate and legal mode, their form of government, that the people of Delaware remained under that constitution from 1792 to 1831 without calling a convention, though it might have been done by a majority vote in any one year. The constitution as amended in 1831 continues to the present day. I cite this to show that the recognition of the right in the people to change their constitution every year by the expression of their will at any general election, does not lead to a frequent exercise of the right. Sir, no man is more opposed to mutability of government than I; no man would sooner lose his confidence in the capacity of any people for self-government if constant change was their incessant cry; but the existence of the power and its frequent exercise are very different things. In my belief, the attempt to restrict the power leads to more frequent changes than the acknowledged existence of a right which underlies the constitution of every republican State, with proper provisions for its exercise in a legal and orderly mode at all times.

But, Mr. President, I have said there is a distinction between the State governments and the Federal Government. A State government is national in its character; this Government is Federal.

The illustration of Mr. Webster applies only to the Federal Government. The Government of the United States is formed by the people of the several States of this Union. It is Federal in the extent of its powers; Federal in its foundation, but national in the operation of those powers. It is a mixed Republic; a Government founded not on the law of the social compact, but on the express contract of separate, independent sovereignties, and it cannot be altered except according to the terms prescribed in the contract, unless by the unanimous consent of the parties. It is as regards amendments analogous to a treaty which is the contract of sovereigns incapable of alteration without the consent of both parties. Unless the alteration were made in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, like an infraction by one sovereign of a treaty made with another, the act would justify its entire abrogation. Though a Government, it is a Government formed by express compact of separate sovereignties, and the infraction of the instrument which forms and is the only evidence of the compact, by attempting to amend or alter it in any other mode than that prescribed, unless with the unanimous consent of all the separate sovereignties, which are parties to it, would destroy the Government itself, by destroying the very basis on which it rests. The distinction is, that the Government of the United States is not founded, though the State governments are, on any political axiom, but on the express contract of separate sovereignties.

On this question I do not rely upon my own opinions or my own argument. Though to me the principle is clear, I may not have presented that principle with sufficient force; but I cannot be mistaken either in the weight of the authority, or in the fact that that authority supports the position I have taken as to the basis both of the Federal and State Governments. The authority is Mr. Madison, and among all the statesmen who have flourished in this country, no more philosophical mind has existed than that of James Madison. He had what is rarely united in man: great comprehensiveness and power of generalization, with thorough power of analysis. In speaking of the old Confederacy, in reply to Mr. Patterson, of New Jersey, Mr. Madison, in the course of his argument, holds this language: (volume 5, page 206, of the Debates of the Federal Convention:)

"It has been alleged (by Mr. Patterson) that the Confederation, having been formed by unanimous consent, could be dissolved by unanimous consent only. Does this doctrine result from the nature of compacts? Does it arise from any particular stipulation in the articles of Confederation? If we consider the Federal Union as analogous to the fundamental compact by which individuals compose one society, and which must, in its theoretic origin at least, have been the unanimous act of the component members, it cannot be said that no dissolution of the compact can be effected without unanimous consent. A breach of the fundamental principles of the compact, by a part of the society would certainly dissolve the other part from their obligations to it. If the breach of any article, by any of the parties, does not set the others at liberty, it is because the contrary is implied in the compact itself, and particularly by that law of it which gives an indefinite authority to the majority to bind the whole, in all cases. This latter circumstance shows that we are not to consider the Federal Union as analogous to the social compact of individuals; for, if it were so, a majority would have a right to bind the rest, and even to form a new constitution for the whole; which the gentleman from New Jersey would be among the last to admit. If we consider the Federal Union as analogous, not to the social compacts among individual men, but to the conventions among independent States, what is the doctrine resulting from these conventions? Clearly, according to the expositors of the law of nations, that a breach of any one article, by any one party, leaves all the other parties at liberty to consider the whole convention as dissolved, unless they choose rather to compel the delinquent party to repair the breach."

I will next quote from the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, at page 241, Mr. Madison's language in exposition of the Constitution. I might multiply extracts, but those which I shall present are strong enough for my purpose:

"If we try the Constitution by its last relation, to the authority by which amendments are to be made, we find it neither wholly national nor wholly federal. Were it wholly national, the supreme and ultimate authority would reside in the majority of the people of the Union; and this authority would be competent at all times, like that of a majority of every national society, to alter or abolish its established Government."

Not by revolution, because I have shown you that if the ultimate power exists with the people it can always be peaceably exercised, as the people can bring the Legislature into accordance with their will at all times, and therefore any attempt to destroy this right, which exists at all times, would be beyond the power of any constitution.

"Were it wholly federal, on the other hand, the concurrence of each State in the Union would be essential to every alteration that would be binding on all. The mode provided by the plan of the convention is not founded on either of these principles. In requiring more than a majority, and particularly in computing the proportion by States, not by citizens, it departs from the national and advances towards the federal character. In rendering the concurrence of less than the whole number of States sufficient, it loses, again the federal and partakes of the national character."

Further quotation is unnecessary. The authority is quite high enough—certainly for me, and, I think, for the people of this country, and is supported by reason and by principle.

I waive all discussion of the question whether the Lecompton constitution intends to restrict all amendments until 1864. I do not so read it; but believing any such restriction upon the right of the people to alter their organic law would be merely void, the inquiry is needless as to what was the intent of the framers of the Constitution in this respect.

Mr. President, I have closed my argument on the objections to the admission of Kansas, which I admitted to be sufficient if sustained, but there remains what I called the question which addresses itself to the Senate. Do the best interests of the Union—its peace, quiet, and repose—demand the present admission of Kansas as a State, or do they require the rejection of the Lecompton constitution? To me it seems perfectly clear that by disconnecting the Territory of Kansas as a Territory from the Federal Government, you prevent agitation on a question perilous to the Union. Admit Kansas, and you can withdraw the Army which has been kept there for years to preserve peace and enforce the laws, and you will leave the people of Kansas as you have the people of every other State, to fight out their own battles, pass their own laws, and settle their own institutions. When you force on them, as it is contended you do, this constitution, you but yield to them the entire control of their own affairs. You also localize an agitation in reference to the question of slavery, and the settlement of the institutions of Kansas, which ought to be localized, and which properly belongs to the people of Kansas, and to them alone. But if you refuse to admit Kansas as a State into the Union under the constitution presented to us, it will be considered by the great body of the people in the slaveholding States of this country as a determination by Congress that in future no State even tolerating slavery shall be admitted into the Federal Union; and, in truth, such is the determination, and such the real objection of the major part of the opponents of the Lecompton constitution—the Republican party. Sir, whenever that becomes the settled conviction of the slaveholding States, rely upon it that the bonds which bind this Union will soon be severed. I say this, not because I desire or would promote such a result; not that I consider, whether Kansas be admitted under the Lecompton constitution or rejected, either event would justify a dissolution of the Union, but because I cannot shut my eyes to a danger which I believe to be imminent, but not realized by the public sentiment of the people of the middle States.

Sir, no effort of mine which could preserve this Union, or tend to its permanence, will ever be spared. I claim no better intentions than other men; but from the fact that the political existence of my own State depends upon its permanence, naturally her citizens look with more reverence and more regard to the preservation of the Union than the citizens of larger States, which may be supposed able to maintain their political existence outside of the Federal organization.

For the reasons which I have stated, I believe that the passage of this bill will—not stop the agitation of the slavery question in some form, but will remove one practical disturbing cause, connected with that question, from the Halls of Congress and from the minds of the people of the country. It will do that good, at least; and if, in the progress of time, the public sentiment of the country can be brought to view this system of agitation rightly, we may hope that no other question will arise that can put the Union in peril.

Mr. President, I heard, with extreme regret, the declarations made by the honorable Senator from New York. That honorable Senator, if I understood the purport of his remarks—and I shall read those passages on which I intend to comment—has declared to us what I have always feared, whatever might be their present intentions, would become the ultimate object of the Republican party; and that is, the placing of the negro race on an equality with the white race throughout the United States, as to all civil and political rights. That is their ultimate doctrine whatever may be the professed doctrine now, and for that purpose, by all the powers they can legitimately exercise after obtaining the control of the Federal Government, they mean to induce, if not force, the emancipation of all slaves throughout the United States. No thanks to them for the admission that the power is not claimed to abolish slavery in a State through the agency of the Federal Government—every one knows that that would be impracticable folly; but if, holding the doctrine that it is their duty to abolish slavery throughout the United States, and to place the negro on an equality with the white man, as to his civil and political rights, they obtain the control of the Federal Government, and wield it even to the extent of controverted constitutional powers, for the destruction of the institution of slavery, of course, when they obtain that power, this Union must necessarily perish, because not merely the wealth but the existence of the planting States—their social relations and civilization, are inseparably connected with that institution. Yet such I understand to be the doctrine of the honorable Senator from New York. Allow me to read from his speech:

"Free labor has at last apprehended its rights, its interests, its power, and its destiny, and is organizing itself to assume the government of the Republic. It will henceforth meet you boldly and resolutely here; it will meet you everywhere, in the Territories or out of them, wherever you may go to extend slavery. It has driven you back in California and in Kansas; it will invade you soon in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Missouri, and Texas. It will meet you in Arizona, in Central America, and even in Cuba. The invasion will be not merely harmless, but beneficent, if you yield seasonably to its just and moderated demands. It proved so in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the other slave States, which have already yielded in that way to its advances. You may, indeed, get a start under or near the tropics, and seem safe for a time, but it will be only a short time. Even there you will find States only for free labor to maintain and occupy. The interest of the white race demands the ultimate emancipation of all men. Whether that consummation shall be allowed to take effect, with needful and wise precautions against sudden change and disaster, or be hurried on by violence, is all that remains for you to decide. For the failure of your system of slave labor throughout the Republic, the responsibility will rest not on the agitators you condemn, or on the political parties you arraign, or even altogether on yourselves, but it will be due to the inherent error of the system itself, and to the error which thrusts it forward to oppose and resist the destiny, not more of the African than that of the white races."

I can draw from these declarations, and they are well considered and deliberately made, but one conclusion, that whatever may be the measure of the hour, the ultimate views of the party of which the honorable Senator stands, if not the sole leader, at least one of its chief exponents, are the emancipation of the black race, on the ground that it is demanded by the interest of the white races. The avowed intent is not merely a restriction on the admission of new States into this Union with constitutions tolerating slavery, which admission he calls the extension of slavery; but he tells you that he will attack the institution in every State in which it now exists, in some of which it forms the very basis of their social organization. He tells you that the object of his party is to proceed until they have placed all men on an equality by emancipation.

Mr. President, dearly as I love my country, whenever the hour comes when, with large relative numbers of an inferior race residing in the same community with a superior race, incapable of an amalgamation, which is alike revolting to the instincts of humanity and destructive of the better characteristics of both races, there is to be equality of races, civil and political, I desire no longer to be a citizen of the United States. It can never come without bloodshed and civil war. The honorable Senator tells us if we submit to their beneficent demands it will be well for us. The demands are, that the whole social structure throughout every southern State of the Union shall be subverted, almost the entire property of every southern State abandoned, and all the flourishing planting States of the South reduced to the condition which Jamaica and Hayti now occupy, or to that which Mexico presents to the civilized world. If we will not consent to this by submitting to their counsels, he intimates that violence will ultimately achieve that result, because he thinks "the interest of the white races demands the ultimate emancipation of all men."

I do not know whether the honorable Senator, in predicting the results to be reached when his party shall have achieved power, has considered the effect of this universal emancipation and the mode in which it is to take place. I do not know whether he looks to amalgamation, or to the extinction of the black race; or, it may be, to the extinction of the white race in the southern country. Which of them he contemplates, he has not told us; but I hold it to be a truth as eternal as the records of history, that no instance can be found where two races of men have inhabited in large relative numbers the same country, unless they were capable of amalgamation and fusion; they have existed together without one or the other becoming the subject race, or one or the other being exterminated. Nor will the future contradict the past. How has it been with your Indians? When the whites came here they found this country with a dense population of Indians; but the Indian, too proud for subjection, has perished before the onward march of civilization. The negro, whose condition throughout all history, in contact with the white race, has been one of subjection, has yielded to it because it is suitable to his more animal nature, and essential to his civilization, to the extent of his capacity. Subjection must be the condition of his race, where it exists in large relative numbers, for his own benefit as well as ours; unless you come to the conclusion that amalgamation is possible and desirable. You have the effect of that in Mexico, and I suppose no Senator wishes to reduce the white people of this country to the condition exhibited by the mixed races of Mexico.

Such a mixture of races is forbidden by the laws of nature, and at war with progressive civilization. I leave to the physiologists the decision of the question of the original unity or diversity of races; but it is an undeniable truth, though the offspring of the white and the negro is not strictly hybrid, that in the mixed race produced by their union, the capacity of reproduction is lessened, and the duration of life shortened. I want no better evidence of the impossibility, under the laws of nature and the instincts of humanity, that the union of these races can be productive of benefit to either.

The honorable Senator from New York, on another occasion, during the present session, declared on the floor of the Senate, that under no circumstances could he vote to recognize the right of property in man. I know how easy it is to raise a specious argument, founded on what is called the law of nature, as to rights of property of any kind. The honorable Senator from New York may tell us that man should not hold property in man. It is a good subject for declamation, and naturally appeals to human sympathies and human feelings. With the exception of where it is forced upon you by the existence of an inferior race in the same country, in large numbers, I hold to the same doctrine myself. But if you press that doctrine on the theoretical ground that man should not hold property in man, by the law of nature, let me ask, where does your authority to hold any property spring from? I have been lately looking at a treatise—and an English treatise, too—published within a few years past, on the law of nations; and the law of nations is a law of perfect obligation as to property, which binds all nations, and I hold, does bind the Federal States of this community, as regards rights of property. I there find the doctrine thus laid down.

Mr. SEWARD. What book is it?

Mr. BAYARD. Wildman on International Law. At page 10, speaking of slavery, he says:

"It is found existing, and, as far as appears, without amendment, in the earliest and most authentic records of the human race. It is recognized by the codes of the most polished races of antiquity. Under the light of Christianity itself, the possession of persons so acquired has been, in every civilized country, invested with the character of property, and secured as such by all the protections of the law. Solemn treaties have been framed, and national monopolies eagerly sought, to facilitate the commerce in this asserted property; and all this, with all the sanction of law, public and municipal."

Mr. President, if a right of property, recognized in all ages, sanctioned under Christian and heathen dispensations, can be questioned now, when the preservation of that right involves not merely the prosperity, but the entire wealth, the civilization and the very existence of the Southern States, has the honorable Senator from New York no fears that at some future day some speculative mind may start the idea that if you are to rest the right of property on the law of nature, (of which I shall speak presently,) you may extend the investigation still further, and reach the conclusion that, by the law of nature, man has no right to property of any kind, except while in his immediate occupation. It would be a most attractive theory for the socialist. It would be just as defensible and just as specious as the view of the honorable Senator from New York as to the right of the white race to hold negroes as slaves. The difference in effect would be, that while his doctrine would simply devastate one section of this country, its extension to the right of property generally beyond its actual occupation, would destroy civilization throughout the continent. Such doctrine is no novelty. La propriété c'est le vol, is the language of the French socialist, Proudhon, and his followers have not been few; nor would it be difficult to find specious arguments in support of that delusion.

In either case, the answer is obvious. That property is the result of the organization of mankind into civilized communities. It is a civil right, arising out of the complex relations induced by civilization; and, unless it is considered desirable to retrograde to a savage state, it must be protected without regard to visionary efforts to trace its origin to some supposed law of nature. The passion for acquisition is indelibly implanted in the heart of man; and, if you deprive him of the right of acquisition and transmission to his children, you paralyze his energies, and remove the basis of progressive civilization. Tell the world that man shall hold property which he has acquired only whilst it is in his actual possession and use, and human progress terminates at once and forever. So, too, if carrying into practice the doctrines of the honorable Senator from New York, you can and do force upon the southern people the emancipation of their slaves: the prosperity and civilization of the South will pass away, her social fabric be subverted, and her very name be obliterated in the future annals of the country.

Sir, what is this law of nature? Do honorable Senators who deny rights of property recognized by public and municipal law and by the law of nations on the ground that it is contrary to the law of nature, mean the primary or secondary law of nature, according to the theories of the Roman lawyers? They tell us that the primary law of nature "consists of those instincts which are common to all animals, such as mutual affection and the like." Of course that can afford no rule of property applicable to civilized communities. The secondary law of nature is defined as consisting of those institutions "which natural reason has established among mankind." In its modern acceptance the law of nature means nothing more than natural justice and equity—the law of ethics. If that be the law of nature referred to, the answer is, that the natural law of ethics founded on man's infirm reason, which even in the brightest intellect is too often perverted and clouded by disease, by the passions, and other causes, has been superseded by the revealed law, for the purpose of human obligation, in all Christian communities. Blackstone writes thus:

"Yet, undoubtedly, the revealed law is of infinitely more authenticity than that moral system which is framed by ethical writers, and denominated natural law. Because one is the law of nature, expressly declared so to be by God himself; the other is only what, by the assistance of human reason, we imagine to be that law."

Looking to the revealed law of God, if you take the Jewish dispensation—and it is, beyond controversies, that under it slavery was authorized not only of Jews to a limited extent, but permanent slavery, chattel slavery of the heathen—even though you regard that dispensation as applicable only to a peculiar people under peculiar circumstances, it requires great confidence in human intellect to pronounce institutions formed under the immediate mandate of the Creator a violation of any law of morals or of ethics. Passing from that to the advent of our Savior; search through the New Testament, and though slavery was then the law of the civilized world, though slavery was all around Him, and His mission was to reform the morals as well as the religion of the world, where do you find His condemnation of this institution, or inhibition of the right of property in man, as violative of the law of morals? Sir, it is a political institution, founded on the progress of civilization and the natural relations of races in this world.

When gentlemen indulge in denunciation of negro slavery as a violation of the law of God, and of the laws of nature, whatever respect I may have for them individually, I attach little weight to that opinion which attempts to establish a refinement of the law of morals as a rule of human conduct and human legislation, which is not recognized in the revealed will of the Almighty.

Mr. President, there are other views and facts in relation to the relative condition of the two races which exist in this country, which I had contemplated presenting, but I forbear, as I have already trespassed longer upon your patience than I intended. I trust that Kansas will be admitted into the Union, I trust that even on the other side of this chamber they will weigh the fact that their great object can be effected, and Kansas made a non-slaveholding State by the Legislature elected under the present constitution. I am confident the cost in money would never weigh with them, and the right of compensation for property taken for what is deemed a public good should be freely acknowledged, as it was recognized property when the constitution was formed. They can achieve their object by the Legislature which has been elected in Kansas providing a sufficient fund to pay the owners for the value of the less than three hundred slaves now there, and then have full authority to abolish slavery in Kansas by mere legislative enactment. If that be as I believe, the real basis of the contest with them, and they desire the permanence of this Union, why should they seek to keep up an agitation which cannot subside whilst Kansas remains in a Territorial condition?

Sir, this Union has hitherto withstood many trials in the contests of sections and parties, and I would fain hope, almost against belief, that it may endure through many more. But Senators may rely that we cannot remain a united people, if the non-slaveholding States, acting up to the declarations of the honorable Senator from New York, persistently continue agitation with a view to the emancipation of the negro slaves of the South. I have confidence, however, in the intelligence of the northern masses, and believe that when they truly appreciate that the real and ultimate object of these incessant attacks upon the institution of slavery, is to place the negro on an equality with the white man, their decision will rebuke agitation, and preserve the Union. My confidence is increased by the fact that whenever this question of equality of races has been hitherto presented to the people of any northern State, except Massachusetts, they have uniformly sustained the ascendancy of their own race.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. President, in December last, when the President's message was under discussion, I promised that if ever the Lecompton constitution was presented to the Senate, I should have some opinions to express in regard to it. Since then the whole subject has been so thoroughly debated, that little remains to be said, and I would not now detain the Senate if it were not for views expressed by Republican Senators in favor of a restoration of the Missouri compromise, and, particularly, the opinions expressed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD], in which he regrets its repeal.

Sir, if it had not been for the repeal of the Missouri compromise, there would now be no Republican party in existence. Instead of uttering regrets at its repeal, the Republican party in the North should rejoice that it made the Territories a common battle-field in which the conflicting rights of free and slave labor might struggle for supremacy.

The history of the Missouri compromise can be briefly told. It was passed by southern votes. The few northern men who supported it, were consigned to oblivion immediately on their return to their constituents.

At the time it passed, it was considered a triumph for the South. The South rejoiced at the victory. The North, after a murmur of discontent, gave in its adhesion. At the time, the constitutionality of the act was not questioned. It received the indorsement of Mr. Monroe and his Cabinet, the majority of whom were southern men. For twenty-five years tranquillity reigned throughout the country.

Early in the session of 1845, a joint resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives, for the admission of the Republic of Texas as a State into the Union. This resolution reaffirmed the Missouri compromise. It passed the House of Representatives, obtaining almost the unanimous votes of southern members; it passed this body by southern votes. Thus, it will be seen, this reenactment of the Missouri compromise was conceived by southern men, and brought into existence by southern men. The South exultingly claimed it as another victory over the North.

Among the Senators who addressed this body on the question, was the present President of the United States. I quote from his speech. Mr. Buchanan said:

"He was pained with it (the renewed compromise) again, because it settled the question of slavery. These resolutions went to reestablish the Missouri compromise, by fixing a line within which slavery was to be in future confined. That controversy had nearly shaken the Union to its center in an earlier and better period of our history; but this compromise, should it be now re-established, would prevent the recurrence of similar dangers hereafter. Should this question be now left open for one or two years, the country would be involved in nothing but one perpetual struggle. We should witness a feverish excitement in the public mind; parties would divide on the dangerous and exciting question of abolitionism; and the irritation might reach such an extreme as to endanger the existence of the Union itself; but close it now, and it will be closed forever."

Mr. B. said he anticipated no time when the country would ever desire to stretch its limits beyond the Rio del Norte; and such being the case, ought any friend of the Union to desire to see this question left open any longer? Was it desirable again to have the Missouri question brought home to the people, to goad them to fury? That question between the two great interests of our country had been well discussed and well decided; and from that moment Mr. B. had set down his foot on the solid ground then established, and there he would let the question stand forever. Who could complain of the terms of that compromise? It was then settled that north of 36° 30', slavery should be forever prohibited. The same line was fixed upon in the resolutions recently received from the House of Representatives, now before us. The bill from the House for the establishment of a territorial government in Oregon, excluded slavery altogether from that vast country. How vain were the fears entertained in some quarters of the country that the slaveholding States would ever be able to control the Union! While, on the other hand, the fears entertained in the South and West, as to the ultimate success of the Abolitionists, were not less unfounded and vain. South of the compromising line of 36° 30', the States within the limits of Texas applying to come into the Union, were left to decide for themselves whether they would permit slavery within their limits or not. And under this free permission, he believed with Mr. Clay, (in his letter on the subject of annexation,) that if Texas should be divided into five States, two only of them would be slaveholding, and three free States."

Can it be possible, that the man who uttered these sentiments could be chosen as the mouth-piece to foreshadow the opinion of the Supreme Court, in which the constitutionality of the act is denied; or, that the attorney who argued the case against the slave Dred Scott, and, in accordance with the opinion of the court, could, when a Senator on this floor, have used the following language. Yet it is recorded, that Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, said:

"He believed in the existence of the power in Congress to pass a law to prohibit slavery, and if such a law were presented to the Supreme Court for a decision on its constitutionality, it would be in favor of the law. As a judicial question, the decision would be against protection to the South. On a bill providing territorial governments for Oregon, California, and New Mexico, he had said that he should himself have submitted an amendment adopting the line of the Missouri compromise, had he not been anticipated in his motion by a Senator from Indiana." [Mr. BRIDGES.]

The marked feature of this opinion is, that the Constitution is extended over the Territories. The "great expounder of the Constitution" (Mr. Webster) differed from the Supreme Court. I will read his remarks on the subject, which were called forth by an amendment offered by Mr. Walker, of Wisconsin, providing a territorial government for the territory acquired by the treaty of peace with Mexico. Mr. Webster said:

"It is of importance that we should seek to have clear ideas and correct notions of the question which this amendment of the member from Wisconsin has presented to us—and especially that we should seek to get some conception of what is meant by the proposition, in a law to 'extend the Constitution of the United States to the Territories.' Why, sir, the thing is utterly impossible. All the legislation in the world, in this general form, could not accomplish it. There is no cause for the operation of the legislative power in such a manner as that. The Constitution—what is it? We extend the Constitution of the United States by law to Territory! What is the Constitution of the United States? Is not its very first principle, that all within its influence and comprehension shall be represented in the Legislature which it establishes, with not only a right of debate and a right to vote in both Houses of Congress, but a right to partake in the choice of the President and Vice President? And can we by law extend these rights, or any of them, to a Territory of the United States? Everybody will see that it is altogether impracticable. It comes to this, then, that the Constitution is to be extended as far as practicable; but how far that is, is to be decided by the President of the United States, and therefore he is to have absolute and despotic power. He is the judge of what is suitable and what is unsuitable; and what he thinks suitable is suitable, and what he thinks unsuitable is unsuitable. He is 'omnis in hoc,' and what is this but to say, in general terms, that the President of the United States shall govern this Territory as he sees fit till Congress makes further provision?"

"Now, if the gentleman will be kind enough to tell me what principle of the Constitution he supposes suitable, what discrimination he can draw between suitable and unsuitable, which he proposes to follow, I shall be instructed. Let me say, that in this general sense there is no such thing as extending the Constitution. The Constitution is extended over the United States, and over nothing else. It cannot be extended over anything except over the old States and the new States that shall come in hereafter, when they do come in. There is a want of accuracy of ideas in this respect that is quite remarkable among eminent gentlemen, and especially professional and judicial gentlemen. It seems to be taken for granted that the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and every principle designed to protect personal liberty, is extended by force of the Constitution itself over every new Territory. That proposition cannot be maintained at all. How do you arrive at it by any reasoning or deduction? It can be only arrived at by the loosest of all possible constructions. It is said that this must be so, else the right of the habeas corpus would be lost. Undoubtedly these rights must be conferred by law, before they can be enjoyed in a Territory."

In reply to Mr. Calhoun on the same subject, he argued:

"The Constitution, as the gentleman contends, extends over the Territories. How does it get there? I am surprised to hear a gentleman so distinguished as a strict constructionist, affirming that the Constitution of the United States extends to the Territories, without showing us any clause in the Constitution in any way leading to that result; and to hear the gentleman maintaining that position, without showing us in any way in which such a result could be inferred, increases my surprise."

"One idea further upon this branch of the subject. The Constitution of the United States extending over the Territories, and no other law existing there! Why, I beg to know how any government could proceed, without any other authority existing there than such as is created by the Constitution of the United States? Does the Constitution of the United States settle titles to land? Does it regulate the rights of property? Does it fix the relations of parent and child, guardian and ward? The Constitution of the United States establishes what the gentleman calls a confederation for certain great purposes, leaving all the great mass of laws which is to govern society to derive their existence from State enactments. That is the just view of the state of things under the Constitution. And a State or Territory that has no law but such as it derives from the Constitution of the United States, must be entirely without any State or territorial government. The honorable Senator from South Carolina, conversant with the subject as he must be from his long experience in different branches of the Government, must know that the Congress of the United States have established principles in regard to the Territories that are utterly repugnant to the Constitution. The Constitution of the United States has provided for them an independent judiciary; for the judge of every court of the United States holds his office upon the tenure of good behavior. Will the gentleman say that, in any court established in the Territories, the judge holds his office in that way? He holds it for a term of years, and is removable at executive discretion. How did we govern Louisiana before it was a State? Did the writ of habeas corpus exist in Louisiana during its territorial existence? or the right of trial by jury? Who ever heard of trial by jury there before the law creating the territorial government gave the right to trial by jury? No one. And I do not believe that there is any new light now to be thrown upon the history of the proceedings of this Government in relation to that matter. When new territory has been acquired, it has always been subject to the laws of Congress—to such laws as Congress thought proper to pass for its immediate government; for its government during its territorial existence, during the preparatory state in which it was to remain until it was ready to come into the Union as one of the family of States."

At a later period in the debate he said:

"The honorable Senator from South Carolina argues, that the Constitution declares itself to be the law of the land, and that therefore it must extend over the Territories. 'The land,' I take it, means the land over which the Constitution is established; or, in other words, it means the States united under the Constitution. But does not the gentleman see at once that the argument would prove a great deal too much? The Constitution no more says, that the Constitution itself shall be the supreme law of the land, than it says that the laws of Congress shall be the supreme law of the land. It declares that the Constitution, and the laws of Congress passed under it, shall be the supreme law of the land."

Mr. President, the Missouri compromise was again reaffirmed in 1848, on the passage of the act creating a territorial government for Oregon.

The discovery of gold during the same year in California rapidly gave that Territory a population, three fourths of which was from the free States. The necessity for some form of government compelled the people of California to frame a constitution, which, in obedience to the doctrine of popular sovereignty, was submitted to the people, and adopted with a clause prohibiting slavery. There were about five hundred votes against the adoption of this constitution. This small opposition did not arise because of the anti-slavery clause, but because many of the people believed that the time had not arrived for the formation of a State government.

When California applied for admission with this constitution, the South refused her admission. Mr. Davis, of Mississippi, demanded the extension of the Missouri line to the Pacific ocean, and the recognition of slavery on the south thereof. In the debate on this subject he used the following language:

"I here assert, that never will I take less than the Missouri compromise line extended to the Pacific ocean, with the specific recognition of the right to hold slaves in the Territory below that line; and that, before such Territories are admitted into the Union as States, slaves may be taken there from any of the United States, at the option of their owners."

This brought Mr. Clay to his feet, who said:

"I am extremely sorry to hear the Senator from Mississippi say that he requires, first, the extension of the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific, and also that he is not satisfied with that, but requires, if I understood him correctly, a positive provision for the admission of slavery south of that line. And now, sir, coming from a slave State as I do, I owe it to myself, I owe it to truth, I owe it to the subject, to say that no earthly power could induce me to vote for a specific measure for the introduction of slavery where it had not before existed, either south or north of that line. Coming as I do from a slave State, it is my solemn, deliberate, and well-matured determination, that no power—no earthly power—shall compel me to vote for the positive introduction of slavery either south or north of that line. Sir, while you reproach, and justly too, our British ancestors for the introduction of this institution upon the continent of North America, I am, for one, unwilling that the posterity of the present inhabitants of California and of New Mexico shall reproach us for doing just what we reproach Great Britain for doing to us. If the citizens of these Territories choose to establish slavery, and if they come here with constitutions establishing slavery, I am for admitting them with such provisions in their constitutions; but then it will be their own work, and not ours; and their posterity will have to reproach them, and not us, for forming constitutions allowing the institution of slavery to exist among them. These are my views, sir, and I choose to express them; and I care not how extensively or universally they are known."

This was among the last debates in which Mr. Clay took a part. It was among the last great acts of his long and honorable life. It was the utterance of such sentiments as these that endeared him to the people. They are the views of a statesman who could forget sectional prejudices in a love for his whole country. Could he come back from his honored grave, and resume his former seat here, and utter the same sentiments, he would be denounced as an Abolitionist. Strange that the Supreme Court could not permit one decade to pass after the deaths of Webster and Clay—those great defenders and expounders of the Constitution—before it destroyed the measure that gave peace and prosperity to the country.

Mr. Clay's compromise measures passed, and California became a State of the Union, despite the protest of ten southern Senators, four of whom [Messrs. HUNTER and MASON, of Virginia, DAVIS, of Mississippi, and YULEE, of Florida,] occupy seats on this floor to-day.

In their protest they state that the passage of the bill admitting California is injurious to the slave States, "fatal to the peace and equality of the States they represented, and leading, if persisted in, to the dissolution of that Confederacy in which the slaveholding States had never sought more than an equality, and in which they will not be content to remain with less."

After the passage of the compromise measures of 1850, with the admission of California as a State into the Union, peace was again restored on the question of slavery, as every patriot supposed, forever.

In 1852, the two great parties, Whig and Democratic, met in their conventions and indorsed, in their several platforms, the compromises of 1850. The questions that formerly had divided these parties had now been settled by the adoption of the Democratic policy, and the Democratic party was in a large majority in both branches of the national Legislature.

In 1854, Mr. DOUGLAS introduced the Nebraska bill, to which Mr. DIXON, of Kentucky, offered an amendment, the effect of which was to repeal the Missouri compromise. This amendment was accepted by the Committee on Territories, and adopted by southern Senators, who objected to the bill and report of Mr. DOUGLAS, as I have been informed, for not being sufficiently ultra in their provisions.

I do not know, sir, why the Senator from Illinois accepted this amendment; but I was inclined to believe at the time, that he, representing a free State, saw the beneficial results that were to flow from it to the people of the North; and it was not for him to object, when he found almost a united South indorsing a repeal of the Missouri compromise, the effect of which repeal was to devote the whole Territories of the Union to the control of free labor. But I will do him the credit to say that I always thought that he saw, at the time he accepted the amendment of Mr. DIXON, that there were to be no more slave States. The South achieved another victory, as she supposed; the bill became a law. From the moment of its passage, slavery and freedom confronted each other in the Territories.

In the passage of this bill the people of the North felt that a great wrong had been committed against their rights. This was a mistaken view; the North should have rejoiced and applauded the Senator from Illinois for accepting Mr. DIXON's amendment. The South should have mourned the removal of that barrier, the removal of which will let in upon her feeble and decaying institutions millions of free laborers.

In the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the rampart that protected slavery in the southern Territories was broken down. Northern opinions, northern ideas, and northern institutions, were invited to the contest for the possession of these Territories.

How foolish for the South to hope to contend with success in such an encounter. Slavery is old, decrepit, and consumptive; freedom is young, strong, and vigorous. The one is naturally stationary and loves ease; the other is migratory and enterprising. There are six million people interested in the extension of slavery; there are twenty million freemen to contend for these Territories, out of which to carve for themselves homes where labor is honorable. Up to the time of the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, a large majority of the people of the North did not question the right of the South to control the destinies of the Territories south of the Missouri line. The people of the North should have welcomed the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act. I am astonished that Republicans should call for a restoration of the Missouri compromise. With the terrible odds that are against her, the South should not have repealed it if she desired to retain her rights in the Territories.

Has it never occurred to southern gentlemen that millions of laboring free men are born yearly, who demand subsistence and will have it; that as the marts of labor become crowded they will spread into the Territories and take possession of them. The Senator from South Carolina undervalues the strength and intelligence of these men when he denounces them as slaves. Would a dissolution of the Union give these southern Territories to slavery? No, sir. It is a mistake to suppose that it would. A dissolution of the Union would not lessen the amount of immigration, or the number of free white men seeking for homes and a market for their labor. Wherever there is land for settlement, they will rush in and occupy it, and the compulsory labor of slaves will have to give way before the intelligent labor of freemen. Had the Missouri line been retained, the northern laborer would not have sought to go south of it. But this line having been abolished by the South, no complaint can be made if the North avails herself of the concession. Senators had better consider before they talk of dissolution, and first understand if the perpetuity of their beloved institution will be more securely guaranteed by it. The question of dissolution is not discussed by the people of California. I am not at liberty to say, if the people I in part represent are denied by Congress the legislation they require, they will consider it a blessing to remain a part of this Confederation.

The Senator from South Carolina very boastingly told us, a few days since, how much cotton the South exported, and that "cotton was king." He did not tell us that the price of cotton fluctuated, and that the South was at the mercy of the manufacturers. Suppose, sir, the sixteen free States of the Union should see fit to enact a high protective tariff, for the purpose of giving employment to free labor, would cotton be king then? Why, sir, the single free State of California exports the product for which cotton is raised, to an amount of more than one half in value of the whole exports of the cotton of the slave States. Cotton king! No, sir. Gold is king. I represent a State, sir, where labor is honorable; where the judge has left his bench, the lawyer and doctor their offices, and the clergyman his pulpit, for the purpose of delving in the earth; where no station is so high, and no position so great, that its occupant is not proud to boast that he has labored with his hands. There is no State in the Union, no place on earth, where labor is so honored and so well rewarded; no time and no place since the Almighty doomed the sons of Adam to toil, where the curse, if it be a curse, rests so lightly as now on the people of California.

Many Senators have complained of the Senator from South Carolina for his denunciations of the laborers of the North as "white slaves," and the "mud-sills of society." I quote from his speech:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is a class requiring but a low order of intellect, and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very mud-sill of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air as to build either the one or the other except on this mud-sill. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand—a race inferior to her own, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity, to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for our purpose, and call them slaves. We found them slaves by the 'common consent of mankind,' which, according to Cicero, 'lex nature est;' the highest proof of what is nature's law. We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by 'ears polite.' I will not characterize that class at the North with that term; but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal."

"We do not think that whites should be slaves either by law or necessity. Our slaves are black, of another and inferior race. The status in which we have placed them is an elevation. They are elevated from the condition in which God first created them, by being made our slaves. None of that race on the whole face of the globe can be compared with the slaves of the South. They are happy, content, unassuming, and utterly incapable, from intellectual weakness, ever to give us any trouble by their aspirations. Yours are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot box is stronger than an army with banners, and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your Government overthrown, your property divided, not as they have mistakenly attempted to initiate such proceedings by meeting in parks, with arms in their hands, but by the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very hearth-stones. How would you like for us to send lecturers and agitators North, to teach these people this, to aid in combining, and to lead them?"

I, sir, am glad that the Senator has spoken thus. It may have the effect of arousing in the working men that spirit which has been lying dormant for centuries. It may also have the effect of arousing the two hundred thousand men, with pure white skins, in South Carolina, who are now degraded and despised by thirty thousand aristocratic slaveholders. It may teach them to demand what is the power—

"Link'd with success, assumed and kept with skill,
That molds another's weakness to its will;
Wields with their hands, but, still to them unknown,
Makes even their mightiest deeds appear his own?"

I suppose, sir, the Senator from South Carolina did not intend to be personal in his remarks to any of his peers upon this floor. If I had thought so, I would have noticed them at the time. I am, sir, with one exception, the youngest in years of the Senators upon this floor. It is not long since I served an apprenticeship of five years at one of the most laborious mechanical trades pursued by man—a trade that from its nature devotes its follower to thought, but debars him from conversation. I would not have alluded to this if it were not for the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, and the thousands who know that I am the son of an artisan, and have been a mechanic, would feel disappointed in me if I did not reply to him. I am not proud of this. I am sorry it is true. I would that I could have enjoyed the pleasure of life in my boyhood's days; but they were denied to me. I say this with pain. I have not the admiration for the men of the class from whence I sprang that might be expected; they submit too tamely to oppression, and are too prone to neglect their rights and duties as citizens. But, sir, the class of society to whose toil I was born, under our form of government, will control the destinies of this nation. If I were inclined to forget my connection with them, or to deny that I sprang from them, this Chamber would not be the place in which I could do either. While I hold a seat here, I have but to look at the beautiful capitals adorning the pilasters that support this roof, to be reminded of my father's talent, and to see his handiwork.

I left the scenes of my youth and manhood for the "far West," because I was tired of the struggles and jealousies of men of my class, who could not understand why one of their fellows should seek to elevate his condition above the common level. I made my new abode among strangers, where labor is honored. I had left without regret; there remained no tie of blood to bind me to any being in existence. If I fell in the struggle for reputation and fortune, there was no relative on earth to mourn my fall. The people of California elevated me to the highest office within their gift. My election was not the result of an accident. For years I had to struggle, often seeing the goal of ambition within my reach; it was again and again taken from me by the aid of men of my own class. I had not only them to contend with, but almost the entire partisan press of my State was subsidized by Government money and patronage to oppose my election. I sincerely hope, sir, the time will come when such speeches as that from the Senator from South Carolina will be considered a lesson to the laborers of the nation.

This Lecompton constitution will pass this body. If it should pass the other House, it will become a law. The South will rejoice at another triumph. Such triumphs constitute her defeat.

Since this Lecompton constitution has been before the Senate, the Administration has seen proper to attempt to make its acceptance a party test, and its organs have sought to read out of the party all the Democrats who have had the boldness to denounce the frauds by which it was created.

Among the men thus sought to be ostracized, are the great captains and generals of the party, who so gallantly fought during the last presidential contest, and without whose exertions this very Administration would have no existence.

Let the Administration take heed that the party does not read it out. I deny the right of the Administration to make a party test; it is a power that exists only in the Democratic masses. The dictation of self-appointed party leaders shall not be the test of my democracy.

I cannot, as the representative of a free people, consent by any act of mine to coerce the people of Kansas to accept a government they abhor. I have no fear that the people of Kansas will permit this constitution to be enforced in the event of its becoming a law. If they do permit it to be enforced, they deserve to be subjected to the most abject slavery, and should be made to work under the lash of those who framed for them this constitution.

Mr. President, in the views I previously expressed on the Executive message, I said that the President of the United States should be held responsible for the difficulties in Kansas. This remark was considered startling at the time, and was the subject of much censure. Recent developments have confirmed me in the correctness of the position I then took, and from the expression of public opinion that has reached me, I am satisfied that a majority of the people of the country unite with me in holding him to this responsibility.

Much has been said about not submitting the constitution of Kansas to the people, and a comparison has been drawn between it and the constitution of Minnesota. I agree with the friends of Lecompton that it is not an objection that should be fatal to the admission of a State into the Union, that such constitution has not been submitted to the people, if it be ascertained that the people, as in the case of Minnesota, favor admission.

Entertaining these views, I would not oppose the admission of a State with a clause in its constitution tolerating slavery, if I were satisfied that it was the expressed wish of a majority of the people.

It is a conceded fact, not requiring discussion or argument, that four fifths of the people of Kansas are opposed to the Lecompton constitution. It was a fraud from its very inception. Every election in that Territory, looking to this constitution as a result, was founded in fraud. Senators who have preceded me have stated at length the history of these frauds, and I will now only refer to some of them, as the facts have not been disputed. In one precinct of that Territory, (Kickapoo,) one thousand and twenty-nine votes were polled on the alleged adoption of the Lecompton constitution; while the board of commissioners appointed by the Legislature of Kansas to investigate the subject, state that there are not more than four hundred legal voters in that district.

At another precinct (Shawnee) there were returned, as having been polled for the Lecompton constitution, seven hundred and fifty-three votes. The census of this place shows thirty houses and one hundred and fifteen legal voters. When the poll list left this town the record of names covered four pages of paper, when it reached Mr. Calhoun it covered fifteen pages. At still another precinct, (Oxford,) twelve hundred and sixty-six votes are reported as having been polled. The census shows forty-seven white inhabitants.

It is notorious that the people of a neighboring State were permitted to vote at this election, at such precincts, and as often as they desired. The names of people are recorded in the poll lists as having voted, who had been dead for months. But why enumerate these disgusting details? The facts are before the people. They are known to the President. He continues to keep the men in office who are charged with the commission of these frauds. The result of all their enormity is before us, in the shape of this Lecompton constitution, indorsed by him. Will not the world believe he instigated the commission of these frauds, as he gives strength to those who committed them? This portion of my subject is painful for me to refer to. I wish, sir, for the honor of my country, the story of these frauds could be blotted from existence. I hope, in mercy, sir, to the boasted intelligence of this age, the historian, when writing a history of these times, will ascribe this attempt of the Executive to force this constitution upon an unwilling people to the fading intellect, the petulant passion, and trembling dotage of an old man on the verge of the grave.

Mr. GREEN. It was the common understanding among Senators that the Senate would take a recess until seven o'clock to-night, and that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] would then address the Senate on the subject under consideration. With that view I move that the Senate now take a recess until seven o'clock. I wish to state that no vote will be taken until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m., and the galleries, vestibule, and passages were unusually crowded. When Mr. Douglas entered the Chamber he was greeted by applause in the galleries.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to make a motion, to which

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Douglas.

SENATE.

I hope there will be no objection; it is, that the ladies be permitted to occupy the privileged seats on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to make, except that the Senator from California has quite unkindly taken my motion and appropriated the honor of it himself. [Laughter.] I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California moves that ladies, who are in attendance without, be allowed to occupy the privileged seats in the Senate Chamber. It requires unanimous consent. If there be no objection the Chair will allow them to be admitted. The Chair hears no objection. The Doorkeeper will admit the ladies.

The enunciation of the decision was received with applause from the galleries, which was promptly checked by the Vice President. Ladies were then admitted to such positions as were attainable; and members of the House of Representatives took possession of such Senator's seats as were vacant, and the aisles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be good enough to come to order. All persons in the Chamber will obtain seats as soon as possible, so that the proceedings may go on. When the Chair directed the Doorkeeper to admit ladies on the floor, there were demonstrations of applause in the galleries and on the floor. The Chair feels quite sure that it is unnecessary to do more than to suggest to persons present that it is improper at any time to disturb the deliberations of the Senate by such demonstrations, and he hopes not to find it necessary at any future time to check them.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I know not that my strength is sufficient to enable me to present to-night the views which I should like to submit upon the question now under consideration. My sickness for the last two weeks has deprived me of the pleasure of listening to the debates, or of an opportunity of reading the speeches that have been made; hence I shall not be able to perform the duty which might naturally have been expected of me, of replying to any criticisms that may have been presented upon my course, or upon my speeches, or upon my report. I must content myself with presenting my views upon the questions that are naturally brought up by the bill under consideration. I trust, however, that I may be pardoned for referring briefly, in the first instance, to my course upon the slavery question during the period that I have had a seat in the two Houses of Congress.

When I entered Congress, in 1843, I found upon the statute-book the evidences of a policy to adjust the slavery question and avoid sectional agitation by a geographical line drawn across the continent, separating free territory from slave territory. That policy had its origin at the beginning of this Government, and had prevailed up to that time. In 1787, while the convention was in session, forming the Constitution of the United States, the Congress of the Confederation adopted the ordinance of 1787, prohibiting slavery in all the territory northwest of the Ohio river. The first Congress that assembled under the Constitution extended all the provisions of that ordinance, with the exception of the clause prohibiting slavery, to the territory south of that river, thus making the Ohio river the dividing line between free territory and slave territory, free labor and slave labor.

Subsequently, after the acquisition of Louisiana, when Missouri, a portion of that territory, applied for admission into the Union as a State, the same policy was carried out by adopting the parallel of 36° 30', north latitude, from the western border of Missouri, as far westward as our territory then extended, as the barrier between free territory upon the one side, and slave territory upon the other.

Thus the question stood when I first entered the Congress of the United States. I examined the question when the proposition was made for the annexation of Texas, in 1845; and though I was unable to vindicate the policy of a geographical line upon sound political principles, still, finding that it had been in existence from the beginning of the Government, had been acquiesced in up to that time by the North and by the South, and that it had its origin in patriotic motives, I was anxious to abide by and perpetuate that policy rather than open the slavery agitation, and create sectional strife and heart-burning by attempting to restore the Government to those great principles which seemed to me to be more consistent with the right of self-government, upon which our institutions rest. For this reason I cordially acquiesced, in 1845, in the insertion into the resolutions for the annexation of Texas of a clause extending the Missouri compromise line through the Republic of Texas so far westward as the new acquisition then reached. I not only acquiesced in and supported the measure then, but I did it with the avowed purpose of continuing that line to the Pacific ocean, so soon as we should acquire the territory. Accordingly, in 1848, when we had secured New Mexico, Utah, and California, from the Republic of Mexico, and the question arose in this body in regard to the kind of government which should be established therein, the Senate, on my motion, adopted a proposition to extend the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific ocean, with the same understanding with which it was originally adopted. The Journal of the Senate contains the following entry of that proposition:

"On motion of Mr. DOUGLAS to amend the bill, section fourteen, line one, by inserting after the word 'enacted'—'that the line of 36° 30' of north latitude known as the Missouri compromise line, as defined by the eighth section of an act entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of said State into the Union on an equality with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories,' approved March 6, 1820, be, and the same is hereby, declared to extend to the Pacific ocean, and the said eighth section, together with the compromise therein effected, is hereby revived and declared to be in full force and binding for the future organization of the Territories of the United States in the same sense and with the same understanding with which it was originally adopted."

"It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 21."

"On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the yeas and nays being desired by one fifth of the Senators present—

"Those who voted in the affirmative, are

"Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Benton, Berrien, Bland, Bright, Butler, Calhoun, Cameron, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Douglas, Downs, Fitzgerald, Foote, Hannegan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, King, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Metcalfe, Pearce, Sebastian, Spruance, Sturgeon, Turney, and Underwood."

"Those who voted in the negative, are

"Messrs. Allen, Atherton, Baldwin, Bradbury, Breese, Clarke, Corwin, Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Dodge, Felch, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Miller, Niles, Phelps, Upham, Walker, and Webster."

"So the proposed amendment was agreed to."

Thus it will be seen that the proposition offered by me to extend the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific ocean, in the same sense and with the same understanding with which it was originally adopted, was agreed to by the Senate by a majority of twelve. When the bill was sent to the House of Representatives, that provision was stricken out, I think, by thirty-nine majority. By that vote, the policy of separating free territory from slave territory by a geographical line was abandoned by the Congress of the United States. It is not my purpose on this occasion to inquire whether the policy was right or wrong; whether its abandonment at that time was wise or unwise; that is a question long since consigned to history, and I leave it to that tribunal to determine. I only refer to it now for the purpose of showing the view which I then took of the question. It will be seen by reference to the votes in the Senate and House of Representatives, that southern men in a body, voted for the extension of the Missouri compromise line, and a very large majority of the northern men voted against it. The argument then made against that policy of a geographical line was one which upon principle it was difficult to answer. It was urged that if slavery was wrong north of the line, it could not be right south of the line; that if it was unwise, impolitic, and injurious on the one side, it could not be wise, politic, and judicious upon the other; that if the people should be left to decide the question for themselves on the one side, they should be entitled to the same privilege on the other. I thought these arguments were difficult to answer upon principle. The only answer urged was, that the policy had its origin in patriotic motives, in fraternal feeling, in that brotherly affection which ought to animate all the citizens of a common country; and that for the sake of peace and harmony and concord, we ought to adhere to and preserve that policy. Under these considerations, I not only voted for it, but moved it, and lamented as much as any man in the country its failure; because that failure precipitated us into a sectional strife and agitation, the like of which had never before been witnessed in the United States, and which alarmed the wisest, the purest, and the best patriots in the land for the safety of the Republic.

You all recollect the agitation which raged through this land from 1848 to 1850, and which was only quieted by the compromise measures of the latter year. You all remember how the venerable sage and patriot of Ashland was called forth from his retirement for the sole purpose of being able to contribute, by his wisdom, by his patriotism, by his experience, by the weight of his authority, something to calm the troubled waters, and restore peace and harmony to a distracted country. That contest waged fiercely, almost savagely, threatening the peace and existence of the Union, until at last, by the wise counsels of a Clay, a Webster, and a Cass, and the other leading spirits of the country, a new plan of conciliation and settlement was agreed upon, which again restored peace to the Union. The policy of a geographical line separating free territory from slave territory was abandoned by its friends only because they found themselves without the power to adhere to it, and carry it into effect in good faith. If that policy had been continued, if the Missouri line had been extended to the Pacific ocean, there would have been an end to the slavery agitation forever, for on one side as far west as the continent extended slavery would have been prohibited, while on the other, by legal implication, it would have been taken for granted that the institution of slavery would have existed and continued, and emigration would have sought the one side of the line or the other, as it preferred the one or the other class of domestic and social institutions. I confess, sir, that it was my opinion then, and is my opinion now, that the extension of that line would have been favorable to the South, so far as any sectional advantage would have been obtained, if it be an advantage to any section to extend its peculiar institutions. Southern men seemed so to consider it, for they voted almost unanimously in favor of that policy of prohibiting slavery on one side contented with a silent implication in its favor on the other. Northern Representatives and Senators seemed to take the same view of the subject, for a large majority of them voted against this geographical policy, and in lieu of it insisted upon a law prohibiting slavery everywhere within the Territories of the United States, north as well as south of the line; and not only in the Territories, but in the dockyards, the navy-yards, and all other public places over which the Congress of the United States had exclusive jurisdiction.

Such, sir, was the state of public opinion, as evidenced by the acts of Representatives and Senators on the question of a geographical line by the extension of the Missouri compromise, as it is called, from 1848 to 1850, which caused it to be abandoned, and the compromise measures of 1850 to be substituted in its place. Those measures are familiar to the Senate and to the country. They are predicated upon the abandonment of a geographical line, and upon the great principle of self-government in the Territories, and the sovereignty of the States over the question of slavery, as well as over all other matters of local and domestic concern. Inasmuch as the time-honored and venerated policy of a geographical line had been abandoned, the great leaders of the Senate, and the great Commoners in the other House of Congress, saw no other remedy but to return to the true principles of the Constitution—to those great principles of self-government and popular sovereignty, upon which all free institutions rest—and to leave the people of the Territories and of the States free to decide the slavery question, as well as all other questions, for themselves.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Douglas.

SENATE.

Mr. President, I am one of those who concurred cheerfully and heartily in this new line of policy marked out by the compromise measures of 1850. Having been compelled to abandon the former policy of a geographical line, for want of ability to carry it out, I joined with the great patriots to whom I have alluded, to calm and quiet the country, by the adoption of a policy more congenial to my views of free institutions, not only for the purpose of healing and harmonizing the strife and controversy which then existed, but for the further purpose of providing a rule of action in all time to come which would avoid sectional strife and sectional controversy in the future. It was one of the great merits of the compromise measures of 1850, indeed, it was their chief merit, that they furnished a principle, a rule of action which should apply everywhere, north and south of 36° 30', not only to the territory which we then had, but to all that we might afterwards acquire, and thus, if that principle was adhered to, prevent any strife, any controversy, any sectional agitation in the future. The object was to localize, not to nationalize, the controversy in regard to slavery, to make it a question for each State and each Territory to decide for itself, without any other State, or any other Territory, or the Federal Government, or any outside power, interfering, directly or indirectly, to influence or control the result.

My course upon those measures created, at first, great excitement, and I may say great indignation at my own home, so that it became necessary for me to go before the people and vindicate my action. I made a speech at Chicago upon my return home, in which I stated the principles of the compromise measures of 1850 as I have now stated them here, and vindicated them to the best of my ability. It is enough to say, that upon sober reflection, the people of Illinois approved the course which I then pursued; and when the Legislature came together, they passed, with great unanimity, resolutions indorsing emphatically the principle of those measures.

In 1854, when it became necessary to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, the question arose, what principle was to apply to those Territories? It was true they both lay north of the line of 36° 30'; but it was also true that four years before, the policy of a geographical line had been abandoned and repudiated by the Congress of the United States, and in lieu of it the plan of leaving each Territory free to decide the question for itself had been adopted. I felt it to be my duty, as a Senator from the State of Illinois, and I will say as a member of the Democratic party, to adhere in good faith to the principles of the compromise measures of 1850, and to apply them to Kansas and Nebraska as well as to the other Territories. To show that I was bound to pursue this course, it is only necessary to refer to the public incidents of those times. In the presidential election of 1852, the great political parties of that day each nominated its candidate for the Presidency upon a platform which indorsed the compromise measures of 1850, and both pledged themselves to carry them out in good faith in all future time in the organization of all new Territories. The Whig party adopted that platform at Baltimore, and placed General Scott, their candidate, upon it. The Democratic party adopted a platform identical in principle, so far as this question was concerned, and elected General Pierce President of the United States upon it. Thus the Whig party and the Democratic party each stood pledged to apply this principle in the organization of all new Territories. Not only was I as a Democrat—as a Senator who voted for their adoption—bound to apply their principle to this case; but as a Senator from Illinois, I was under an imperative obligation, if I desired to obey the will and carry out the wishes of my constituents, to apply the same principle. To show the views of my Legislature upon that subject, I will read one resolution, which was passed at the session of 1851:

“Resolved, That our liberty and independence are based on the right of the people to form for themselves such a government as they may choose; that this great privilege, the birthright of freemen, the gift of Heaven, secured to us by the blood of our ancestors, ought to be extended to future generations; and that no limitation ought to be applied to this power in the organization of any Territory of the United States, of either a territorial government or a State constitution: Provided, The government so established shall be republican, and in conformity with the Constitution.”

That resolution was adopted by a vote of sixty-one in the affirmative and only four in the negative. I undertake to say that resolution spoke the sentiments of the people of Illinois; and I, as their Senator, was only carrying out their sentiments and wishes by applying this principle to the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. This principle was applied in that bill in the precise language of the compromise measures of 1850, except the addition of a clause removing from the statute-book the eighth section of the Missouri act, as being inconsistent with that principle, and declaring that it was the true intent and meaning of the act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, the question arises whether the Lecompton constitution, which has been presented here for our acceptance, is in accordance with this principle embodied in the compromise measures, and clearly defined in the organic act of Kansas. Have the people of Kansas been left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution? Is the Lecompton constitution the act and deed of the people of Kansas? Does it embody their will? If not, you have no constitutional right to impose it upon them. If it does embody their will, if it is their act and deed, you have then a right to waive any irregularities that may have occurred, and receive the State into the Union. This is the main point, in my estimation, upon which the vote of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives, ought to depend in the decision of the Kansas question. Now, is there a man within the hearing of my voice who believes that the Lecompton constitution does embody the will of a majority of the bona fide inhabitants of Kansas? Where is the evidence that it does embody that will?

We are told that it was made by a convention assembled at Lecompton in September last, and has been submitted to the people for ratification or rejection. How submitted? In a manner that allowed every man to vote for it, but precluded the possibility of any man voting against it. We are told that there is a majority of about five thousand five hundred votes recorded in its favor under these circumstances. I refrain from going into the evidence which has been taken before the commission recently held in Kansas to show what proportion of these votes were fraudulent; but, supposing them all to have been legal, bona fide residents, what does that fact prove, when the people on that occasion were allowed only to vote for, and could not vote against, the constitution? On the other hand, we have a vote of the people in pursuance of law, on the 4th of January last, when this constitution was submitted by the Legislature to the people for acceptance or rejection, showing a majority of more than ten thousand against it. If you grant that both these elections were valid, if you grant that the votes were legal and fair, yet the majority is about two to one against this constitution. Here is evidence to my mind conclusive that this Lecompton constitution is not the embodiment of the popular will of Kansas. How is this evidence to be rebutted? By the assumption that the election on the 21st of December, where the voters were allowed to vote for it but not against it, was a legal election; and that the election on the 4th of January, where the people were allowed to vote for or against the constitution as they chose, was not a legal and valid election.

Sir, where do you find your evidence of the legality of the election of the 21st of December? Under what law was that election held? Under no law, except the decree of the Lecompton convention. Did that convention possess legislative power? Did it possess any authority to prescribe an election law? That convention possessed only such power as it derived from the Territorial Legislature in the act authorizing the assembling of the convention; and I submit that the same authority, the same power, existed in the Territorial Legislature to order an election on the 4th of January as existed in the convention to order one on the 21st of December. The Legislature had the same power over the whole subject on the 17th of December, when it passed a law for the submission of the constitution to the people, that it had on the 19th of February, when it enacted the statute for the assembling of the convention.

The convention assembled under the authority of the Territorial Legislature alone, and hence was bound to conduct all its proceedings in conformity with, and in subordination to, the authority of the Legislature. The moment the convention attempted to put its constitution into operation against the authority of the Territorial Legislature, it committed an act of rebellion against the Government of the United States. But we are told by the President that at the time the Territorial Legislature passed the law submitting the whole constitution to the people, the Territory had been prepared for admission into the Union as a State. How prepared? By what authority prepared? Not by the authority of any act of Congress—by no other authority than that of the Territorial Legislature; and clearly a convention assembled under that authority could do no act to subvert the Territorial Legislature which brought the convention into existence.

But gentlemen assume that the organic act of the Territory was an enabling act; that it delegated to the Legislature all the power that Congress had to authorize the assembling of a convention. Although I dissent from this doctrine, I am willing, for the sake of the argument, to assume it to be correct; and if it be correct, to what conclusion does it lead us? It only substitutes the Territorial Legislature for the authority of Congress, and gives validity to the convention; and therefore the Legislature would have just the same right that Congress otherwise would have had, and no more, and no less. Suppose now that Congress had passed an enabling act, and a convention had been called, and a constitution framed under it; but three days before that constitution was to take effect, Congress should pass another act repealing the convention law, and submitting the constitution to the vote of the people: would it be denied that the act of Congress submitting the constitution would be a valid act? If Congress would have authority thus to interpose, and submit the constitution to the vote of the people, it clearly follows that if the Legislature stood in the place of Congress, and was vested with the power which Congress had on the subject, it had the same right to interpose, and submit this constitution to the people, for ratification or rejection.

Therefore, sir, if you judge this constitution by the technical rules of law, it was voted down by an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas, and it became null and void; and you are called upon now to give vitality to a void, rejected, repudiated constitution. If, however, you set aside the technicalities of law, and approach it in the spirit of statesmanship, in the spirit of justice and of fairness, with an eye single to ascertain what is the wish and the will of that people, you are forced to the conclusion that the Lecompton constitution does not embody that will.

Sir, we have heard the argument over and over again, that the Lecompton convention were justified in withholding this constitution from submission to the people, for the reason that it would have been voted down if it had been submitted to the people for ratification or rejection. We are told that there was a large majority of Free-Soilers, of Abolitionists, of free-State men in the Territory, who would have voted down the constitution if they had got a chance, and that is the excuse for not allowing the people to vote upon it. That is an admission that this constitution is not the act and deed of the people of Kansas; that it does not embody their will; and yet you are called upon to give it force and vitality; to make it the fundamental law of Kansas with a knowledge that it is not the will of the people, and misrepresents their wishes. I ask you, sir, where is your right, under our principles of Government, to force a constitution upon an unwilling people? You may resort to all the evidence that you can obtain, from every source that you please, and you are driven to the same conclusion, that this constitution is not the will of the people. [The confusion created by the large number of persons in the galleries endeavoring to find places where they could see and hear, and others pressing in, was so great that the honorable Senator could, hardly make himself be heard.]

Mr. STUART. I am aware of the very great difficulty of preserving order; but still I think that, by a suggestion from the Chair, gentlemen in the galleries and about the lobbies would do it. They can do it if they will. The honorable Senator from Illinois speaks with difficulty, at any rate, and I hope there will be sufficient order preserved that he may be heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has observed a good deal of disorder about the central door of the main gallery. It is quite obvious that there are as many persons there as can stand now, and therefore it would be well for gentlemen not to press in. They are respectfully requested to preserve order and decorum.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If further evidence was necessary to show that the Lecompton constitution is not the will of the people of Kansas, you find it in the action of the Legislature of that Territory. On the first Monday in October an election took place for members of the Territorial Legislature. It was a severe struggle between the two great parties in the Territory. On a fair test, and at the fairest election, as is conceded on all hands, ever held in the Territory, a Legislature was elected. That Legislature came together and remonstrated, by an overwhelming majority, against this constitution, as not being the act and deed of that people, and not embodying their will. Ask the late Governor of the Territory, and he will tell you that it is a mockery to call this the act and deed of the people. Ask the Secretary of the Territory, ex-Governor Stanton, and he will tell you the same thing. I will hazard the prediction, that if you ask Governor Denver to-day, he will tell you, if he answers at all, that it is a mockery, nay, a crime, to attempt to enforce this constitution as an embodiment of the will of that people. Ask, then, your official high Government agents in the Territory; ask the Legislature elected by the people at the last election; consult the poll-books on a fair election held in pursuance of law; consult private citizens from there; consult whatever sources of information you please, and you get the same answer—that this constitution does not embody the public will, is not the act and deed of the people, does not represent their wishes; and hence I deny your right, your authority, to make it their organic law. If the Lecompton constitution ever becomes the organic law of the State of Kansas, it will be the act of Congress that makes it so, and not the act or will of the people of Kansas.

But we are told that it is a matter of but small moment whether the constitution embodies the public will or not, because it can be modified and changed by the people of Kansas at any time as soon as they are admitted into the Union. Sir, it matters not whether it can be changed or cannot be changed, so far as the principle involved is concerned. It matters not whether this constitution is to be the permanent fundamental law of Kansas, or is to last only a day, or a month, or a year; because, if it is not their act and deed you have no right to force it upon them for a single day. If you have the power to force it upon this people for one day, you may do it for a year, for ten years, or permanently. The principle involved is the same. It is as much a violation of fundamental principle, a violation of popular sovereignty, a violation of the Constitution of the United States, to force a State constitution on an unwilling people for a day, as it is for a year or for a longer time. When you set the example of violating the fundamental principles of free government, even for a short period, you have made a precedent that will enable unscrupulous men in future times, under high partisan excitement, to subvert all the other great principles upon which our institutions rest.

But, sir, is it true that this constitution may be changed immediately by the people of Kansas? The President of the United States tells us that the people can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure; that the people have no right to tie their own hands and prohibit a change of the constitution until 1864, or any other period; that the right of change always exists, and that the change may be made by the people at any time, in their own way, at pleasure, by the consent of the Legislature. I do not agree that the people cannot tie their own hands. I hold that a constitution is a social compact between all the people of the State that adopts it; between each man in the State, and every other man; binding upon them all; and they have a right to say it shall only be changed at a particular time and in a particular manner, and then only after such and such periods of deliberation. Not only have they a right to do this, but it is wise that the fundamental law should have some stability, some permanency, and not be liable to fluctuation and change by every ebullition of passion.

This constitution provides that, after the year 1864, it may be changed by the Legislature, by a two-thirds vote of each House, submitting to the people the question whether they will hold a convention for the purpose of amending the constitution. I hold that, when a constitution provides one time of change, by every rule of interpretation it excludes all other times; and, when it prescribes one mode of change, it excludes all other modes. I hold that it is the fair intentment and interpretation of this constitution that it is not to be changed until after the year 1864; and then only in the manner prescribed in the instrument. If it were true that this constitution was the act and deed of the people of Kansas—if it were true that it embodied their will—I hold that such a provision against change for a sufficient length of time to enable the people to test its practical workings would be a wise provision, and not liable to objection. That people are not capable of self-government who cannot make a constitution under which they are willing to live for a period of six years without change. I do not object that this constitution cannot be changed until after 1864, provided you show me that it be the act and deed of the people, and embodies their will now. If it be not their act and deed, you have no right to fix it upon them for a day—not for an hour—not for an instant; for it is a violation of the great principle of free government to force it upon them.

The President of the United States tells us that he sees no objection to inserting a clause in the act of admission declaratory of the right of the people of Kansas, with the consent of the first Legislature, to change this constitution notwithstanding the provision which it contains, that it shall not be changed until after the year 1864. Where does Congress get power to intervene and change a provision in the constitution of a State? If this constitution declares, as I insist it does, that it shall not be changed until after 1864, what right has Congress to intervene, to alter, or annul that provision prohibiting alteration? If you can annul one provision, you may another, and another, and another, until you have destroyed the entire instrument. I deny your right to annul; I deny your right to change, or even to construe the meaning of a single clause of this constitution. If it be the act and deed of the people of Kansas, and becomes their fundamental law, it is sacred; you have no right to touch it, no right to construe it, no right to determine its meaning; it is theirs, not yours. You must take it as it is or reject it as a whole; but put not your sacrilegious hands upon the instrument if it be their act and deed. Whenever this Government undertakes to construe State constitutions and to recognize the right of the people of a State to act in a different manner from that provided in their constitution; whenever it undertakes to give a meaning to a clause of a State constitution, which that State has not given; whenever the Government undertakes to do that, and its right is acknowledged, farewell to State rights, farewell to State sovereignty; your States become mere provinces, dependencies, with no more independence and no more rights than the counties of the different States. This doctrine, that Congress may intervene, and annul, construe, or change a clause in a State constitution, subverts the fundamental principles upon which our complex system of government rests.

Upon this point, the Committee on Territories, in the majority report, find themselves constrained to dissent from the doctrine of the President. They see no necessity; and, if I understand the report, no legal authority on the part of Congress to intervene and construe this or any other provision of the Constitution; but the distinguished gentleman who makes the report from the Committee on Territories has, in his own estimation, obviated all objection by finding a clause in the constitution of Kansas which he thinks remedies the whole evil. It is in the bill of rights, and is in these words:

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore, they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois will pause for a moment. The Sergeant-at-Arms will go up and close the center door of the ladies' gallery; shut it, and keep it shut, so as to admit no more persons there.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There appears to be some difficulty at the southern door of the eastern gallery, and I hope the Chair will direct that to be closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has sent an officer to that door to close it, and preserve quiet there. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Missouri, who makes the report of the majority of the committee, is under the impression that this clause in the bill of rights overrides and changes the provision in the Lecompton constitution which declares that there shall be no change until after 1864, and then only by a two-thirds vote of the Legislature. How does he make that override the prohibition? By taking the clause in the bill of rights, which is intended only to assert abstract rights that may be exercised by the people when driven to the last resort, to wit: to revolution. That is an abstract principle, intended to assert the right in the people of Kansas to change their form of government, under the same law, the same authority that our ancestors resisted British power, and overthrew the British authority upon this continent. It was under that principle that our fathers threw the tea into Boston harbor. It was under that principle that our fathers burnt up the stamps, and sent the stamp agents out of the country. It was under that principle that our fathers resorted to arms to maintain the right to change their form of government from a monarchy to a Republic—change by revolution because they had arrived at the point where resistance was a less evil than submission. That the people have a right to appeal to the God of arms to overthrow the power that oppresses them, and change their form of government whenever their oppressions are intolerable, and resistance is a less evil than submission, is a great truth that no Republican, no Democrat, no citizen of a free country, should ever question. But, sir, that clause was never intended to furnish the lawful mode by which this constitution could be changed, for the reason that the same instrument points out a different mode than the one therein asserted; and when a specific mode is prescribed, and time is to elapse before that mode can be resorted to, that excludes the idea that it can be done in any other mode, or at a prior time.

But, sir, this article from the bill of rights proves entirely too much. The President says you may put into this bill a clause recognizing the right of the people of Kansas to change their constitution by the consent of the first Legislature. What does the bill of rights say? That it is the inalienable and indefeasible right of the people, at all times, to alter, abolish, or reform their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, not in such manner as the Legislature shall prescribe, not at such time as the legislative authority, or the existing government may provide, but in such manner as the people think proper in town meeting, in convention, through the Legislature, in popular assemblages, at the point of the bayonet, in any manner the people themselves may determine. That is the right and the nature of the right authorized by this bill of rights. It is the revolutionary remedy, not the lawful mode. There are two modes of changing the constitution of a State; one lawful, the other revolutionary. The lawful mode is the one prescribed in the instrument. The revolutionary mode is one in violation of the instrument. The revolutionary mode may be peaceful, or may be forcible; that depends on whether there is resistance. If a people are unanimous in favor of a change, if nobody opposes it, the revolutionary means may be a peaceful remedy; but if, in the progress of the revolution, while you are making the change, you meet with resistance, then it becomes civil war, treason, rebellion, if you fail, and a successful revolution if you succeed.

I say, then, the mode pointed out in the bill of rights is the revolutionary mode, and not the lawful means provided in the instrument; but if the Committee on Territories be right in saying that this is a lawful mode, then the recommendation of the President, that Congress should recognize the right to do it by the first Legislature, violates this constitution. Why? The President recommends us to recognize their rights through the Legislature, and in that mode alone. The bill of rights says the people shall do it in such manner as they please. If the construction given by the Committee on Territories be right, you dare not vote for the President's proposition to recognize the right of the first Legislature to do it, for you give a construction to the instrument in violation of its terms.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understood the Senator to say just now that Congress had no right to look into the Constitution of a State and place a construction upon it. If that be true, I would inquire of the Senator from Illinois, how is Congress to know whether a constitution is republican or not? If it be true, I would inquire of him further, why is he here now discussing and placing a construction upon the constitution of Kansas?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will take great pleasure in answering the gentleman from South Carolina. I have a right to look into this constitution to see whether, in my opinion, it is republican. I have this right to look at it only for the purpose of regulating my vote. The judgment on which I base my vote is one binding on nobody but myself. I am talking now, not on forming a construction by which members of Congress are to govern themselves, but I am speaking of your right to place a construction on this constitution binding upon the people and government of Kansas. Give me the power to construe the constitution of Kansas authoritatively, and then I have the power to change it, to alter it, to annul it, to make it mean what I please, and not what they mean.

Mr. HAMMOND. I should have thought that the Senator would have denounced the attempt to construe the constitution, and left the matter there, after having asserted that no such power exists; but when he goes on to construe it himself, he is inconsistent with his first proposition that there is no right to construe it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, sir. I deny the right of Congress to construe it authoritatively for the people of Kansas. I am not denying the right of the Senator from South Carolina to put his own construction upon it. I am not denying the right of each Senator here to make up his own mind in regard to it. It is the duty of each Senator here to do that for himself; but that is only to satisfy his own judgment and his own conscience in regulating his vote upon the question. The point I am arguing is, whether this Congress has any power, by a rule of construction, to change the constitution of the people of a State, and make its construction binding on the authorities and people of that State. I repeat, if this Congress can exercise that power, there is an end of State rights, an end of State sovereignty; this Government becomes a consolidated Government, an empire, a central Power, with provinces and dependencies, and ceases to be a confederation of sovereign and independent States. I am arguing against the propriety of Congress acceding to the recommendation of the President to strike that fatal blow at the sovereignty of the States of this Union.

But, sir, my friend from Ohio, who cannot accede quite to this doctrine of the President any more than the Committee on Territories can, proposes to remedy this matter in a different way. He has offered an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the following amendment, intended to be proposed by Mr. PUGH to the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. GREEN to the bill (S. No. 161) "for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union:" At the end thereof add the following section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the admission of the States of Minnesota and Kansas into the Union, by this act, shall never be so construed as to deny, limit, or otherwise impair, the right of the people of the said States, with the assent of their Legislatures, severally, at all times, to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper, so that the same be still republican and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am at a loss to know what object my friend from Ohio expects to accomplish by this proviso, that nothing in the act of admission shall be construed to deny, limit, or otherwise impair, the right of the people to change their constitution. Who ever dreamed that there was anything in the act of admission which could be so construed? It is not the act of admission to which we are alluding; it is the provision in this constitution which says it shall not be changed until after 1864.

Nobody pretends that you can put anything in the act of admission which would limit this right. What I am denying is your right to put anything in the act of admission either to limit, or extend, or construe the constitution. Nobody pretends that this act of admission affects this point at all. The objection, if it be an objection, is in the constitution itself, not in the act of admission.

Then what legal effect would the amendment of the Senator from Ohio have, if it should be adopted? I presume no one pretends that it would have any legal effect. Is there a Senator here who pretends that the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would confer any power or authority on the people of Kansas to change their constitution which they would not have without it? I am informed the Senator from Ohio said, in his speech in explanation of it, that it did not confer any right which the people would not otherwise have. Then why adopt it? I can conceive of but one motive, and that is to lead the people to infer that they have secured a right by that proviso which they really have not got; to lead them to suppose that they have gained an advantage which in reality they do not possess. Is that the object? Is it the object to obviate an objection, and yet in fact to leave the objection in full force? Why, I ask, is it proposed to put that amendment in the bill if it has no legitimate effect, if it does not give the people any right, and privilege, which they would not possess without it? Perhaps I may be asked, on the contrary, what is the objection to putting it in. It may be said it is only the expression of the individual opinion of the members of Congress. I will tell you my objection to putting this clause in the act of admission. I object to inserting any clause in the act of admission that expresses any opinion, one way or the other, in respect to the propriety of any provision in the constitution. If you may pronounce judgment on the propriety of one clause, although it has no legal effect to change it, you may on the propriety of another clause. Suppose, for instance, the Senator from New York should offer an amendment, that nothing contained in this act of admission shall be construed to sanction or tolerate the right to hold property in man; or that nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or permit slaveholding in said State; or should propose to insert an opinion that slaveholding was a crime: would southern men think there was no objection to it because it had no legal effect? Are you willing that Congress shall set the example of inserting, in acts of admission, clauses that pronounce judgment against the domestic institutions of a State? Are you willing that a Congress, composed of a majority of free-State men, shall put clauses in an act of admission condemning slaveholding? or, if we were a minority, would we be willing that you should put a clause in an act of admission condemning our free institutions?

Now, sir, I hold that Congress has no right to pronounce its opinion even upon the propriety of any local or domestic institution of any State of this Union. Each State is sovereign, with the unlimited and unrestricted power and right to manage its local and internal concerns to suit itself, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution of the United States. I warn gentlemen that when, in order to catch a little popular favor, they set the example of backing up a vote in favor of this enormous fraud by putting a clause in the bill having no legal effect, but expressing opinions upon the propriety of this or that clause of a State constitution, they are setting an example that may return upon them in a way that will not be pleasant. I protest against Congress interfering either to annul or construe, or express opinions upon the propriety of this clause or that clause of the constitution. I repeat, if the constitution be the act and deed of the people of Kansas, and if its provisions are not in violation of the Constitution of the United States, that people had a right to put them there; and you have no right to touch them, or to pronounce judgment upon them.

Mr. President, I come back to the question: ought we to receive Kansas into the Union with the Lecompton constitution? Is there satisfactory evidence that it is the act and deed of that people? that it embodies their will? Is the evidence satisfactory that the people of that Territory have been left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way? I think not. I do not acknowledge the propriety, or justice, or force of that special pleading which attempts, by technicalities, to fasten a constitution upon a people which, it is admitted, they would have voted down if they had had a chance to do so, and which does not embody their will. Let me ask gentlemen from the South, if the case had been reversed, would they have taken the same view of the subject? Suppose it were ascertained, beyond doubt or cavil, that three fourths of the people of Kansas were in favor of a slaveholding State, and a convention had been assembled by just such means and under just such circumstances as brought the Lecompton convention together; and suppose that when they assembled it was ascertained that three fourths of the convention were Free-Soilers, while three fourths of the people were in favor of a slaveholding State; suppose an election took place in the Territory during the sitting of the convention, which developed the fact that the convention did not represent the people; suppose that convention of Free-Soilers had proceeded to make a constitution and allowed the people to vote for it, but not against it, and thus forced a Free-Soil constitution upon a slaveholding people against their will—would you, gentlemen from the South, have submitted to the outrage? Would you have come up here and demanded that the Free-Soil constitution—adopted at an election where all the affirmative votes were received, and all the negative votes rejected, for the reason that it would have been voted down if the negative votes had been received—should be accepted? Would you have said that it was fair, that it was honest, to force an abolition constitution on a slaveholding people against their will? Would you not have come forward and have said to us that you denied that it was the embodiment of the public will, and demanded that it should be sent back to the people to be voted upon, so as to ascertain the fact? Would you not have said to us that you were willing to live up to the principle of the Nebraska bill, to leave the people perfectly free to form such institutions as they please; and that if we would only send that constitution back and let the people have a fair vote upon it, you would abide the result? Suppose we, being a northern majority, had said to you: "no; we have got a sectional advantage and we intend to hold it; and we will force this constitution upon an unwilling people, merely because we have the power to do it;" would you have said that was fair?

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the Senator allow me to answer him?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND. As the Senator looked towards me in asking his question, I will undertake, though without authority, to answer for the slaveholding community. If having had the power to establish a slaveholding constitution, we had refrained from exercising it, and those in favor of a free-State constitution had established one to that effect, I say that the slaveholders would have submitted to it, until through the forms of constitutional law they could have altered it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator assumes what

SENATE.

I did not certainly intend, when he says that I looked at him. I was propounding the question, however, to any Senator, and am as willing that the Senator from South Carolina should reply as any other. He assumes as true, for the purposes of his answer, the very fact that is denied—that they had the power.

Mr. HAMMOND. Asserted on all hands, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS. What?

Mr. HAMMOND. Asserted that there was a free-State majority when the convention was elected.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Illinois asserted it to-night.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; and I assert now that there was a free-State majority; and I assert also, that one half the counties of the Territory were disfranchised and not allowed to vote at the election of delegates. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HAMMOND. That has been answered over and over again—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will pause until order is restored.

Mr. MASON. I rise to a question of privilege. If there is again disorder in this Chamber I shall insist upon the galleries being cleared.

Mr. BROWN. I hope that order will be enforced; the Senate is not a theater.

Mr. TOOMBS. The statement just made by the Senator from Illinois is a great mistake, and I shall take issue with him when he sits down. I say it is not true in any sense, and I will answer it.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia gives notice that if there be a repetition of the demonstrations in the galleries he will move to clear them.

Mr. MASON. If there is again disorder in the galleries, let it arise from what source it may, I shall ask the Chair to enforce the order of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the debate commenced the Chair expressed the hope that these demonstrations would not occur. He did not then think that he would have to repeat the expression of that hope. This floor is covered by persons not members of the Senate, admitted by the consent of the body unanimously, and certainly something is due to the courtesy of the Senate. The Chair does not believe these demonstrations will be repeated, and therefore takes no further notice of what has occurred. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The interposition of the denial that about one half of the counties were disfranchised, I presume can have but very little weight on the argument. It has been proven over and over again; in my estimation the proof is conclusive as to the fifteen counties, and satisfactory, I think, as to nineteen, being half the counties of the Territory, that there was not such a census and registration as authorized a vote for delegates. It has been attempted to be proved, however, that there were not a great many votes in those counties. I believe the president of the convention estimates that there were not more than fifteen hundred or two thousand in those counties. Suppose that was all. There were only a little over two thousand votes polled at the election of delegates in the other nineteen counties which elected all the delegates. If the disfranchised counties contained fifteen hundred voters, is it not conclusive that, with the addition of five or six hundred persons in the other counties, they could have changed the result? Having been disfranchised in one half the counties, the friends of those who were disfranchised may not have voted in the other counties, because they had no hope of overcoming the majority in the other half. I did not intend to go into the argument on that point again; and I should not have alluded to it now but for the fact that the Senator from South Carolina had to assume as true what I understood not to be true, in order to predicate his answer upon it, that he, as a southern man, would vote to admit the State if the case had been reversed, and a free-State constitution was being forced upon an unwilling people, with the knowledge that it did not reflect the sentiments of that people.

Mr. HAMMOND. Allow me to say that, if the slaveholders, under these circumstances, had never had a majority at all, they would nevertheless have submitted until they could alter the constitution, if they could possibly do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I can only say, then, that they are a very submissive people. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMMOND. Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have never seen the day when I would be willing to submit to the action of a minority forcing a constitution on an unwilling people against their will because it had got an advantage. It violates the fundamental principle of government; it violates the foundations on which all free government rests; it is a proposition in violation of the Democratic creed; in violation of the Republican creed, in violation of the American creed, in violation of the creed of every party which professes to be governed by the principles of free institutions and fair elections.

Mr. HAMMOND. Will the Senator allow me to say one word more? If the slaveholders, under the circumstances that he stated, were a minority, they would have submitted. If they were a majority, as I assume, they would have submitted until, under the forms of constitutional law, they could have properly asserted their power.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understood the Senator to say that; I must say to him that I would rather not repeat questions on the same point over and over again. I am very feeble to-night, and shall probably not have strength enough to go through with my remarks. I only desire to say on that point, that I regard the principle involved here as vital and fundamental, as lying at the foundation of all free government, and the violation of it as a death blow to State rights and State sovereignty. But, sir, I pass on.

If you admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, you also admit her with the State government which has been brought into existence under it. Is the evidence satisfactory that that State government has been fairly and honestly elected? Is the evidence satisfactory that the elections were fairly and honestly held, and fairly and honestly returned? You have all seen the evidence showing the fraudulent voting, the forged returns, from precinct after precinct, changing the result not only upon the legislative ticket, but also upon the ticket for Governor and State officers. The false returns in regard to Delaware Crossing, changing the complexion of the Legislature, are admitted. The false returns are established equally conclusively as to the Shawnee precinct, the Oxford precinct, the Kickapoo precinct, and many others, making a difference of some three thousand votes in the general aggregate, and changing the whole result of the election. Yet, sir, we are called upon to admit Kansas with the State government thus brought into existence not only by fraudulent voting, but forged returns, sustained by perjury, now established beyond mistake. The Senate well recollects the efforts that I made before the subject was referred to the committee, and since, to ascertain to whom the certificates of election were awarded, that we might know whether they were given to the men honestly elected, or to the men whose elections depended upon forgery and perjury. Can any one tell me how to whom those certificates have been issued, if they have been issued at all? Can any man tell me whether we are installing, by receiving this State government, officers whose sole title depends upon forgery, or those whose title depends upon popular votes? We have been calling for that information for about three months, but we have called in vain. One day the rumor would be that Mr. Calhoun would declare the free-State ticket elected, and next day that he would declare the pro-slavery ticket elected. So it has alternated, like the chills and fever, day after day, until within the last three days, when the action of Congress became a little dubious, when it was doubtful whether northern men were willing to vote for a State government depending on forgery and perjury, and then we find that the president of the Lecompton convention addresses a letter to the editor of the Star, a newspaper in this city, telling what he thinks is the result of the election. He says it is true that he has received no answer to his letters of inquiry to Governor Denver; he has no official information on the subject, but, from rumors and unofficial information, he is now satisfied that the Delaware Crossing return was a fraud; that it will be set aside; and that, accordingly, the result will be that certificates will be issued to the free-State men. I do not mean to deny that Mr. Calhoun may think such will be the result; but while he may think so, I would rather know how the fact is. His thoughts are not important, but the fact is vital in establishing the honesty or dishonesty of the State government which we are about to recognize. It so happens that Mr. Calhoun has no more power, no more authority over that question now, than the Senator from Missouri, or any other member of this body. The celebrated Lecompton schedule provides, that—

"In case of removal, absence, or disability of the president of this convention to discharge the duties herein imposed on him, the president pro tempore of this convention shall perform said duties; and in case of absence, refusal, or disability of the president pro tempore, a committee, consisting of seven, or a majority of them, shall discharge the duties required of the president of this convention."

As Mr. Calhoun is absent from the Territory, and, by reason of that absence, is deprived of all authority over the subject-matter, and as the president pro tempore has succeeded to his powers, is it satisfactory for the deposed president to address a letter to the editor of the Star, announcing his private opinion as to who has been elected? I should like to know who the president pro tempore is, and where he is; and, if he is in Kansas, whether he has arrived at the same conclusion which the ex-president Calhoun has announced. I should like to know whether that president pro tempore has already issued his certificates to the pro-slavery men in Kansas, while Mr. Calhoun expresses the opinion in the Star that the certificates will be issued to the free-State men? If that president pro tempore has become a fugitive from justice, and escaped from the Territory, I should like then to know who are the committee of seven that were to take his place; and whether they, or a majority of them, have arrived at the same conclusion to which Mr. Calhoun has come? Inasmuch as this opinion is published to the world just before the vote is to be taken here, and is expected to catch the votes of some green members of one body or the other, I should like to know whether certificates have been issued? and, if so, by whom, and to whom? where the president pro tempore is? where the committee of seven may be found? and then we might know who constitute the Legislature, and who constitute the State government which we are to bring into being. We are not only to admit Kansas with a constitution, but with a State government; with a Governor, a Legislature, a judiciary; with executive, legislative, judicial, and ministerial officers. Inasmuch as we are told by the President that the first Legislature may take steps to call a convention to change the constitution, I should like to know of whom that Legislature is composed? Inasmuch as the Governor would have the power to veto an act of the Legislature calling a convention, I should like to know who is Governor, so that I may judge whether he would veto such an act? Cannot our good friends get the president pro tempore of the convention to write a letter to the Star? Can they not procure a letter from the committee of seven? Can they not clear up this mystery, and relieve our suspicious minds of anything unfair or foul in the arrangement of this matter? Let us know how the fact is.

This publication of itself is calculated to create more apprehension than there was before. As long as Mr. Calhoun took the ground that he would never declare the result until Lecompton was admitted, and that if it was not admitted, he would never make the decision, there seemed to be some reason in his course; but when, after taking that ground for months, it became understood that Lecompton was dead, or was lingering and languishing, and likely to die, and when a few more votes were necessary, and a pretext was necessary to be given, in order to secure them, we find this letter published by the deposed ex-President, giving his opinion when he had no power over the subject; and when it appears by the constitution itself that another man or another body of men has the decision in their hands, it is calculated to arouse our suspicions as to what the result will be after Lecompton is admitted.

Mr. President, in the course of the debate on this bill, before I was compelled to absent myself from the Senate on account of sickness, and I presume the same has been the case during my absence, much was said on the slavery question in connection with the admission of Kansas. Many gentlemen have labored to produce the impression that the whole opposition to the admission arises out of the fact that the Lecompton constitution makes Kansas a slave State. I am sure that no gentlemen here will do me the injustice to assert or suppose that my opposition is predicated on that consideration, in view of the fact that my speech against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution was made on the 9th of December, two weeks before the vote was taken upon the slavery clause in Kansas, and when the general impression was that the pro-slavery clause would be excluded. I predicated my opposition then, as I do now, upon the ground that it was a violation of the fundamental principles of government, a violation of popular sovereignty, a violation of the Democratic platform, a violation of all party platforms, and a fatal blow to the independence of the new States. I told you then that you had no more right to force a free-State constitution upon a people against their will than you had to force a slave-State constitution. Will gentlemen say that, on the other side, slavery has no influence in producing that united, almost unanimous support which we find from gentlemen living in one section of the Union in favor of the Lecompton constitution? If slavery had nothing to do with it, would there have been so much hesitation about Mr. Calhoun's declaring the result of the election prior to the vote in Congress? I submit, then, whether we ought not to discard the slavery question altogether, and approach the real question before us fairly, calmly, dispassionately, and decide whether, but for the slavery clause, this Lecompton constitution could receive a single vote in either House of Congress. Were it not for the slavery clause, would there be any objection to sending it back to the people for a vote? Were it not for the slavery clause, would there be any objection to letting Kansas wait until she had ninety thousand people, instead of coming into the Union with not over forty-five or fifty thousand? Were it not for the slavery question, would Kansas have occupied any considerable portion of our thoughts? would it have divided and distracted political parties so as to create bitter and acrimonious feelings? I say now to our southern friends, that I will act on this question on the right of the people to decide for themselves, irrespective of the fact whether they decide for or against slavery, provided it be submitted to a fair vote at a fair election, and with honest returns.

In this connection there is another topic to which I desire to allude. I seldom refer to the course of newspapers, or notice the articles which they publish in regard to myself; but the course of the Washington Union has been so extraordinary, for the last two or three months, that I think it well enough to make some allusion to it. It has read me out of the Democratic party every other day, at least, for two or three months, and keeps reading me out, [laughter;] and, as if it had not succeeded, still continues to read me out, using such terms as "traitor," "renegade," "deserter," and other kind and polite epithets of that nature. Sir, I have no vindication to make of my democracy against the Washington Union, or any other newspapers. I am willing to allow my history and action for the last twenty years to speak for themselves as to my political principles, and my fidelity to political obligations. The Washington Union has a personal grievance. When its editor was nominated for Public Printer I declined to vote for him, and stated that at some time I might give my reasons for doing so. Since I declined to give that vote, this scurrilous abuse, these vindictive and constant attacks have been repeated almost daily on me. There is one article in an issue of that paper which I ask my friend from Michigan to read.

Mr. STUART read the following editorial article from the Washington Union of November 17, 1857:

"FREE-SOILISM.—The primary object of all government in its original institution, is the protection of person and property. It is for this alone that men surrender a portion of their natural rights.

"In order that this object may be fully accomplished, it is necessary that this protection should be equally extended to all classes of free citizens without exception. This, at least, is a fundamental principle of the Constitution of the United States, which is the original compact on which all our institutions are based.

"Slaves were recognized as property in the British colonies of North America by the Government of Great Britain, by the colonial laws, and by the Constitution of the United States. Under these sanctions vested rights have accrued to the amount of some sixteen hundred million dollars. It is, therefore, the duty of Congress and the State Legislatures to protect that property.

"The Constitution declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.' Every citizen of one State coming into another State has, therefore, a right to the protection of his person, and that property which is recognized as such by the Constitution of the United States, any law of a State to the contrary notwithstanding. So far from any State having a right to deprive him of this property, it is its bounden duty to protect him in its possession.

"If these views are correct—and we believe it would be difficult to invalidate them—it follows that all State laws, whether organic or otherwise, which prohibit a citizen of one State from settling in another, and bringing his slave property with him, and most especially declaring it forfeited, are direct violations of the original intention of a Government which, as before stated, is the protection of person and property, and of the Constitution of the United States, which recognizes property in slaves, and declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States,' among the most essential of which is the protection of person and property.

"What is recognized as property by the Constitution of the United States, by a provision which applies equally to all the States, has an inalienable right to be protected in all the States."

"The protection of property being, next to that of person, the most important object of all good government, and property in slaves being recognized by the Constitution of the United States, as well as originally by all the Old Thirteen States, we have never doubted that the emancipation of slaves in those States where it previously existed, by an arbitrary act of the Legislature, was a gross violation of the rights of property."

"The emancipation of the slaves of the northern States was then, as previously stated, a gross outrage on the rights of property, inasmuch as it was not a voluntary relinquishment on the part of the owners. It was an act of coercive legislation."

"This measure of emancipation was the parent or the offspring of a doctrine which may be so extended as to place the property of every man in the community at the mercy of rabid fanaticism or political expediency. It is only to substitute scruples of conscience in place of established constitutional principles, and all laws and all constitutions become a dead letter. The rights of person and property become subservient not to laws and constitutions, but to fanatical dogmas, and thus the end and object of all good government is completely frustrated. There is no longer any rule of law nor any constitutional guide; and the people are left to the discretion, or rather the madness, of a school of instructors who can neither comprehend their own dogmas nor make them comprehensible to others."

"Where is all this to end? and what security have the free citizens of the United States that their dearest rights may not, one after another, be offered up at the shrine of the demon of fanaticism, the most dangerous of all the enemies of freedom? If the Constitution is no longer to be our guide and protector, where shall we find barriers to defend us against a system of legislation restrained by no laws and no constitutions, which creates crime at pleasure, punishes them at will, and sacrifices the rights of person and property to a dogma, or a scruple of conscience? All this is but the old laws of Puritanism now fomenting and sowing in the exhausted beer-barrel of Massachusetts. The descendants of this race of ecclesiastical tyrants, or rather ecclesiastical slaves, have spread over the western part of the State of New York, and throughout all the new States, where they have, to some extent, disseminated their manners, habits, and principles, most especially their blind subservency to old idols, and their abject subjection to their priests. There is no doubt that they aspire to give tone and character to the whole Confederacy, and believe that their dream will be realized. We are pretty well convinced, however, that the people of the United States will never become a nation of fanatical Puritans."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, you here find several distinct propositions advanced boldly by the Washington Union editorially and apparently authoritatively, and every man who questions any of them is denounced as an Abolitionist, a Free-Soiler, a fanatic. The propositions are, first, that the primary object of all government at its original institution is the protection of person and property; second, that the Constitution of the United States declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; and that, therefore, thirdly, all State laws, whether organic or otherwise, which prohibit the citizens of one State from settling in another with their slave property, and especially declaring it forfeited, are direct violations of the original intention of the Government and Constitution of the United States; and fourth, that the emancipation of the slaves of the northern States was a gross outrage on the rights of property, inasmuch as it was involuntarily done on the part of the owner.

Remember that this article was published in the Union on the 17th of November, and on the 18th appeared the first article giving the adhesion of the Union to the Lecompton constitution. It was in these words:

"KANSAS AND HER CONSTITUTION.—The vexed question is settled. The problem is solved. The dread point of danger is passed. All serious trouble to Kansas affairs is over and gone."

and a column, nearly, of the same sort. Then, when you come to look into the Lecompton constitution, you find the same doctrine incorporated in it which was put forth editorially in the Union. What is it?

"ARTICLE 7. Section 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Then in the schedule is a provision that the constitution may be amended after 1864 by a two thirds vote,

"But no alteration shall be made to affect the right of property in the ownership of slaves."

It will be seen by these clauses in the Lecompton constitution, that they are identical in spirit with this authoritative article in the Washington Union of the day previous to its indorsement of this constitution, and every man is branded as a Free-Soiler and Abolitionist, who does not subscribe to them. The proposition is advanced that the emancipation acts of New York, of New England, of Pennsylvania, and of New Jersey, were unconstitutional, were outrages upon the right of property, were violations of the Constitution of the United States. The proposition is advanced that a southern man has a right to move from South Carolina, with his negroes, into Illinois, to settle there and hold them there as slaves, anything in the constitution and laws of Illinois to the contrary, notwithstanding. The proposition is, that a citizen of Virginia has rights in a free State, which the citizen of a free State cannot himself have. We prohibit ourselves from holding slaves within our limits; and yet, according to this doctrine, a citizen of Kentucky can move into our State, bring in one hundred slaves with him, and hold them as such in defiance of the constitution and laws of our own State. If that proposition is true, the creed of the Democratic party is false. The principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill is, that "each State and each Territory shall be left perfectly free to form and regulate its domestic institutions in its own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." I claim that Illinois has the sovereign right to prohibit slavery, a right as undeniable as that the sovereignty of Virginia may authorize its existence. We have the same right to prohibit it that you have to recognize and protect it. Each State is sovereign within its own sphere of powers, sovereign in respect to its own domestic and local institutions and internal concerns. So long as you regulate your local institutions to suit yourselves, we are content; but when you claim the right to override our laws and our constitution, and deny our right to form our institutions to suit ourselves, I protest against it. The same doctrine is asserted in this Lecompton constitution. There, it is stated, that the right of property in slaves is "before and higher than any constitutional sanction."

Mr. President, I recognize the right of the slaveholding States to regulate their local institutions, to claim the services of their slaves under their own State laws, and I am prepared to perform each and every one of my obligations under the Constitution of the United States in respect to them; but I do not admit, and I do not think they are safe in asserting, that their right of property in slaves is higher than and above constitutional obligations, is independent of constitutional obligations. When you rely upon the Constitution and upon your own laws, you are safe. When you go beyond and above constitutional obligations, I know not where your safety is. If this doctrine be true that slavery is higher than the Constitution, and above the Constitution, it necessarily follows that a State cannot abolish it, cannot prohibit it, and the doctrine of the Washington Union, that the emancipation laws were outrages on the rights of property, and violations of the Constitution, becomes the law

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Douglas.

SENATE.

When I saw that article in the Union of the 17th of November, followed by the glorification of the Lecompton constitution on the 18th of November, and this clause in the constitution asserting the doctrine that no State has a right to prohibit slavery within its limits, I saw that there was a fatal blow being struck at the sovereignty of the States of this Union, a death blow to State rights, subversive of the Democratic platform and of the principles upon which the Democratic party have ever stood and upon which I trust they ever will stand. Because of these extraordinary doctrines, I declined to vote for the editor of the Washington Union for Public Printer; and for that refusal, as I suppose, I have been read out of the party by the editor of the Union at least every other day from that time to this. Sir, I submit the question: who has deserted the Democratic party and the Democratic platform, he who stands by the sovereign right of the States to establish, abolish, and prohibit slavery as it pleases, or he who attempts to strike down the sovereignty of the States, and combine all power in one central government, and establish an empire instead of a Confederacy?

The principles upon which the presidential campaign of 1856 was fought, on which the present Chief Magistrate was brought to the high position he now occupies, are well known to the country. At least, in Illinois, I think I am authorized to state what they were with clearness and precision, so far as the slavery question is concerned. The Democracy of Illinois are prepared to stand on the platform upon which the battle of 1856 was fought. It was:

First, The migration or importation of negroes into the country having been prohibited since 1808—never again to be renewed—each State will take care of its own colored population.

Second, That while negroes are not citizens of the United States, and hence not entitled to political equality with whites, they should enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities which they are capable of exercising, consistent with the safety and welfare of the community where they live.

Third, That each State and Territory must judge and determine for itself of the nature and extent of these rights and privileges.

Fourth, That while each free State should and will maintain and protect all the rights of the slaveholding States, they will, each for itself, maintain and defend its sovereign right within its own limits, to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Fifth, That in the language of Mr. Buchanan's letter of acceptance of the presidential nomination, the Nebraska-Kansas act does no more than give the form of law to this elementary principle of self-government, when it declares that the people of a Territory, like those of a State, shall decide for themselves whether slavery shall or shall not exist within their limits.

These were the general propositions on which we maintained the canvass on the slavery question—the right of each State to decide for itself; that a negro should have such rights as he was capable of enjoying, and could enjoy, consistently with the safety and welfare of society; and that each State should decide for itself the nature and extent and description of those rights and privileges. Hence, if you choose in North Carolina to have slaves, it is your business, and not ours. If we choose in Illinois to prohibit slavery, it is our right, and you must not interfere with it. If New York chooses to give privileges to the negro which we withhold, it is her right to extend them, but she must not attempt to force us to do the same thing. Let each State take care of its own affairs, mind its own business, and let its neighbors alone, then there will be peace in the country. Whenever you attempt to enforce uniformity, and, judging that a peculiar institution is good for you, and therefore good for everybody else, try to force it on everybody, you will find that there will be resistance to the demand. Our Government was not formed on the idea that there was to be uniformity of local laws or local institutions. It was founded upon the supposition that there must be diversity and variety in the institutions and laws. Our fathers foresaw that the local institutions which would suit the granite hills of New Hampshire would be ill adapted to the rice plantations of South Carolina. They foresaw that the institutions which would be well adapted to the mountains and valleys of Pennsylvania, would not suit the plantation interests of Virginia. They foresaw that the great diversity of climate, of production, of interests, would require a corresponding diversity of local laws and local institutions. For this reason, they provided for thirteen separate States, each with a separate Legislature, and each State sovereign within its own sphere, with the right to make all its local laws and local institutions to suit itself, on the supposition that they would be as different and as diversified as the number of States themselves. Then the General Government was made, with a Congress having limited and specified powers, extending only to those subjects which were national and not local, which were Federal and not State.

These were the principles on which our institutions were established. These are the principles on which the Democratic party has ever fought its battles. This attempt now to establish the doctrine that a free State has no power to prohibit slavery, that our emancipation acts were unconstitutional and void, that they were outrages on the rights of property, that slavery is national and not local, that it goes everywhere under the Constitution of the United States, and yet is higher than the Constitution, above the Constitution, beyond the reach of sovereign power, existing by virtue of that higher law proclaimed by the Senator from New York, will not be tolerated. When the doctrine of a higher law, a law above the Constitution, a law overriding the Constitution, and imposing obligations upon public men in defiance of the Constitution, was first proclaimed in the Senate, it was deemed moral treason in this body; but now I am read out of the party three times a week by the Washington Union, for disputing this higher law, which is embodied in the Lecompton constitution, that slavery, the right to slave property, does not depend upon human law nor constitutional sanction, but is above and beyond and before all constitutional sanctions and obligations! I feel bound, as a Senator from a sovereign State, to repudiate and rebuke this doctrine. I am bound as a Democrat, bound as an American citizen, bound as a Senator claiming to represent a sovereign State, to enter my protest, and the protest of my constituency, against such a doctrine. Whenever such a doctrine shall be ingrafted on the policy of this country, you will have revolutionized the Government, annihilated the sovereignty of the States, established a consolidated despotism with uniformity of local institutions, and that uniformity being slavery, existing by Divine right, and a higher law beyond the reach of the Constitution and of human authority.

Mr. President, if my protest against this interpolation into the policy of this country or the creed of the Democratic party is to bring me under the ban, I am ready to meet the issue. I am told that this Lecompton constitution is a party test, a party measure; that no man is a Democrat who does not sanction it, who does not vote to bring Kansas into the Union with the government established under that constitution. Sir, who made it a party test? Who made it a party measure? Certainly the party has not assembled in convention to ordain any such thing to be a party measure. I know of but one State convention that has indorsed it. It has not been declared to be a party measure by State conventions or by a national convention, or by a senatorial caucus, or by a caucus of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives. How, then, came it to be a party measure? The Democratic party laid down its creed at its last national convention. That creed is unalterable for four years, according to the rules and practices of the party. Who has interpolated this Lecompton constitution into the party platform?

Oh! but we are told it is an Administration measure. Because it is an Administration measure, does it therefore follow that it is a party measure? Is it the right of an Administration to declare what are party measures and what are not? That has been attempted heretofore, and it has failed. When John Tyler prescribed a creed to the Whig party, his right to do so was not respected. When a certain doctrine in regard to the neutrality laws was proclaimed to be a party measure, my friends around me here considered it a "grave error," and it was not respected. When the Army bill was proclaimed an Administration measure, the authority to make it so was put at defiance, and the Senate rejected it by a vote of four to one, and the House of Representatives voted it down by an overwhelming majority. Is the Pacific railroad bill a party measure? I should like to see whether the guillotine is to be applied to every recreant renegade who does not come up to that test. Is the bankrupt law a party measure? We shall see, when the vote is taken, how many renegades there will be then. Was the loan bill an Administration measure, or a party measure? Is the guillotine to be applied to every one who does not yield implicit obedience to the behests of an Administration in power? There is infinitely more plausibility in declaring each of the measures to which I have just alluded to be an Administration measure, than in declaring the Lecompton constitution to be such. By what right does the Administration take cognizance of the Lecompton constitution?

The Constitution of the United States says that "new States may be admitted into the Union by the Congress," not by the President, not by the Cabinet, not by the Administration. The Lecompton constitution itself says, "this constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States at its next session;" not to the President, not to the Cabinet, not to the Administration. The convention in Kansas did not send it to the Administration, did not authorize it to be sent to the President, but directed it to be sent to Congress; and the President of the United States only got hold of it through the commission of the surveyor general, who was also president of the Lecompton convention. The constitution as made was ordered to be sent directly to Congress; Congress having power to admit States, and the President having nothing to do with it. The moment you pass a law admitting a State it executes itself. It is not a law to be executed by the President or by the Administration. It is the last measure on earth that could be rightfully made an Administration measure. It is not usual for the constitution of a new State to come to Congress through the hands of the President. True, the Minnesota constitution was sent to the President because the convention of Minnesota directed it to be so sent; and the President submitted it to us without any recommendation. Because Senators and Representatives do not yield their judgments and their consciences, and bow in abject obedience to the requirements of an Administration in regard to a measure on which the Administration are not required to act at all, a system of proscription, of persecution, is to be adopted against every man who maintains his self-respect, his own judgment, and his own conscience.

I do not recognize the right of the President or his Cabinet, no matter what my respect may be for them, to tell me my duty in the Senate Chamber. The President has his duties to perform under the Constitution; and he is responsible to his constituency. A Senator has his duties to perform here under the Constitution and according to his oath; and he is responsible to the sovereign State which he represents as his constituency. A member of the House of Representatives has his duties under the Constitution and his oath; and he is responsible to the people that elected him. The President has no more right to prescribe tests to Senators than Senators have to the President; the President has no more right to prescribe tests to the Representatives than the Representatives have to the President. Suppose we here should attempt to prescribe a test of faith to the President of the United States; would he not rebuke our impertinence and impudence as subversive of the fundamental principle of the Constitution? Would he not tell us that the Constitution and his oath and his conscience were his guide; that we must perform our duties, and he would perform his, and let each be responsible to his own constituency?

Sir, whenever the time comes that the President of the United States can change the allegiance of the Senators from the States to himself, what becomes of the sovereignty of the States? When the time comes that a Senator is to account to the Executive and not to his State, whom does he represent? If the will of my State is one way, and the will of the President is the other, am I to be told that I must obey the Executive and betray my State, or else be branded as a traitor to the party, and hunted down by all the newspapers that share the patronage of the Government, and every man who holds a petty office in any part of my State to have the question put to him, "Are you Douglas's enemy?" if not, "your head comes off." Why? "Because he is a recreant Senator; because he chooses to follow his judgment and his conscience, and represent his State instead of obeying my executive behest." I should like to know what is the use of Congresses, what is the use of Senates and Houses of Representatives, when their highest duty is to obey the Executive in disregard of the wishes, rights, and honor of their constituents. What despotism on earth would be equal to this, if you establish the doctrine that the Executive has a right to command the votes, the consciences, the judgments of the Senators, and of the Representatives, instead of their constituents? In old England, whose oppressions we thought intolerable, an Administration is hurled from power in an hour when voted down by the representatives of the people upon a Government measure. If the rule of old England applied here, this Cabinet would have gone out of office when the Army bill was voted down, the other day, in the House of Representatives. There, in that monarchical country, where they have a Queen by divine right, and lords by the grace of God, and where republicanism is supposed to have but a slight foothold, the representatives of the people can check the Throne, restrain the Government, change the Ministry, and give a new direction to the policy of the Government, without being accountable to the King or the Queen. There the representatives of the people are responsible to their constituents. Across the channel, under Louis Napoleon, it may be otherwise; yet I doubt whether it would be so boldly proclaimed there that a man is a traitor for daring to vote according to his sense of duty, according to the will of his State, according to the interests of his constituents.

Suppose the Executive should tell the Senator from California [Mr. Gurn] to vote against his Pacific railroad bill: would he obey? If not, he will be deemed a rebel. Suppose the Executive should tell the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] to vote for the Pacific railroad bill, or the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] to vote for the Army bill, or the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] to sustain him on the neutrality laws: we should have more rebels and more traitors. But it is said a dispensation is granted, from the fountain of all power, for rebellion on all subjects but one. The President says, in effect, "do as you please on all questions but one;" that one is Lecompton. On what principle is it that we must not judge for ourselves on this measure, and may on everything else? I suppose it is on the old adage that a man needs no friends when he knows he is right, and he only wants his friends to stand by him when he is wrong. The President says that he regrets this constitution was not submitted to the people, although he knows that if it had been submitted it would have been rejected. Hence the President regrets that it was not rejected. Would he regret that it was not submitted and rejected, if he did not think it was wrong? And yet he demands our assistance in forcing it on an unwilling people, and threatens vengeance on all who refuse obedience. He recommends the Army bill; he thinks it necessary to carry on the Mormon war; it is necessary to carry out a measure of the Administration, and hence it is an Administration measure; but he does not quarrel with anybody for voting against it. He thinks every one of the other recommendations to which I have alluded is right, and therefore there is no harm in going against them. The only harm is in going against that which the President acknowledges to be wrong; and yet this system of proscription, to subdue men to abject obedience to executive will, is to be pursued.

Is it seriously intended to brand every Democrat in the United States as a traitor who is opposed to the Lecompton constitution? If so, do your friends in Pennsylvania desire any traitors to vote with them next fall? We are traitors if we vote against Lecompton; our constituents are traitors if they do not think Lecompton is right; and yet you expect those whom you call traitors to vote with and sustain you. Are you to read out of the party every man who thinks it wrong to force a constitution on a people against their will? If so, what will be the size of the Administration party in New York? what will it be in Pennsylvania? how many will it number in Ohio, or in Indiana, or in Illinois, or in any other northern State? Surely you do not expect the support of those whom you brand as renegades! Would it not be well to allow all freemen freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of action? Would it not be well to allow each Senator and Representative to vote according to his judgment, and perform his duty according to his own sense of his obligation to himself, and to his State, and to his God?

For my own part, Mr. President, come what may, I intend to vote, speak, and act, according to my own sense of duty, so long as I hold a seat in this Chamber. I have no defense to make of my Democracy. I have no professions to make of my fidelity. I have no vindication to make of my course. Let it speak for itself. The insinuation that I am acting with the Republicans, or Americans, has no terror, and will not drive me from my duty or propriety. It is an argument for which I have no respect. When I saw the Senator from Virginia acting with the Republicans on the neutrality laws, in support of the President, I did not feel it to be my duty to taunt him with voting with those to whom he happened to be opposed in general politics. When I saw the Senator from Georgia acting with the Republicans upon the Army bill, it did not impair my confidence in his fidelity to principle. When I see Senators here every day acting with the Republicans on various questions, it only shows me that they have independence and self-respect enough to go according to their own convictions of duty without being influenced by the course of others.

I have no professions to make upon any of those points. I intend to perform my duty in accordance with my own convictions. Neither the frowns of power nor the influence of patronage will change my action, or drive me from my principles. I stand firmly, immovably upon those great principles of self-government and State sovereignty upon which the campaign was fought and the election won. I stand by the time-honored principles of the Democratic party, illustrated by Jefferson and Jackson; those principles of State rights, of State sovereignty, of strict construction, on which the great Democratic party has ever stood. I will stand by the Constitution of the United States, with all its compromises, and perform all my obligations under it. I will stand by the American Union as it exists under the Constitution. If, standing firmly by my principles, I shall be driven into private life, it is a fate that has no terrors for me. I prefer private life, preserving my own self-respect and manhood, to abject and servile submission to executive will. If the alternative be private life or servile obedience to executive will, I am prepared to retire. Official position has no charms for me when deprived of that freedom of thought and action which becomes a gentleman and a Senator.

Mr. President, I owe an apology to the Senate for the desultory manner in which I have discussed this question. My health has been so feeble for some time past that I have not been able to arrange my thoughts or the order in which they should be presented. If, in the heat of debate, I have expressed a sentiment which would seem to be unkind or disrespectful to any Senator, I shall regret it. While I intend to maintain, firmly and fearlessly, my own views, far be it from me to impugn the motives or question the propriety of the action of any other Senator. I take it for granted that each Senator will obey the dictates of his own conscience, and will be accountable to his constituents for the course which he may think proper to pursue.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes. The honorable Senator from Illinois having declined to address the Senate in the earlier stages of the debate on this bill, and having been prevented by providential causes from addressing it within the last few days, it had not been my purpose, as it would have been my pleasure, to respond to some of the points which I understood he had, in the early part of the session, advanced against this measure. I did not intend, on this occasion, to do so; but that Senator having arraigned, in my judgment, and unjustly arraigned, the section of this Union from which I come, for the purpose of his own defense, I desire to be heard for a short time upon his course, and in vindication of theirs.

The last two hours of the Senator's speech have been devoted to two single points. The first was an article in the Washington Union of the 17th of November. I should have let the Senator settle his difficulty with that newspaper in his own way, either here or elsewhere; and I think it would have been more consistent with the dignity of the Senate and of the subject to settle it elsewhere than here. Still, it would have brought no comment from me, I should have stood the infliction, if the Senator had not connected my own section of the country with that article in the Washington Union.

Mr. President, no man in this body knows better than the Senator from Illinois that no such principle as he attacked has ever been asserted by a single slaveholding State in this Union, or a single Representative of the slaveholding States. If they have, I demand of that Senator now to say so. Sir, they have not. He cannot show that one of those States, through any of its authorized organs, not even through its newspapers, through none of its Senators, and through none of its Representatives, has ever asserted the right to carry slaves into a sovereign State against its constitution. This being so, he has spent one hour of his speech in order to make capital in Illinois, and that is all. That is the beginning and the end of it. That Senator has no right to arraign my constituents or the men of the South for an article in the Washington Union—none, sir, none. He has not a right to make it the occasion of making capital for himself, by seeming to be the defender of the principles of the constitutions of the free States, when no man at the South has ever assailed them. He defends what nobody assails; and he assails what nobody defends.

The last hour of his speech was occupied in defending his Democracy. Well, Mr. President, I do not profess to sit in judgment over Democrats; but I think his Democracy needs some defense, and probably that was time well spent. He intimates that other gentlemen have abandoned the party, when they voted against what he chooses to call Administration measures. I have never considered it necessary to defend myself against that charge. I believe my friend from Virginia has not; my friend from Mississippi has not. We have voted as we pleased; we have exercised our rights as Senators; we have no grievance with the Administration. They have recommended what, in their judgment, was the public interest; we have voted for what we thought was the public interest. The account has been settled; neither side has a word to say. Why should the Senator from Illinois take an hour and a half to settle his account? There must be something more in it than voting against Administration measures. He must be dissatisfied with his own position, or suppose that other people are. Sir, I have no defense here to make to the Senate for my votes; I have none to make to the Administration; I have none to make anywhere, except the reasons that I choose to give in my place in the Senate; and I give them neither to newspapers, nor to Presidents, nor to people. What I have done is done; what I have said is said; there stands the record; and I need no one hour, nor two hours, to defend my conduct here, or anywhere else.

But, sir, I choose to review some of the reasons which the honorable Senator has given for his course, as I felt it my duty, during the progress of his remarks, to take issue with him on one important fact connected with this matter. The Senator started ten years ago, and said that in 1848 we voted to extend the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific. I admit it: but how many of his present friends voted with him then? How many of the men whose cooperation he is seeking to-day, with whom he is consulting, in order to defeat the consummation of these great measures, voted with him on the proposition which he and I sustained ten years ago? With the exception, it may be, of the Senators from Kentucky and Tennessee, all those gentlemen who support him now were then his bitter opponents. Here they sit all around me; my friends from Vermont, from New Hampshire, and all of them here, stood then his determined enemies. Did the South defeat the extension of the Missouri compromise line to the Pacific? She did not. While she denied her right to prohibit her institutions anywhere, she said "this compromise having been adopted by our fathers, we will stand by it;" and it got every southern vote. These miserable pretenders who talk of its sanctity now, not a man of them voted for it then. These hypocrites, who pretend that it was a sacred compact, every man of them gave his vote against it. It did not get the support of any of its present defenders in this Hall to-day, but the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Kentucky.

When you refused division we demanded principle. I cooperated with the Senator from Illinois in 1850. We then said that the people settling our distant Territories should determine for themselves their own institutions. Who sanctioned that? Was it the Senator from New York? Not he. Was it the Senator from Vermont? Not he. The Senator from Illinois and myself were together then; but where is the man among all his present confederates who stood with him then? Echo answers, where? He is not to be found.

Then we come to 1854, when there was a practical illustration of the principle adopted in 1850. I stood by the Senator then. I stood by him in 1848 and I stood by him in 1850, though not of his party. I represented then the Whig party; I was true to my allegiance; I stood by its flag as long as it floated on this continent; but when it was carried into the Abolition phalanx, I trampled it under my foot and despised it as its great leader said he would do.

Where is the man among the Senator's present comrades, who backed this sentiment in 1854? Where is he? He is not to be found. I believe not even the Senator from Michigan was among them. Certainly he was not in 1848; and even the Senator from Illinois, in 1850, though his own principles were in conformity with this great idea, himself voted in favor of the power of Congress to cram constitutions, not only down the will of a majority, but down the throats of every man in the Territories of the United States, north and south of 36° 30'.

Mr. STUART. Does the Senator from Georgia allude to my action in 1854?

Mr. TOOMBS. No, sir, in 1850.

Mr. STUART. In 1850 I was not in Congress.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know the Senator voted for the Wilmot proviso when he and I were in the other House.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir; and if the Senator will show me the difference between the constitutionality of the Wilmot proviso and the Missouri compromise, I shall be greatly obliged to him.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will do that at a more convenient season.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir!

Mr. TOOMBS. I am not to be diverted from this review that I am on now. I have endeavored to show the difference between the two on former occasions; but whether it be constitutional or not, I am telling where men stood, and I say that all these men who to-day declare that Congress has no right to cram constitutions down the throats of a majority, deny every act of their public life, for they have held it to be right to cram free constitutions down anybody's throat. The difficulty is when there is a "nigger" in it. [Laughter.] That is the constitution that is not to be crammed down; and that is the case with every man of them. When there is slavery in it, they strike for freedom and the will of the people; but when it comes to a free constitution, no Wilmot-proviso man, no man who has stood here for the right of Congress to prohibit slavery forever in Territories and States, can stand up without playing the hypocrite meanly and contemptibly, and talk of cramming constitutions down people's throats. I was ashamed of some gentlemen when I heard them do it. If you would put it on the ground that your objection is not to the cramming process, but to that which is to be crammed down, it would be well enough. The Wilmot-proviso man holds that you can prohibit slavery forever in the Territories. That means that you can cram freedom whether the people want it or not, but take care how you cram slavery.

Mr. WADE. That is it.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is it, says my friend from Ohio, who is always honest and outspoken, and straightforward, and I wish to God the rest of you would imitate him. He speaks out like a man. He says that is the difference, and it is. He means what he says. He and I can agree about everything on earth until we get to our sable population, I do believe.

In 1854, we carried out this principle, and we took away prohibition. I am amazed at all these gentlemen who stand by prohibition; I am amazed at my friend from Kentucky, who says it would have been better if that had stood; I am amazed that any man who was ready to maintain that slavery or involuntary servitude, except for crime, should never exist north of 36° 30', should come here and insult the understanding of Senators—old gentlemen—and they ought to be respectable gentlemen; they ought to be tolerably sensible gentlemen—by telling us that they are opposed to cramming constitutions down people's throats, when they have stood for nothing else all their lifetime. That is just what you are for. Your complaint is that you would not let us cram constitutions on the people; that we took off prohibition and allowed them to do as they pleased.

The honorable Senator from Illinois came here in the beginning of December, and then he had certain reasons against admitting Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. One of the most remarkable things in the speech of the honorable Senator to-night, which struck me forcibly, and I have no doubt will strike every man here, is that every argument which he used arose since the 9th of December, when he fired in opposition against the Administration. All his reasons for opposition have arisen since the opposition began. That is a little remarkable, and I will review some of his reasons.

The election on the 21st of December had not then taken place, so that there was no fraud in that which could influence him. The election on the 4th of January had not then taken place, and there was no fraud in that which could affect him. Regent Calhoun had not done this great grievance, and there was no objection on that ground. The President had not victimized his friends, there was no objection on that score; and I believe every single objection, except as to the mode of submitting the constitution, which has been made to-night in a three hours' speech by the Senator from Illinois, has arisen since he started his opposition. I will now proceed to examine them.

The great question has been asked all around, the great question upon which this issue is put before the nation is: have the people of Kansas been left free to form their institutions in their own way? I say they have. I say the proof is conclusive, and the objections are pretenses and pretences manufactured for a purpose, and not for the truth. I mean to say that the question of a convention was fairly submitted, that the Legislature had power to submit it, that a majority of the legal voters elected that convention, that no human being can question the legality of that vote, and that the convention formed a constitution and submitted one clause of it to the people, and the clause which they submitted was adopted by a majority of legal votes. Suppose it was true, as alleged by some gentlemen, the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and others, that somebody voted for John C. Fremont, and somebody voted for Stephen A. Douglas—that does not vitiate the election. It may be, doubtless it was, the enemy who did these things. The question is, though there may be a thousand fraudulent votes, if it was a fair election, on which side was the greater number of votes? That is the test everywhere. It is the test at a constable's election. It is the test at a State election. It is the test at a presidential election. It is the test at all elections, and every honest man knows it. I say, then, this being a legal election, the question being submitted to the people according to law, a majority of the legal voters who voted have affirmed this constitution, and therefore a majority of the people of Kansas, by their will constitutionally expressed, have maintained the Lecompton constitution, and all other statements are unfounded in fact, and against the proof of the case.

But we are told that they had another election on the 4th of January, and the Senator from Illinois relies upon it. That Senator is terribly exercised at the idea of interfering with the constitution by an expression of opinion, even saying that it is a good one, even expressing the slightest idea of what it means; and yet, he says that a Legislature may order an election upon a constitution made by the representatives of the sovereign people and not submitted to them. Why, he asks, is not that election regarded? Let me ask why could the Legislature call a convention? Because Congress gave them all the powers it had, and among them was the powers to call a convention. When Congress passes an enabling act, and under it the people call a convention, and the convention forms a constitution without submitting it to the people, can Congress submit it? I put that question to the honorable Senator. He has declined to affirm it. He has declined to declare the necessity of such submission. I say they cannot submit it because Congress cannot decide for the sovereign people of a State or a Territory seeking admission into this Union. The argument is very aptly put, very speciously put in this way: if the Territorial Legislature can call a convention cannot they submit its constitution? I say, no; clearly not. It is an ignorance of all principle to assert it. The Legislature derived their power from Congress; it is limited by their charter. To call a convention is within it; but to control the people in their sovereignty is neither within the power of the principal nor of the agent, and that is the whole reason. The action of the Legislature calling for a vote on the 4th of January, was therefore, a nullity. As I remarked the other day, the constitution of my own State was never submitted to a popular vote. The Legislature called the convention that formed it. Can the Legislature submit it to a popular vote to-morrow? We have lived under it for sixty years, all unconscious that it did not express the will of the people, all unconscious that we were slaves, all unconscious that we did not have republican institutions. If the Senator would go down there and wake our people up to it, and tell the Legislature to submit the constitution, it is likely that we might be caught without any government at all, for there are objections to it. The Legislature may invoke their master, the sovereign power, through the forms of law, and when it is invoked it is their master. They may call spirits from the vasty deep, but they cannot put them down. It is beyond their power and that is the whole question.

The Senator says Congress cannot even express an opinion, but he would have us to send it back because he would have the Territorial Legislature submit it, to see whether it is the will of the people. I say there is but one way of ascertaining whether it is the will of the people, and that is according to law. If the convention was legal, it was their province to submit it, and when they have submitted it, it is conclusive until it is revoked by the same high sovereign authority. Neither Congress, nor the Territorial Legislature, nor the State Legislature in the case of a State, can interfere in any way with the sovereign powers of the people. I say it is the will of the people; a majority of the people. If rebels would not vote, I think it would have been wise in the people of Kansas to have expelled those persons; to have disfranchised them. We disfranchised those who stood loyal to the Crown during our Revolution; we refused to allow them to participate in our governments, and we have the same right to exclude rebels to our own institutions; and if the people of Kansas had chosen to do it, their exclusion would have been perfectly just, and I should have been ready to maintain it; but instead of that they were generous, more than just. They said "come and vote; we represent a legal authority, the Government of the United States, and the territorial government put in operation by them; we give you a fair opportunity." We sent Governors and judges there, and the Governors said to them "we will protect you in giving expression to your sentiments by your votes." They would not vote, and now you come to me and say the will of the people is not fairly expressed. If a factious majority (I will put it even on that) will stand out against law; if they will stand out against the demands of their own government, they not only are excluded from participating in the will of the people, but they ought to receive even a more condign punishment if they resist it afterwards.

But the Senator says it was not submitted right; that they could not vote for it or against it freely. That this is a pretext, and known to be such, is very clear, as was shown by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH], the other day, by reference to the Minnesota constitution. That has been before the Committee on Territories, and the Senator from Illinois has reported it as a substantial compliance with the law of Congress; but how did they submit it? They said that no man should vote for or against the constitution by itself; they would count no ticket for the constitution or against the constitution by itself; they would count no tickets in regard to the constitution unless they also contained the names of persons for State officers.

Again, suppose this pro-slavery clause had been in the constitution, and the convention had submitted the whole constitution with that clause in it, what would have been the result? A pro-slavery man might have said, "I want slavery, but I do not want your constitution." An anti-slavery man might have said, "I do not want slavery, nor do I want banks, but I want the rest of your constitution." That, therefore, would have been a bad submission, according to the rule of the Senator from Illinois. Identically the same objections which he makes would have existed if all the clauses had been in the constitution, and all had been submitted at once. In such a case, how could a pro-slavery man who wanted negroes, but did not want the other provisions of the constitution, vote for it? I hope the Senate will pardon me for relieving them from the injustice to which he supposes they would have been subjected. That would have been exactly the case if the whole constitution had been submitted altogether.

The constitution never was submitted, and the Senator from Illinois does not hold that it was necessary to submit any of it; and, therefore, when the convention adjourned, it was the organic law of Kansas, except the provision in regard to slavery, and when that was approved it all stood as the organic law. This was done before the Territorial Legislature met. The whole constitution, but the submission of the pro-slavery clause, was disposed of before the Legislature met; and that was voted upon, in obedience to the popular will, which the Legislature had no right to forbid or to contravene.

We are told, sir, that if the Lecompton constitution becomes the organic law of Kansas, it will be by the act of Congress, and not by the act of the people of the Territory. That depends upon the reasoning which has brought the Senator to this point. In this connection I will allude to a matter of fact, in regard to which I took occasion to make an issue with him during his speech. He says that nineteen counties of this Territory were deprived of their rights, and disfranchised, at the election of delegates to the convention. I undertook to say that that was not true in any sense, and it is not. I offer the evidence of the law; and how is that? All the counties in Kansas—there being thirty-seven—were embraced in election districts, but three of them had not a human being in them; not one in them who voted at the last election on the 4th of January; not one that voted on the 21st of December. They were paper counties. The other thirty-four counties were every one of them embraced in the districts, and to every one of them the right of voting was offered. I say, therefore, the statement of the Senator that they were disfranchised is not supported by the record, is not supported by the fact, is not maintained by the truth of the case. I know it has been stated by Governor Walker; it has been stated by Governor Stanton; but he is the very man who made the award; he is the very man who divided the Territory into election districts; he is the very man who assigned the representatives to the various districts. Twenty-one of these counties actually voted, and were represented in the convention; thirteen of them were not. Seven of those thirteen did not vote on the 4th of January. Six of them presented a vote altogether of eleven hundred. Four of these six counties drove out the persons whose duty it was to enroll them. I say, then, that every man in Kansas voted who wanted to vote, and all who were excluded were so excluded by their own act, by their own rebellion; and, therefore, it is not true that a human being in the nineteen counties was disfranchised, and that the statement stands nailed by the very official records, to which the Senator refers, the report of Stanton, the report of Walker, the vote of the 4th of January. There is not a tittle of evidence to sustain a single sentence they have uttered about it. The eleven hundred voters could all have voted if they had chosen to do so. They refused to see the law executed. The law was fair, it was just, it was honest. It was executed everywhere except where traitors prevented it. And these are the very traitors who can find facile instruments on the Senate's floor to pretend that they had wrongs. Every man knows it is not true. It has been said by half a dozen Senators, but they all know it is not true. The facts are on the record. They can no more be denied than the sun at noon-day. There is nothing to controvert the record. There is absolute verity in it. There is no dispute about it. Yet this plain fact, for these iniquitous purposes, is denied before high Heaven and this great assembly. So much for the disfranchisement. If anybody wants to see the record it is plain. The convention was a very good one with the Senator from Illinois in June last. It was a very good convention with Walker until it said its own will should rule, and not his. It was a very good convention for Stanton until it refused to carry out his will, and set up its own. Its rebellion was in claiming its rights, under the Kansas bill; that its will, not Walker's, not Stanton's, should govern in framing the constitution. That is all there was in it.

The Senator from Illinois says to the friends of this measure, "take care, I have said that you are overriding the popular will; that is the point upon which I mean to go before the people; now take care; make no declaration in the bill which denies that, because, if you do so, you will be doing something fatal to the slave States." Let me say to him,

"Non tui auxilio, nec defensoribus istis."

The slave States will take care of themselves. We want no such aid. I demand no aid from any man from any free State for the interests of my country. We are men in our own right. We scorn our enemies, and we seek not their protection. We stand not on the law. Make the most of it; and when you come here and warn us against declaring principles of legislation, lest they may take away our rights, I tell you that when the law can take away our rights, they are not worth maintaining. We hold them by a better and a braver tenure. We have power enough for traitors at home and enemies abroad. I scorn any man who tells me that the great right to two thousand million dollars' worth of property depends on legislation, on Senate votes or House votes. Sir, I come of a different stock entirely, and so do my people. That is not our title. We do not claim under it. We do not ask for your indorsement in any shape. Make any law you please, and you would be derided by the slave, if you sought to weaken our title to him. No, sir; we will stand by the Constitution as long as you choose, and when you choose to leave it, I will bid you an affectionate farewell. That is all I have to say. Whenever you think it is more to your advantage and mine to quit, I will bid you good morning with a great deal of pleasure. I desire no strife between us on this point, but I want this matter understood. I want you to understand the tenure by which we hold our property. We hold it by the tenure of our own States, who won it by their valor from foreign masters, and we have never transferred it. You will be entitled to it when you win it, and not till then; and so I beg my friend from Illinois to set himself easy on that point; to give himself no concern about the tenure of slaves. He may make himself perfectly easy about them. They will take care of themselves.

I know what the meaning of that is. It is this: "Do not acknowledge these great popular rights; for it will be unsafe in Illinois." I say that in the constitution of Kansas, by every just rule of legal interpretation, she has declared, in the first instance, that her constitution shall be altered in a particular way after 1864, but as to what may be done in the mean time it is silent. In aid of that construction there is a clause in her bill of rights which says, that the people have a right to alter or abolish their form of government whenever they please. My friend says this is a revolutionary right. Mr. President, do I stand in the American Senate and hear to-night a gentleman distinguished in the Democratic party say that a great constitutional principle, won, it is true, by arms, but, when planted in constitutions, is nothing but a revolutionary right? He says they have only asserted a revolutionary right. I apprehend we asserted a good many of them in the Constitution of the United States. I apprehend they asserted a good many of them in old Magna Charta. We have not improved much on that. There has been but little improvement made except in the organization to protect them in the nineteenth century in the American systems, upon those great securities for personal rights which were demanded in the thirteenth century by the English barons. They declared life, liberty, and property, to be sacred; they declared that they should never be infringed, except by the judgment of their peers, or the law of the land. We have incorporated these great principles into constitutions—trial by jury, which England sought to deprive us of by sending over to us a court of admiralty; liberty of the press, which she denied to us. They have ceased, however, to be revolutionary rights; they have now become constitutional ones. That is the difficulty with the gentleman from Illinois.

When a right to change a constitution is put in the fundamental law, though it was wrenched by revolution from a despotic Government originally, it then becomes peaceful when planted in the constitution of a free people. This right, which is put in the constitution of Kansas, is as peaceful and constitutional as any other right that secures life, liberty, or property; and he can only get rid of it by saying that it is revolutionary to change a government. Sir, it is revolutionary to change a government except in the manner prescribed by the organic law, or, in default of such prescription, by the existing government. Nothing else is revolution. If a government is changed by the consent of the existing government, and in conformity with the existing law, or when it is silent, by the existing government, it is a lawful and not a revolutionary change. When it is changed against its own forms, and against the existing Government, it is revolutionary, but not till then. These plain obvious distinctions running through society, observed of all men, and I had supposed recognized by the children at Sunday-schools, are denied in the Senate of the United States to-night for a purpose. Sir, it is not a revolutionary right—it is a constitutional right, it is nominated in the bond. The people have nominated it in their constitutional bond, and he, the great defender, the great asserter of popular sovereignty, tells us to-night that when the people have declared that they shall alter their constitution and forms of government when they please, how they please, and as they please, it means that they shall not have that right except by the sword! That is the position of the Senator from Illinois. He, the great defender of popular sovereignty, denies to the people the right even to reserve in their fundamental law these great and necessary ingredients to the maintenance of popular rights and private rights too. Away with it, sir. We have a right to do it, and I have no hesitation in declaring that.

I am prepared to say in this bill that, by the constitution of Kansas, she has reserved the right to her people before 1864 to alter, modify, or change her constitution, as they may will. My asserting it does not interfere with their right—does not control her constitution. I but declare what she has said. If you declare that, it will take all the wind out of the sails of the gentlemen who want to assail you with cramming constitutions down other people's throats. That is all there is in the argument; and a very poor one at that. These are the character of objections to the amendment of my honorable friend from Ohio, not now in his seat, [Mr. PUGH.] You are especially warned against that. Why? What does the honorable gentleman from Illinois care for that amendment? Does it interfere with political rights? Does it interfere with any great fundamental principle? Does it interfere with slavery? I hope he will dismiss his care of slavery from his mind. I have already told him that we would prefer ourselves to pick its friends. The honorable Senator says he cannot inquire into that; and I believe other Senators, while denying, with him, the right to inquire into this constitution, reserving sacredly even an expression of opinion, say Kansas ought not to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution; because four years ago there was a Missouri invasion; because, after the constitution was adopted, there was fraud in an election at Kickapoo, or at Delaware Crossing. The Senator to-night speaks feelingly, eloquently; he rolls the sweet morsel under his tongue that there were frauds at the State election, and that, therefore, we must reject the Lecompton constitution. I will not answer these arguments to Senators. I know they are worthless, except to those who seek a pretext; those who want a reason for comprehending it from beginning to end. We have already said this Congress has not a right to decide it. If there be any allegation as to fraud in the election of members of the other House, that body is the proper tribunal to decide it; if there be any such allegation as to the election of a member of this body, the Senate is the tribunal to determine it; if there be any allegation of fraud as to the election of members of the State Legislature, it will be for them, when they meet, to decide it. He seems to regret—it is a sore place to him—that Mr. Calhoun, in whom this constitution intrusted the power, I believe, in conformity with the precedent of Maine, as president of the convention, to declare the result of the election—he is alarmed at the idea that he has declared it fairly; that he has disregarded fraudulent returns, and gave an honest one. The great complaint against the "regent"—this man Calhoun—is, that he has performed his trust with fidelity and honor; that he has rejected fraudulent returns, and declares the men elected who got the fair votes. That is the Black Republican report; I regret to hear it complained of by the Senator. It shows to what "uses we may come at last."

Sir, we have nothing to do with these frauds. I have not gone into them. I might have shown you—the evidence is abundant—that, in the strife which has existed in this Territory for the last four years, fraud and violence, robbery and murder, have been the usual concomitants of society. I seek to terminate this strife. What great injury do I propose to inflict by admitting Kansas, and, as gentlemen say, cramming this constitution down the throats of her people? Why, sir, as the case was happily put the other day my friend from Louisiana, by this act we unfetter their hands; we untie the cords that bind them; we make them one of the free, sovereign, and independent States of the American Union, to make constitutions and laws at their own pleasure; to right their own wrongs, and to redress their own grievances. This is the enormous outrage upon which the Republican members, with their Democratic and American allies, are endeavoring to rouse this great people. Mr. President, they will be mistaken. I have an abiding faith, I have the confidence of a life now passing beyond its meridian, that after all, in the great body of the American people, there is wisdom enough, judgment enough, honesty enough to protect themselves against false friends and against open enemies; to preserve the liberty won by their fathers, and to transmit it to the latest posterity which may come after.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

Mr. KING. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to give one piece of information to the gentleman from Georgia. I was very glad to hear the Senator from Georgia disavow the doctrine put forth in the Union of the 17th of November; but the Senator from Georgia must remember that there are three departments of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial. The Union may regard itself the organ of all three; and I suppose that it is through the judiciary that that doctrine is intended to be fastened on this country. If the Senator from Georgia has not heard of any pretension to that doctrine anywhere, I can inform him that the State of Virginia is now litigating in the courts the right of one of her citizens to hold slaves in the State of New York, the Lemmon case, well known through the country.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is a great mistake in the way you state it.

Mr. POLK. If it meets the views of my colleague, who has the right to the floor to close the debate, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. STUART. Will the Senator withdraw the motion for a moment? We should, in the first place, I think, move an amended hour for meeting. I suppose the order that was made yesterday to meet at ten o'clock will remain, unless we change it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that vote to have been to meet at ten o'clock to-day. The Chair understood it to apply to to-day only.

Mr. STUART. If so, I have no objection; but I wish to say one word in response to what has just fallen from the Senator from Georgia, and but a word. I acknowledge the right of any and every Senator on this floor to express his opinions in any language that seems meet to him; but when a Senator arraigns me, and arraigns his associates on this floor, then I submit that he goes beyond his right. I deny his power, and I do not respect the terms in which he does it.

Sir, if the Senator from Georgia claims to be the model Senator, for arrogance of declamation, haughtiness of manner, disrespect to his co-peers, I yield it to him. He has won the laurels to-night, and is at liberty to wear them. But, sir, there is an old adage, that men only resort to personalities when borne down by arguments that they cannot answer. To call Senators "hypocrites," to charge that they utter as facts here things that they know to be untrue, to say that they are the "facile instruments" of rebels in Kansas, is what may be said in a bar-room with less intelligence and no want of bravery. Sir, it will never do in the Senate. The argument of the Senator can be answered. His declamations and disrespectful terms must be protested against. This I do for myself without personal feeling, without personal animosity, but in the plain exercise of those rights and privileges that belong to me as a Senator upon this floor, in virtue of the Constitution of the United States and the equality of the States themselves.

This, sir, maintaining my position, expressing my stern remonstrance against that sort of disrespectful expression, accomplishes all I desire to express to-night.

Mr. TOOMBS. A single word to the honorable Senator. I hope the Senator will go home, go to bed, and go to sleep; and I hope he will feel better in the morning. If he should not, I shall be glad to hear from him when he gets up.

Mr. STUART. Thank you, sir. That is not the kind of language. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1858.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, the Committee on Territories examined the subject that was submitted to them, having before them the constitution of the State of Kansas and all the facts connected with its formation. The result of that examination has been reported to the Senate and the country. The majority of the committee deemed it proper to select me to make that presentation to the Senate. In consequence of that fact, it now devolves upon me to review the arguments that have been presented against that report, and against the positions of the friends of this measure, and to reply to them as briefly as I well can. I need not undertake to magnify the importance of this subject. I could not do so. It extends in its effects and consequences to the vital interests of the Republic. Nothing could strike a more fatal blow at what ought to be the permanent interests of all sections of the Union, than the improper decision of the subject now under consideration.

The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] with a flourish of trumpets unusual with him, said that the friends of the Kansas measure had been driven from all their positions. With due deference to him, I must be permitted to remark that I am not conscious of any friend of this bill being driven from its support; or of any position taken in the report of the committee being surrendered or abandoned; nor am I conscious of any successful answer to any single position taken in that report. If we have been driven from any one, I would like to have that one pointed out. General charges, general assertions, and general allegations, will not do for the Senate of the United States. They will not do for a court of justice of the lowest grade. They will not even do upon the stump, or at the hustings. We must come to specific facts—to the true questions that have to be decided; and not undertake to prejudice the one side or the other by making broad, general, unsupported assertions.

So it is with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] He says that the principle of the Kansas bill was, that the people should be left perfectly free to decide all domestic questions for themselves in their own way; and then assumes that such freedom of action has not been accorded to them. As I have previously remarked, before we can arrive at a safe and just conclusion, we must take all material facts and trace them up in their proper connection; and if, in such connection, we cannot agree in the deductions or in the conclusions, that variance in opinion will be an honorable difference between honorable Senators. For my part, I see no cause and have heard no reason to justify a sound logician in changing one single position. The principles upon which the report is based remain unshaken. But one single point of the report was called in question by the Senator from Illinois. What point in it was even controverted by the Senator from Michigan? What principle enunciated in it has been called in question by any Senator on the opposite side?

It is true, exception was taken by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] to the language. He said there were harsh expressions in it; that the Opposition party in Kansas were characterized as "rebels," as "contumacious," as standing in a position of hostility to the Government. It does so characterize them; and, if the facts presented in that report will not justify the accusations, it is a duty to take them back. Each single charge, with regard to the character of the Opposition in Kansas, is sustained by official evidence presented in the report, from which there is, and can be, no escape. If the honorable Senator supposes it unparliamentary or indecorous to make specific charges, upon evidence presented, in a State paper, to remain permanently upon the records of the country, I remark that the speech of his colleague from the same State of Vermont, [Mr. FOOT,] which also becomes a part of the parliamentary history of this country, has more of abuse, more of denunciation, more of harsh epithet, than can be found in any speech, or in any paper, presented on the subject from this side of the Chamber. With what propriety, therefore, shall one representative of a State complain of the expressions of opponents, whilst tolerating, in his colleague, the use of language so extraordinarily harsh as to have taken the whole Senate by surprise?

I say, further, that that was the only exception taken by the honorable Senator to the report. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] desired an explanation in regard to one expression in it; which explanation was at once given, and is borne out by the context in the report, and leaves no possible chance for misconception. With what justice, therefore, shall we be taunted with having been driven to the wall; with having been driven from our position; with having been vanquished in all the debate and in all the investigation had before the Senate and the country? Such is not the case, as I understand it.

But the Senator from Michigan says, that although it is true that the convention adopted this constitution, yet that adoption is not evidence that it embodies the will of the people of Kansas. There seems to be a sort of oneness in the molding of expressions by the Opposition—"embody the will of the people!"—as if mutually adopted by agreement among the Opposition. I will make no issue upon that point. There is not a Senator, nor a member of the House, nor a citizen of the Union, but what says that all constitutions ought to embody the will of the majority. How that fact is to be ascertained—what legal steps can be pursued for its ascertainment, consistent with order, peace, and constitutional government—is another question; but that we ought to take the proper steps, the legal steps, to ascertain the will of the people, is a conceded fact. It is imagined by some, and I believe by the Senator from Michigan, that the best mode of ascertaining the will of the people is by a submission to a vote of the people; and he referred to the vote on the 4th of January as affording the clearest and most conclusive evidence that the people of that Territory disapproved the constitution. He also brought, as evidence of that assertion, what he says is a direct vote of the people; and he also referred to a mass meeting, held at Leavenworth, consisting of delegates claiming to represent, by voluntary action, a vast majority (as he says) of the people of the Territory. How, I ask, can he undertake to give the sense of the people from the mere action of a meeting at Leavenworth? Why rely on a single meeting to ascertain public opinion, if we are to reject as unreliable the opinion of a legal convention, legally elected at a public election, and thus representing the opinions of the people in a legal sense? Those who could get up a meeting, without law, without system, without order, through their delegates to a self-constituted assembly at Leavenworth, can be relied upon to represent the people and speak their will, according to his argument; but when the legally chosen, the legally appointed delegates, elected by the people at the ballot-box, speak, it is not to be received as evidence of the will of the people! The irregular and the irresponsible, this body is told, can be relied upon; the regular, legal, and the responsible, should be rejected as unreliable! Are the friends of the constitution to be vanquished by reasoning and by facts like these?

Mr. President, as I propose to notice the several objections urged by the Senator from Illinois, and others, my train of remark will be rather desultory. The Senator from Illinois takes the position, that, although there was a submission of the slave article of the constitution, on the 21st of December, yet it was an unfair submission. I have, on several occasions, corrected Senators in their quotation of the constitution on this subject. This is the last time that I shall ever correct them upon it. They all have, including the Senator from Illinois, uniformly represented this to have been the mode of voting: that no man could vote for or against slavery on the 21st of December until he first voted for the constitution. Such is not the fact. There is no such provision in the schedule—none in the constitution. There was but one single question submitted. The complaint has been often made, by these same Senators, that there was no submission of the whole constitution; yet they now say that it was submitted, and unfairly submitted, because each man was compelled to vote for the constitution before he could vote upon the other subject. I answered that objection in the first remarks I ever submitted to the Senate on this subject. I took the ground, and it has never yet been successfully answered, that there was but one question submitted by the convention—not for the constitution as one question, and slavery or no slavery another question; but the one single question of "slavery or no slavery." It will be observed that the form of the ballot which each voter had to make use of was not for the constitution and slavery, or for the constitution and no slavery. No such ballot as that was proposed—none whatever. What then? Why, the question of slavery was submitted. How was slavery to be protected? How was it to be guaranteed in the constitution. It was already inserted in the constitution. The question submitted, then, was, Shall it remain there, or not? That was the vital question which was submitted to the people to decide. The voter was not called on to vote for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution with no slavery; but, shall the protection of slavery be, or shall it not be, in the constitution?

Thus, as I heretofore exemplified, when the constitution of the State of Louisiana was adopted, each voter voting was required to make use of a ballot, thus: "Constitution accepted," or, "Constitution rejected." There would have been just as much plausibility for the Senator from Illinois to complain of the action of the convention of the State of Louisiana, alleging that each voter should be compelled to vote first for the constitution and then its acceptance, or for the constitution and then its rejection, as to undertake to build up an argument that under this schedule the voter is compelled to vote for the constitution and then slavery, or for the constitution and then against slavery. They are presented in identically the same manner. The whole scope of this section of the schedule shows that but one single question was submitted for decision. All other questions were settled by the convention. It is said the people of Kansas complained that no other question was submitted. It is said that the people of the country complain because no other question was submitted. I understood the Senator from Illinois, in the first speech he made here in the Senate before the arrival of the constitution from Kansas, to predicate his objections upon the non-submission of the constitution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would inquire of the honorable Senator whether the schedule does not require of the man offering to vote, not only to vote for the constitution—

Mr. GREEN. It requires no such thing.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does it not go beyond that, and require him to take an oath to support it?

Mr. GREEN. Of course, if adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does it not only require him to vote for the constitution with slavery, or the constitution with no slavery, but to take an oath to support it before he can vote at all?

Mr. GREEN. I will answer the Senator. First, I see the remains of that old error still clinging to the mind of the Senator. He asks me the question, with the schedule before him, whether it did not require a voter to vote for the constitution with or without slavery? There is no such word in it. Let the Senator look at it. It is now in his hand. Second, with regard to the oath to be taken: if challenged, the voter was required to take an oath to support the constitution if it become the supreme law of the land, as all good citizens are. There would have been a peculiar propriety in the people of Kansas making such a requisition, as there had been a proclamation by the Opposition that they would never submit to law and order. Those who stand in open rebellion to the government, ought to be subject to some honorable and fair test before they are permitted to participate in shaping the fundamental law.

As I do not wish to be drawn off from the train of remarks I contemplate making, I will return to the point at which I was interrupted. The Senator from Illinois made the remark, in his first speech on this subject, that the President of the United States did not understand the Kansas-Nebraska bill, he being at that time our distinguished representative at London; and he excused the ignorance of the President on the ground of his absence from the United States. The President's fundamental error, to which he then called attention, consisted alone in this: the President said that the Kansas-Nebraska act did not require the constitution, when formed, to be submitted to the vote of the whole people. This was regarded by the Senator as the fundamental error. He, the author of the bill—he, the advocate of the bill—he, the defender of the bill before the country, ought to know more about it than the President, who was then absent from the country, and who, perhaps, had not read all that had taken place on the subject. Sir, I have a right to believe that the President of the United States has, at least, read the report of the honorable Senator, made at the time he introduced the Kansas-Nebraska bill; and if he took his impressions from that report, if they are false impressions, the responsibility falls upon the report, and not upon the President. To show what justification he had in his belief upon the subject, I will read a few words.

Here is the report by Mr. DOUGLAS to accompany the bill (S. No. 22) made January 5, 1854. He goes on and gives a history of the compromise measures of 1850—a very clear, forcible illustration of the principles intended to be thereby established, in the same strain that he did last night with so much ability, and which gratified me so much to hear. The object then was to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. The object of the bill was to apply the same principles settled in the compromise measures of 1850 to the Kansas-Nebraska bill organizing these Territories in 1854. He reasons out the subject with great force and with great beauty, and arrives at the following conclusions:

"From these provisions it is apparent that the compromise measures of 1850 affirm and rest upon the following propositions: 'The substitute for the bill which your committee have prepared, and which is commended to the favorable action of the Senate, proposes to carry these propositions and principles into practical operation in the precise language of the compromise measures of 1850.'"

What are those principles?

"First, That all questions pertaining to slavery in the Territories, and the new States to be formed therefrom, are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein."

That would seem to sustain the view which the Senator from Illinois pressed, when he said that the President was out of the United States, and he therefore excused him for not understanding what the principles of that bill were. But, sir, I have not read all of that first principle. It says what I have read, and then goes on to say:

"Are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein, by their appropriate representatives, to be chosen by them for that purpose."

This is the report of the Senator from Illinois, made when the Kansas bill was presented. At that time he said the decision of the slavery question was to be left to the people, to be exercised—how? By their appropriate representatives in convention assembled. Because the President did not complain of the action of the people of Kansas in not submitting the constitution to a vote of the people, but followed out the principle which the Senator had presented as the leading idea in the Kansas-Nebraska act, that it was to be decided by their representatives, he complains of the President, and of the action of the people of Kansas. I have ever held, and yet hold, that it was for the people, acting through their convention, either to submit or not to submit the constitution; that the Congress of the United States has no constitutional right to stop and demand of them to submit it; that, if such demand should be made, it would be a violation of duty, a violation of constitutional right, and that we who did it would be setting an example never set by our predecessors in office, and, I trust, never will be set by those who are to come after us.

It is said, however, with a great deal of ingenuity, by the Senator from Vermont, that it is true the people, by convention, can act; but, in order to make it binding and conclusive action, they must have legal authority to act; that the action of the people of Kansas, not being predicated upon an enabling act, is mere voluntary action, and not, therefore, legal action—not binding upon those who do not choose to act. The Senator from Illinois shadows forth about the same idea in his first speech. It is this:

"So far as the act of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas calling this convention was concerned, I have always been under the impression that it was fair and just in its provisions. I have always thought the people should have gone together en masse and voted for delegates, so that the voice expressed by the convention would have been the unquestioned voice of the people of Kansas. I have always thought that those who staid away from that election stood in their own wrong, and should have gone and voted, and should have furnished their names to be put on the registered list, so as to be voters. I have always held that it was their own fault that they did not thus go and vote; but yet, if they chose, they had a right to stay away."

There seems to be in this a little contradiction. If they did wrong when they staid away, then it was their duty to have voted; and hence those who did vote did right. He further says:

"They had a right to say that that convention, although not an unlawful assemblage, is not a legal convention to make a government; and hence we are under no obligation to go and express any opinion about it. They had a right to say, if they chose, 'we will stay away until we see the constitution they shall frame, the petition they shall send to Congress; and, when they submit it to us for ratification, we will vote for it if we like it, or vote it down if we do not like it.' I say they had a right to do either, though I thought, and think yet, as good citizens, they ought to have gone and voted; but that was their business, and not mine."

The Senator from Vermont proclaims the same idea that there was no legality attached to it; and he drew a distinction, which I think my honorable colleague completely answered—that there was a difference between a legal proceeding and a proceeding by authority. What he meant by legal was, that it was not prohibited by law, and therefore not unlawful. I think I can adduce a little authority to show that this was a legal proceeding. The authority that I propose to present consists, first, in the report presented by the Senator from Illinois in 1856, in which he makes his celebrated argument upon the power of Congress over the Territories. He deduces the power that Congress has under the Constitution to legislate for the Territory, or over the Territory, from that clause which says:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

Without conceding the correctness of his source of power, I will proceed to show what he thought had been accomplished by the establishment of a territorial government. He uses this language on page 4:

"Hence, before the power can be safely exercised, the right of Congress to organize Territories, by instituting temporary governments, must be traced directly to some provision of the Constitution conferring the authority in express terms, or as a means necessary and proper to carry into effect some one or more of the powers which are specifically delegated. Is not the organization of a Territory eminently necessary and proper as a means of enabling the people thereof to form and mold their local and domestic institutions, and establish a State government under the authority of the Constitution, preparatory to its admission into the Union?"

His idea, as shadowed forth in this report, and not only shadowed forth, but expressed in very explicit language, is, that the exercise of the power to establish a temporary government for a Territory was a means to execute another constitutional power; that that other constitutional power was to admit a State; and that the establishment of a territorial government was to enable them to prepare for that admission. Thus, according to his idea at that time, it, in the language of Governor Walker, is an enabling act; but I care nothing about that. It was a legal proceeding, when they proceeded to form a State government, whether this is an enabling act or not. It is well known that a prior consent of Congress has not been the established practice of the Government. It is equally well known that all these territorial governments are in the law expressly stated to be for the purpose of preparing them for admission into the Union. They are all said to be temporary. The express word is employed even in the Kansas act—a temporary government for Kansas in the territorial form. So of Nebraska—a temporary government in the territorial form.

Now, if it be a "temporary" government, if it be to enable them to prepare for admission into the Union, if it be as a means to enable Congress to execute the power to admit a State, as he argues in his report, then it is all that an enabling act could possibly be. But whether that be so or not, I proceed upon a broad principle of equity, which is this: the uniform practice of the Government has been to admit Territories as States; and citizens of any of the old States, North, East, South, or elsewhere, going and settling in a new Territory established during the past practice of the Government, looking at the past action of Congress, have a right, growing out of the common practice, to expect the organization of a State government, when they obtain the requisite strength. The common practice to so admit them is an inducement to them to settle there; and not to concede to them what has been uniformly conceded to all others, without exception, would be a fraud upon the people who settle in the Territory. It would be a breach of the common law which has grown up. Now, as Congress has not been uniform in granting enabling acts, as Congress has heretofore said an enabling act is not a necessary prerequisite, as the practice of the Government has been uniformly to admit them as States at the proper time, he who settles there has a right, under that practice, to expect that that common-law practice shall be adhered to and carried out in good faith—more especially when settling in the Territory acquired from France by the Louisiana treaty, which specially stipulated that it should be done.

But, independent of all that, there was a government in Kansas, clothed with governmental power, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, which contemplated their admission into the bosom of the old family. That government was a territorial government. It has been said that it was a usurped government; that it was established by fraud and violence; that external power from the State of Missouri went over there and forced it upon them, all of which I pass by as unworthy of notice. Whether true or untrue, it was a government de facto. It was a government wielding the power of the territorial authority. It was a government authorized, under the organic act, to do all that any other government, under that act, could have done. California was under a kind of military government, established under General Riley, and the Senator from Illinois, with great ingenuity, and great plausibility, (and I am willing to adopt it for the purposes of the argument,) in his report predicates the right of the State of California to admission into the Union on these points: First that there was a government de facto there, and that, acting through this de facto government, the people had established a State government, and asked admission into the Union. Such is the history of the case. He employs this language:

"It also appears, from the proclamation of General Riley, acting Governor, to the people of California, dated June 3, 1849, that the government de facto was constituted as follows: * * *

"On the 3d of April, 1849, President Taylor appointed Thomas Butler King agent, for the purpose of conveying important instructions to our military and naval commanders who were intrusted with the administration of the civil government de facto in California."

Thus predicating his whole argument on the double idea that the people had acted, and acted through a government de facto. Had you not a government de facto, as regular, as legal, as just, in the case of Kansas, as you had in California, even if you admit that in its origination frauds were committed, force resorted to, and external aid brought to bear? Now, sir, here is a government de facto. They proceeded to call a convention. So in Kansas; there was a government de facto, and they proceeded to call a convention. The Senator from Vermont says, however, that it is not a legality. Let us see what the Senator from Illinois says upon that subject; for I love to answer one of my opponents with the language of another. The Senator from Illinois, speaking of the action in California, says:

"But there is not an irregularity in the case of California which has not occurred and been waived in the admission of some new State into the Union. If the Senator will point me to any irregularity in the case of California, I will point him to a corresponding one in the case of some other State which has been received into the Union." * * *

"I hold that the people of California had a right to do what they have done; yea, that they had a moral, political, and legal right to do all they have done."—Appendix to Globe, 1850, page 1523.

So that the action of the people of California, being subordinate to the government de facto, was a legal action. The action of the people of Kansas, being through the constituted authorities, and a government de facto, was clearly legal action. This, like other complaints which have been gotten up since the first day of December, seems to be an after-thought. Read the Springfield speech of the honorable Senator from Illinois. Would he have spoken in such terms as he did with reference to the expected action in Kansas if he had looked upon it as a mere farce—that people could have stayed away if they pleased? Did he say so then? I desire to read it. It has been read frequently. I wish to incorporate it in the proper connection as it bears on the proposition I am now discussing. I ask my friend from Indiana to read it for me.

Mr. BRIGHT read as follows:

"Of the Kansas question but little need be said at the present time. You are familiar with the history of the question, and my connection with it. Subsequent reflection has strengthened and confirmed my convictions in the soundness of the principles and the correctness of the course I have felt it my duty to pursue upon that subject. Kansas is about to speak for herself through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise.

"If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest on those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them and upon the political party for whose benefit and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State, institutions repugnant to their feelings and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principles of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just—the rights of the voters are clearly defined—and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State, by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity with the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union. That the Democrats in Kansas will perform their duty, fearlessly and nobly, according to the principles they cherish, I have no doubt; and that the struggle will be such as will gladden the heart, and strengthen the hopes of every friend of the Union, I have entire confidence."

Mr. GREEN. Now, sir, I have had that speech read because in the connection I am now speaking it shows he then regarded it as a proceeding that would be binding, perfectly obligatory, and was anticipating that some of the contumacious would stay away and not vote, alleging at the same time that they would be equally bound as though they had appeared at the polls and voted. That shows that he regarded it as a legal proceeding. That speech was made on the 12th of June, three days before the election held under the election law of Kansas, and hence when he takes another position, on the first day of December, it seems to me—I will not impute to him any motive—to have been entirely an after-thought. So understood the whole country; so understood every friend of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; so understood the President, and all of the party that sustained him; and never until some subsequent proceedings were had, was any complaint ever uttered. It was a legal proceeding. It is easy to demonstrate, in addition to what I have said, that there is full legislative power, including the power to call a convention at the instance of the people, to form a constitution preparatory to their admission into the Union; that it was with this view, as stated by the Senator from Illinois, that the organic act of the Territory was first passed to enable them to prepare for admission under the clause of the Constitution, which says that Congress may admit new States. It then results that the voice of the people fairly expressed, demanded a change of government from that of a territorial to that of a State. There was no pretense of fraud at that time; no pretense of any invasion from Missouri, or from the Camanches of the West; no pretense of improper influences; all was admitted to be fair, regular, just, and proper. The first step in the proceeding, then, is a legal step of the people in the exercise of their power. Ah, says the Senator from Vermont, they will have no power until Congress enables them to come into the Union.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Green.

SENATE.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not say that they had not power. They had the power to meet and petition, and all that.

Mr. GREEN. Did you not say that they had no power?

Mr. COLLAMER. Not authoritative.

Mr. GREEN. I understand the Senator. He spoke of their political rights, because there is a difference between a mere physical act and a moral and political right. They have a physical ability to gather in mass meeting, and utter expressions, if they have the power of articulation, and physical power to draw up a petition and present it to Congress.

Mr. COLLAMER. And a political right.

Mr. GREEN. And a political right to present it. But what political right have they to form a State government at any time? Never till Congress says so? He shakes his head. Can they do it before? Can they do this before Congress passes a provision giving them power to do so?

Mr. COLLAMER. They may meet, form a constitution, and present a petition to Congress with the constitution for admission under it; but it is for Congress to say whether they will admit them in their discretion.

Mr. GREEN. There is no difficulty about this subject when we come to a proper understanding. The admission of a State is one thing; the formation of a State another. Congress cannot form a State. Congress, therefore, cannot give power to the people to form a State; for they cannot confer a power they do not possess. If, then, there ever is a power in a Territory to form a State, from whom is it derived? Not from any sister States, because they cannot create another State; not from the Federal Government, because it cannot create a State. Then, from whom is derived the power to create a State? From Heaven; that is the source of the power. An enabling act was given to the people by Him, and Him only. It has been held by the wisest statesmen in this Government that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are the inalienable rights of man; and that to secure these rights, governments are instituted, deriving their just powers—from whom? From Congress? From a sister State? From an enabling act? No; but deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, and whenever the consent of the governed is given, the just power has been conferred, and they (the governed) are the people of the Territory. They cannot, however, force themselves into the Union. That Territory belongs to all the States, and Congress is the administrator of it. The people of the Territory cannot appropriate the public lands to themselves. They cannot oust the rightful jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Therefore, an assent, either by admission or otherwise, must be given by Congress before the independence, the sovereignty of the State becomes complete; but the power to form a government is an original inherent power which they may of right exercise when their numbers justify.

If they may thus exercise it; if it be an original power; if it be an inherent power; if it be an inalienable power; then it is a legal power. True, they cannot establish a government that would abrogate the Federal power. They cannot be brought into collision with Congress, because as the ownership of the Territory is in the States, and jurisdiction over it is in Congress, the assent of Congress must be had either before the formation, or after the formation of the State government, and the one is as regular as the other; as the past history of the Government proves.

In the next step of this proceeding, (for that territorial government has been indorsed by Congress, and all the authorities of this Government,) the Territorial Legislature passed the convention act—that one of which the Senator from Illinois spoke, when he said it was just and fair in all its provisions. It provided for a registry; a registry was taken—fairly taken. Those objections which have been urged to it have been so completely and so fully and so often answered, that I really do not like to stop and do it now. I have answered them; my colleague has answered them; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] has answered them; various other Senators have answered them; and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] has answered them; proving the employment of terms by our opponents in this question, which may not be designed, but which are calculated to convey a false impression to the public mind. They say, generally, that nineteen counties only were registered, and nineteen unregistered. Now, the employment of language like that—I will not say is designed—but it is calculated to make the public at a distance—not in the city of Washington—but the public at a distance—believe that half the people were disfranchised, when there is not one word of truth in it.

Now, if we desire to investigate, according to the facts, and present the facts to the country, why do we not speak of the people? Did you want unpopulated counties represented in convention? I thought it was the people whose rights you talked about protecting, and not the barren hills and wastes, the prairies and the swamps. They have no voice in it, and ought not to have any. They are the creatures for the use of man, and not the masters; they are to be used by man, and are given for his accommodation and benefit. All of the nineteen counties that had any inhabitants at all were attached to other counties, except two or three, and from them the registering officer was driven off. This is established by abundant evidence. In all of them only one thousand four hundred and twenty-three votes were given at the 4th of January election under a qualification of voters which would not have permitted them to vote for the delegates to the convention. The qualification for those who should vote for delegates to the convention was, that they should be citizens of the United States, and residents of the Territory on the 15th day of March. The qualification of those who voted on the 4th of January was, that they should then be inhabitants of the place. Now, if, with this broader latitude, with this free license for people to come in, through the influence of the emigrant aid societies, with all the machinery of importation, they could at this later period only manufacture one thousand four hundred and twenty-three votes, when there was no restraint of law as to the number polled, how many could that same locality have polled with the qualification required under the convention act on the 15th day of June preceding? I am assured, by good authority, not over five hundred. So that it dwindles into mere insignificance. But, whether large or small, whether great or little, it resulted from their own acts, as is proven by the testimony of Secretary Stanton and others.

Then the convention is elected. It legally assembles. It performs its work. The people adopt the constitution finally, as they had a right to do, in pursuance of the principles incorporated into the organic act, as Senator DOUGLAS, in his own language, asserts they were to settle these questions for themselves, by representatives chosen for that purpose. Not by a direct vote of the people; not by a subsequent submission to a popular vote; but, though he attributed that idea of President Buchanan to his absence from the United States, as a fundamental error, still his own report says they are to settle it by their representatives, chosen for that purpose. Just in that way the people of Kansas did settle all questions pertaining to their domestic institutions, except the question of slavery; and that question was submitted to a subsequent vote of the people on the 21st of December.

What is arrayed against all this? What imputation is made against this proceeding? What is to lessen the force of it? Why, says the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FIORI] there were broken pledges; they had a right to stay away and not vote; they had assurances from the President, assurances from Governor Walker, assurances from Governor Stanton, and pledges from the candidates, that the constitution, when framed, should be submitted to them for ratification or rejection. I called upon the Senator at the time, and requested him to favor me with the evidence of his assertion. He did not have time to produce it then, but I suppose he will, if he can, at a more convenient season. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] went off and hunted up a little item, and brought it up here for his colleague, but that does not even reach the case. I know, and the country knows, that Governor Walker preferred that the constitution should be submitted; but Governor Walker never did assume to pledge to the people that it should be submitted. Mark the difference. Governor Walker says to them, if the convention does not submit the constitution, I promise you I will oppose its adoption; but that very assertion shows that he understood the convention were not bound to do it, for it implied a doubt whether they should submit it or not. Do you tell me that amounts to an assurance that the constitution should be submitted? There is nothing like it on the record; and when gentlemen make the assertion, they make it without any evidence upon which to found it. Even Governor Walker, with his strong proclivities to invite the action of emigrant aid societies, to rush out a population to vote down the constitution or vote out slavery—even he, in his own zeal, never undertook to pledge to the people that it should be submitted to them for a vote. He preferred it, he advocated it, he urged it; but he had no power to pledge that it should be submitted, and he never did.

How is it with Governor Stanton? Governor Stanton, on the contrary, said expressly and explicitly that the distracting question of slavery ought to be submitted, and that was as a mere question of policy. Now the convention, I suppose, had more confidence in Governor Stanton than in Governor Walker. I presume so from their action; for they acted on the suggestion of Governor Stanton, adopted the constitution finally in all its branches, and in all its parts, except the article on the subject of slavery, and that they submitted to a vote of the people. But neither Governor, nor Secretary, nor President, nor anybody else, had any right to dictate to the convention any part of their action, either in the form of the constitution, or the mode of its adoption.

The election took place on the 21st of December, and the character of that election is a great bone of contention. I can show, by Governor Walker's own position, that the question which constituted the real matter of controversy was, shall there be slavery or no slavery? Is there anything else in controversy before the Senate? Is there anything else that stirs up the least feeling, even in the Republican party, save and except this slavery question? Not one particle. Everything else is hunted up with eager anxiety merely as make-weights, as it seems to me; but there is not one single valid objection pointed out. On the 21st of December, then, the question was submitted. To disfranchised counties, or to but nineteen counties? No; but submitted to every county in the State, submitted to every citizen of the State, whether he had been registered or whether he had not been registered. I have before said that those who failed to register themselves committed a wrong in their own light. But the Senator from Vermont said that the argument reminded him of an anecdote of a boy who could not count the pigs because one of them kept running about all the time. Now, if that pig had to give his name to be registered, and would not do it—what then? How register him?

Mr. COLLAMER. Count him.

Mr. GREEN. But if the law says that he should give his name to be registered, so that when he came up to vote it might be known whether he was entitled to do so or not, how could you ascertain his name without he gave it? That is the cause of all the difficulty. Now, it is a fact not to be controverted, that they did refuse to be registered, and the imperfect registration was the result of their own wrong. But whether right or wrong, whether it was the fault of the officers or the fault of the people, when the great question was submitted, whether registered or unregistered, whether entered upon the poll-list or not entered upon the poll-list, all were allowed to come and vote. Why did they do it? It is said they anticipated fraud. Anticipated fraud! A majority anticipate that a minority would whip them! It is not a part of the American character; nor do I believe that to have been the reason, nor does anybody here on either side believe it; but if true, it amounts to no excuse.

But, says the Senator from Illinois, why did they not submit the whole constitution? He answers the question himself by saying the only reason given, was that it would be voted down.

Who said so? Why, the Senator from Illinois, and, I believe, the Senator from Michigan. Who else said so? Did the people of Kansas say so? Some one of that convention may have said so; but the convention itself, as a convention, never put its action on any such ground. To represent them as being influenced by such a consideration when you have not the slightest evidence, I say is neither legitimate nor logical.

But assumptions have been made from the beginning of this discussion down to the present time; and no more gross assumptions have been made by any Senator, than by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. Why, said he, this election was all very fair on its face, but gross frauds have been perpetrated. That Senator is a distinguished lawyer; he knows the force and weight of evidence; but if he referred to anything that would be received as evidence before any justice of the peace in any county of his State, I should like to have it pointed out. Why, said he, both the Governors have given it as their opinion that a large majority of the people of the Territory are against the constitution. Talking about legal proceedings, the Senate of the United States having a constitution, adopted according to law, brought before them, it is to be overruled, broken down by the opinion of two gentlemen who rode through the country! Why, sir, will a lawyer assert that to be evidence at all? When did they give that evidence? Since they fell out with the Administration, and joined the enemy. It is no evidence at all, and comes in a very questionable shape.

Again: the Senator from Illinois says this constitution does not meet the will of the people. Where is the evidence of that? Why the Legislature elected in October passed resolutions protesting against its reception and admission. Does that prove that the constitution does not meet the will of the people of Kansas? Does he not know that, when that Legislature was elected, the constitution had not been formed? That Legislature was elected in October; the convention had not then formed the constitution. Did they condemn it in advance? Did they reflect the will of their constituents? The question had not been before the voters of the Territory to say whether they approved that constitution or did not approve it; and, consequently, the Legislature elected could not possibly represent them and reflect their will on that subject. It is worse than idle, it is absolutely ridiculous, to say that the Legislature elected in October, before the constitution was formed, could express the will of the people on that constitution. The convention, chosen by the people to make the constitution, can better reflect the will of the people than the Legislature chosen for a different purpose.

The people elected that convention to make a constitution. They had not then performed their work. They elected a certain set of men to go to the Territorial Legislature. Subsequent to that election the people's convention did form a constitution, and the Legislature undertook to pronounce judgment upon the work of the people's representatives. Does that afford any evidence that it would be condemned by the people? I cannot so understand it; nor do I believe that any man who will turn his attention to it for one moment will believe it is entitled to any weight or consideration whatever. Even the Senator from Illinois, following the example of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, says, "Ask the Governors what the will of the people there is." Is that to have any weight? I submit, with due deference to the longer experience of the distinguished Senators, that the way to ascertain the people's will is not to ask their Governors what it is. Can you have the people's will except when collected in the form of law? Will you look at a mob, guess at its size, and say that that overrides a legal vote? You sanction that principle when you undertake to repudiate the action of this legal convention, because a Governor may have said he rode through the country and counted so many stumps and so many cabins, and he was inclined to think the majority was on that side. I trust such arguments will never be made here again. Moreover, the Governors were not chosen by the people, while the convention was, for the direct purpose of making the constitution, and their action is the best evidence of the people's will.

The Legislature of the Territory was not chosen for the purpose of expressing the will of the people on the constitution; neither was the Governor, who was appointed by Federal authority.

But the great question, it is said, is, does the constitution embody the people's will? Now I come to the point which I have been incidentally noticing for some time. Their will is collected only through the forms of law. But, says one Senator, we do not object to these forms of law, but we go for the equity of the case. Well, what is equity? First, equity follows the law; second, the rules of evidence in equity and law are the same. If in law your evidence would not be admissible, neither will it be received in equity to ascertain the equity of this case. Flying report, wild guess, visionary imaginations, are to be brought up to weigh down legal evidence, by old experienced lawyers and statesmen. I am astonished at it. There must be an impelling power behind to rush them into error so gross, else it could never be done. What that impelling influence is I know not. In the United States of America, distinguished for its endeavors to protect the people's rights, there has never been but one rule to collect the people's will—by a legal proceeding. The moment you depart from this rule, when you next have an election of President of the United States the ballots will be cast, the votes will be counted, the electors returned, and a wild cry will be raised outside of this Capitol—Governors A, B, C, or D will say that an immense majority of the people of the United States were opposed to the President. They will say he does not represent the public will; that a majority are against him. I have already heard it said that Mr. Buchanan is a minority President, that Mr. Pierce was a minority President. Take one more step, incite the people in their frenzy to go one inch further under the example intimated here that you may guess at numbers, and not take the people's will in the forms of law, and you will have bristling bayonets and threatening cannon pointed at the walls of your Capitol to displace those legally elected to put in the mob and the candidate of the mob. It is fraught with a danger that demands the most serious reflection. We should pause before we set an example so calamitous in its tendency.

Does this constitution embody the people's will? I say, yes; and when I answer, I predicate my answer upon that which cannot be controverted or gainsayed. When the Opposition answer, it is a loose, unsupported assertion. But the question, does it embody the people's will? comes back with all its force, again and again. What is the test? Were there disfranchised counties where members were not elected? That does not affect it. There were but very few people in them, and nearly all the people were registered—all were, that desired it. You cannot compel a man to vote. You ought to give all the privilege of voting; and having the privilege, if they refuse to vote, the consequence must rest upon their own heads. Take the case of Iowa, to which the Senator from Kentucky referred—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Not Iowa; Wisconsin.

Mr. GREEN. I thought it was Iowa to which the Senator referred.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. GREEN. I think I am correct, and the Senator will see that I am correct in a moment. He was upon the point that a constitution was formed by them, and the boundary, or some other part, was not acceptable to Congress. Congress said to them, you may come in, if you conform your boundary to the northern boundary of the State of Missouri, and comply with certain conditions. The constitution went back to the State, and Congress never heard anything more of it; and I will tell you why. The people voted it down. Congress undertook to change the boundary which the people had inserted in the first constitution, and to prescribe terms to them. They voted down the propositions which Congress made to them, and subsequently formed a new constitution; but when they did come into the Union, what was the evidence that it embodied the people's will?

Mr. HARLAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. HARLAN. Congress prescribed no new boundary to Iowa, as the Senator will see by examining the act.

Mr. GREEN. It prescribed some conditions which they repudiated. How was the second constitution received? By a submission to the people. What was the vote upon that? Now you want clear, unmistakable evidence that the constitution embodies the people's will. In the case of Iowa, over nine thousand four hundred and fifty voted for the constitution, and nine thousand and sixty voted against the constitution, and three counties were disfranchised. If the votes of those three counties had been brought in, and counted in the negative they would have overturned that majority. Yet you see the forms of law were observed. One of those counties, which seems to be rather remarkable, was named Buchanan; not a vote was received from it. There were two other counties from which not a vote was received; but yet it was their own negligence. The law afforded them the opportunity, and if they did not avail themselves of that opportunity, they were bound by the decision of those who went to the polls and voted. So in Kansas; so in California; so in every instance. I believe there never has been a vote taken in the United States in which every man participated who was entitled.

Take the case of the recent amendments to the constitution in the State of Pennsylvania. I am informed by the Senator from that State that they can poll about five hundred thousand votes in the State. Last year they adopted some amendments to their constitution, less than one hundred and forty thousand voting. The highest vote that any amendment received, was one hundred and sixteen or one hundred and eighteen thousand. Yet it was the will of the people—the legally expressed will. Those who do not think it proper to come forward and exercise the rights which are extended to them, are bound by the decision that is made. Deal with Kansas on the same principle; extend to her the same rule of action, and you will be estopped from finding any fault or making any complaint. But every time they hear this word estopped, a cold shudder seems to run over these Republican Senators. Estopped! They say that is the lawyer's plea. I trust we are not opposed to law and order. I trust we will ever act on the legal rules established by centuries of experience, by enlightened human reason, as best calculated and designed to protect the rights of the people. On those we ever act; and when we depart from them, we will be not only at sea without rudder and without compass, but we will be in a terrific storm driving us upon the rocks of destruction.

But one of the great and important points—it looms up with great magnificence in the Opposition here—is the vote on the 4th of January. After the constitution had been finally adopted, and was complete, on the 21st day of December, after the work of the convention had been consummated, a Legislature meets—not appointed for that purpose, not selected for that purpose, because when they were elected, in October, the constitution had not been formed—but in spite of that, without instruction from the people, without authority from the people, they undertake to defeat the will of the people by ordering a subsequent election. I would like to know if I could dare to ask that question, who gave instructions out there to get up that vote? Whence did the orders emanate? Who sent them the advice? It makes no difference to me how it originated; its consequences are just the same; but, as a matter of curiosity, to go into and fill up the vacant spaces in the history of this strange transaction, I would like to know who issued the orders. Had that Legislature the power to order an election? Why, say Senators, it had as much power over the subject of a constitution as had any preceding Legislature. I say they had not. I have before stated to you that the source of power was the people, not the Legislature. They only make use of the Legislature as a legal instrumentality to collect the people's will. The people instructed the Legislature to call that convention. The people had, by a direct vote, said, we want a State organization. Therefore, when the Legislature met, they were but doing and performing, in the language of the report, "a ministerial act," providing a fair, just, and equitable method for the people to exercise their rights, and elect delegates to form a constitution. When that convention assembled, it was, in contemplation of law, according to all ideas of representative government, the people of Kansas; and could no more be interfered with, stayed, checked, or controlled in its action, than could a convention in one State be controlled by a Legislature in another. The Legislature of the Territory, after this constitution is adopted, undertakes to set it aside; undertakes to make a submission in a manner that must set it aside, and for the design of setting it aside, if it could have any legal effect whatever. But who ever heard of a State constitution being thus submitted?

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Green.

SENATE.

Now, if I have been successful in proving that the steps taken there were legal steps, were usual steps, were proper steps, all of them ended in the consummation of the instrument on the 21st of December, and it was then a fixed fact and a constitution of a State—not in the Union, because it cannot be in the Union without the assent of Congress. Then, being a constitution, thus formed and emanating from the people, it could be no more interfered with than could the constitution of the State of New York be voted down by submitting it to a vote of the people. What would any Senator think if he should hear it stated that in his own State the Legislature had said, "we will see whether this is the constitution or not, and we will submit it to a vote of the people?" Suppose the constitution had been performing its functions for twenty years, yet that at once somebody, like the sentimental German mentioned by Mr. Webster, should say, "an idea strikes me; let us see whether our constitution embodies the people's will; and let us submit it to a vote of the people." When the Senator from Kentucky holds forth that idea it strikes me with real astonishment. I had not learned in the same school. He uses this language:

"Was it not of consequence, was it not of importance, to know the will of the people, whether they really did approve of this constitution which was about to be offered to Congress—a law which, when Congress puts its imprimatur on it by admitting the State, is to be permanent? Would it be any harm to take the vote over and over again? What objection could there be to it? You might have said, 'it is an unnecessary care of the people's rights; you have had their decision once; therefore, it is not necessary to have it again;' but out of abundant care and abundant zeal you may choose to take it again and again, and ascertain whether there may be change or variation in the public opinion. Where is the man who can say aught against it? Do you object to it because it is taking too great care of public liberty? paying too great respect to popular rights? Nobody will take that ground."

According to this idea of the Senator, although a constitution may be fairly and finally adopted, yet we should adopt the principle of saying, there may be a change of opinion, and we will take the sense of the people again and again and again upon it. After Kentucky has adopted a constitution, and the people have lived under it for years, would it be in the power of any one all at once to say, "an idea strikes me; I will see whether this embodies the will of the people; let us take the vote again and again and again." You can with as much propriety do it in the one case as in the other. If that convention adopted a constitution at all, you could no more interfere with it than could the Legislature of Kentucky interfere with their constitution by saying, "we will ascertain again and again and again whether the people now approve of it." It is contrary to the principles of government. Take the case of the election of the smallest officer in the smallest municipality. Even in the election of a constable, could any one the next day after the election say, "let us try this over again, and see if there is any change;" and the day after that say, "let us try it over and over again, in order to see if there is any change in public opinion?" I expect Colonel Frémont would like to have adopted the doctrine of the Senator from Kentucky, in order to try the presidential election over again. [Laughter.] I remember when I went to school and played at marbles, the boys used to cry "slips" on me, in order to try it over again. When a power has been exercised according to law, there is no power to try it over again except by pursuing all the customary legal steps requisite to reach the same end.

But to create doubt, to excite suspicion, to generate distrust, and make men afraid to do their duty, the Opposition insinuate and charge fraud. I have heard the cry of fraud so often, that I would almost think the old maxim had been adopted—I do not apply it to Senators—but a very distinguished man once said, a lie well stuck to and oft repeated was as good as the truth. Fraud! What fraud affecting either one of the elections relating to the adoption of this constitution? I challenge any Senator to show it. What fraud? Was there fraud when the people voted and said in an emphatic voice, we want a State government? It was not alleged. Was there fraud when the people of Kansas elected delegates, and sent them up to a convention to make a constitution? Neither has that been alleged. Was there fraud affecting the validity of the decision on the slavery question on the 21st of December? That is not alleged.

It has been said by the Senator from Kentucky that some two thousand of the votes cast on that day are believed to be fraudulent votes. Suppose they were: it leaves the question unaffected. The Senator from Georgia well answered that objection. But what is the evidence that there were any fraudulent votes? Why, says the Senator, the President of the Council, Mr. Babcock, and Mr. Deitzler, Speaker of the House of Representatives, both say they rode through the country, and did not see cabins enough to hold the people who voted. Look at the character of the evidence. Here are two men, called voluntarily—not in the performance of duty in obedience to law, without any jurisdiction over the subject—to see the fairness of the opening and counting of this vote; and they say there were six thousand seven hundred and ninety-five votes cast. They then volunteer a statement in regard to some of the votes. Who are they? Bitter enemies of the constitution—men who have been classed in the secret legion—men who have been arrayed against all government—men who have doubtless taken the secret oath reported here as being discovered and brought to light, and embodied in this report by Senator Douglas—an oath by all means to accomplish their nefarious ends. That class of persons, standing out in rebellion, standing out in defiance of law, standing out in opposition to Federal authority as well as territorial authority, with a sworn purpose to defeat that State organization, with a sworn purpose to defeat that constitution, who have taken an oath to prohibit slavery—they are the witnesses called upon by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. They volunteered a statement, and made a statement, not in the discharge of any official duty; and the statement itself shows that they knew nothing about that of which they spoke; for they say, we have been through those counties, and are satisfied there is not that number of people there.

Why, Mr. President, it is a fact known to those familiar with the subject, that in Johnson county there was a reservation of land for the Indians of about double the quantity to which they were entitled under the treaty. It was discovered; and citizens, before it was opened up to settlement by the operation of the Department, went there, and made their locations all over it. They could not live on it, because it is prohibited under the reservation; but it would ultimately be open to market. Those holding claims, could not make permanent improvements, and perfect them, and were compelled to live in the small towns around, and watch their claims, until the reservation should be opened by the Department. That is the secret of this whole matter. There was not fraud there. As Governor Walker has well said, there was no danger of Missourians undertaking to influence those elections; there was no danger of Missourians going over there, and voting. I have his evidence in this document to vindicate them from the charges that have been so unjustly heaped upon their heads.

But was there no fraud at the election on the 4th of January? Yes; there was. There can be no question about that. They cast more votes than they had in the whole Territory on the same day at the same voting at a hotly contested election. On the constitution there was no contest at all. Our side did not vote at all on that question; the constitution being finally adopted. We stand upon our rights and we do not intend to be trifled with, said the Democratic party. I do not mean pro-slavery men only, for there are hundreds of men from the northern States who are in favor of a State organization, and then, if subsequent events should show that they ought not to have slavery, to change the constitution, who will act shoulder to shoulder with us and do it. They said the constitution being finally adopted, we will not attend the polls. Hence these same people who could only poll for State officers, at a hotly contested election, six thousand two hundred and thirty-eight votes, at an election where there was no contest, polled ten thousand and sixty-four. What do you think of them? Why was this? There was no difference in the qualification which the voters should possess in order to exercise the elective franchise. What constituted the difference in numbers? This: at the one place they were watched, there was a contending party arrayed against them; in the other case they were not watched and put in as many votes as they pleased. We know they are a class who are in the habit of making use of fictitious names; and that is proved by Mr. Secretary Stanton. If a man will use a fictitious name for one purpose, as we have proved it on him, will he not do so again for another purpose?

It is also known that over four hundred came from Lawrence and voted at that day in Leavenworth. This is shown by the Lawrence vote. The vote at Leavenworth was four hundred larger than was their actual vote. Their vote for State officers at Lawrence fell off a corresponding number; and yet, on the vote on the constitution at Lawrence, they gave more votes than they ever gave in their lives before. They involve contradiction; they involve absurdities; and when we see their course, as portrayed by Governor Stanton and Governor Walker, we have a right to regard them as spurious. I care not, however, if they were the most legal imaginable; I care not if you prove them to be the bona fide citizens voting; it was voting on a subject previously decided, and I trust that this Congress will never set an example which would induce the people to say: "we will call an election on a day not appointed by law, when a question has been finally decided, and we will then vote just as many votes as we please." It is well known that, if this principle was to be sanctioned, the subsequent election would always prevail. Knowing exactly how many votes were previously cast, knowing what they had to work up to, they could of course manufacture a majority, and thus lead to fraud, to violence, and bloodshed. The character of those persons may be pretty well understood from what I have quoted in the report presented to the Senate; but, as still better evidence upon the same subject, I beg leave to have read an extract from a speech delivered in New York, June 11, 1856, by the very distinguished Senator from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

"On the other hand, in Kansas you find that the New England Emigrant Aid Society, through pauperism, with a capital of $5,000,000, undertook to regulate the Territory fifteen hundred miles off, and to control their liberties, without respect to the rights, wishes, and interests of the people of the Territory. This foreign interference on the part of the Free-Soilers; this foreign interference by corporations from New England to regulate western affairs, has created in Kansas what every man had a right to suppose it would create—civil war, dissension, violence, and bloodshed. For every drop of blood that has been shed in the Territory of Kansas, the 'Black Republican' leaders are responsible. [Loud cheers.] It is a part of their line of policy to get up civil war there, and then make political capital out of the innocent blood shed by their tools and dupes, for the purpose of promoting their candidates in the presidential election. What is their excuse for not obeying the law in Kansas? They tell us that the laws enacted by the Territorial Legislature are barbarous and inhuman!"

"Out of a volume of at least a thousand pages, containing innumerable enactments, applicable to every relation in life, and protecting every interest in society, yet out of that long list of laws relating to all the affairs of human concern, only two short enactments have been specified as being either unjust or improper. One of them relates to the question of slavery, and the other regulates the affairs of elections. It is worthy of remark, and should never be forgotten, that under neither of those laws has any one case yet arisen—no one case has arisen under those two laws which are objected to as being improper. No case has ever arisen, no writ has ever been issued, no trial has ever been had, no act of violence has ever occurred, under either of these two obnoxious laws. Then, what excuse is there for that violence? Why, these men, these Abolitionists, these 'Black Republicans,' send out their agents there to get up strife and bloodshed, to be copied into the Abolition papers here for political effect. Contributions are taken to buy Sharpe's rifles, and to send men out there to resist the law. 'Preachers of the Gospel, instead of expounding the Holy Scriptures, convert the house of God into a recruiting office for brigands to go to Kansas to stir up strife and civil war, in order that the Tribune, Times, Post, and other Abolition papers here may portray the horrors of the border ruffians. These men, sent out by your Beechers, by your Sillimans, by your Theodore Parkers, by your Garrisons, go into Kansas, burn innocent people's houses; and when the court issues a writ against the house-burner, and when the sheriff goes to execute that writ, they shoot down the officers of the law; screen the house burner from the penalty of the law, and protect him in his violence, and then talk of the consequences and effects of the Nebraska bill. Every act of violence that has occurred in Kansas in resistance to the officers of the law, has been either house violence, murder, breach of the peace, or some other crime recognized as such in all civilized countries; but the 'Black Republicans' have protected the criminal in his lawless course."

Mr. GREEN. Now, Mr. President, that is presented as evidence to show the character of those who have gotten up the opposition, who have managed the opposition, who have controlled the opposition. Senator DOUGLAS well portrayed them. When the Senator from Kentucky says the last expression of the people ought to prevail, I must say to him that, with some qualification, it is correct. The last legal expression on the subject, properly submitted to the people, on which they have a right to vote, ought to prevail, and will prevail; but a subject having been completely decided, no other proceeding can be instituted to undo what has been done. Even when they did attempt to undo it, it was by the use of instrumentalities like those portrayed by the Senator from Illinois. They sought to get up strife and bloodshed to fill the columns of the Tribune, his present friend and supporter, the Post, and other papers in the northern States, to manufacture capital for political purposes. I hope the Senate and House of Representatives will take a course to remove those means if they desire to make use of them for electioneering purposes, and to quiet the subject forever.

But, sir, it has been said that the Legislature instituted a commission to go around and collect evidence to prove what frauds have been committed at the various elections, that this commission has been perambulating the country collecting the facts, and that these facts sustain all the charges of fraud. I said many weeks ago that I had no doubt of the fact that in most of the elections of the United States, frauds to a greater or less extent are committed. It is because of the imperfection of man. If he were perfect, there would be no difficulty, and he would need no law. But what I have ever said, and what I still adhere to, is that no fraud has been established affecting the validity of this constitution. If there were frauds in the October election, they do not affect the constitution adopted by the people; if there were frauds in the election on the 4th of January at Delaware Crossing, they do not affect any of the proceedings in the formation of the constitution; if there were frauds at the election on the 21st of December, they do not affect it, because there was majority enough without even the alleged fraudulent votes. Why, then, shall we stop to inquire about the proceedings of that commission?

But, sir, the whole action of that commission is null and void, and entitled to no consideration for various reasons. First, the legislative authority that created that commission had no jurisdiction over the subject they undertake to investigate. They had no jurisdiction over the election of the 21st of December. They had no jurisdiction over the other elections. All that they could do was to test the legality of their own election. Having no jurisdiction whatever on this subject, any commission they may have created is null and void, and its acts are of no weight or consequence whatever.

More than that, they could not even swear a man so as to bind him. They had not power to administer an oath; and a man sworn by them, even if he made a false statement, under that form of oath would not be guilty of perjury. We know the instruments they could make use of, and the character of the persons they could call on for testimony. Their object was to break down the legal constitution of the Territory. That was their sole purpose. It was their declared purpose. It was not to ascertain the truth, for at one of the examinations at Leavenworth they asked a witness whether he knew of any fraudulent votes in that place? He replied, "yes, I do; four hundred came from Lawrence, and voted on your side." "Oh," said the commissioner, "we do not want to hear a word about that." The question was asked of another, "do you know of any illegal vote being given?" He replied, "yes; forty or fifty Germans, living in Missouri, were carried over by Pomeroy, and voted in Atchison county." "Oh, hush," said the questioner, "we do not want to know anything about that."

Mr. POLK. They were carried from Weston. Mr. GREEN. Such proceedings were common. I attach no importance to that commission for the reasons that I have assigned. They had no jurisdiction, and, therefore, their acts could have had no validity, and the oath administered by them would have had no validity. No perjury could be committed under it. Therefore, they could get their own tools to swear to what they pleased; and I am not certain that they could not get a respectable number to swear anything, even if the oath were legal—I mean respectable in point of numbers, not character.

But, Mr. President, if I were to follow on in a close examination of all this, I should consume too much time, weary the Senate, and travel over and over again the ground others have occupied so well. I shall, therefore, hasten on as rapidly as I can. It has been demonstrated that a legal constitution is presented. It has been demonstrated that there is no legal evidence to prove that it does not embody the will of the people, and that if we depart from the legal rules we are striking at the foundation of civil liberty. Why, then, shall Kansas not be admitted? What reason can be urged against it? The principal part of the Opposition on the other side of the Chamber is alone in consequence of the slave question. They are now but carrying out, when the question is first presented in its practical form, what the Senator from Illinois, with great power, said was their fixed and determined purpose in 1856. Here is what Mr. DOUGLAS said:

"What were those principles that they [that is, the Republican party] proudly and defiantly proclaimed to their opponents? They were, first, the restoration of that black line called the Missouri compromise; secondly, the repeal of the fugitive slave law; thirdly, the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; fourthly, the abolition of the slave trade among the States; fifthly, the admission of no more territory or States into this Union, unless slavery was first prohibited; sixthly, the crucifixion of every man who voted for Kansas and Nebraska."

I am afraid they have crucified one by getting him in their embrace. I hope not; because I yet believe that he is not influenced in his opposition by the consideration of the existence of slavery in the constitution. I believe it; and I believe the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] when he makes the same assertion; and I believe the Senator from California [Mr. BRODERICK] when he makes a similar assertion. They are governed by one principle; but they are building up and strengthening a dangerous party that exists in this country, whose fixed purpose is to admit no more slave States. The first time that practical issue is presented, we find the Senator from Illinois, our old leader, who has fought so many gallant battles, and gained so many brilliant victories, going over on that issue which they tender, though he may be governed, and is governed, by another consideration. The motive does not sanctify the deed. In a moral sense, between him and his Creator, it doubtless does; but in a political sense, when practical results are to follow, the motive is a small matter. The deed is good or bad, according to the results that follow from it. At the time he portrayed this as the platform of the Republican party, he said:

"The Cincinnati convention had accepted that gauntlet and has negatived every one of the propositions and has proclaimed a creed which meets the cordial approbation of every Democrat in America, no matter from what point of the compass he may come."

This was in 1856. In 1858 the practical question is presented. In 1856 it was wrong to oppose the admission of a State on account of its tolerating slavery. In 1858 that question comes before the Senate of the United States, and every Republican opposes it, for, as he has before said, their creed is to oppose that admission; and he, for other considerations, not on account of slavery, coöperates in the work. Without his aid, his lead, his guidance, in this Chamber, and his friends in the other House, Kansas would have been a young sister of the Confederacy many weeks ago; and that very work which he deprecated, that very purpose which he said constituted an issue with the Democracy, he aids them in carrying out—not for the same motive and reason that they have, but in practical results it is all the same thing.

As the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] announced to us, the real question is, shall any more slave States ever be admitted? The real question for the South is not the permanent existence of slavery in Kansas; that is but the John Doe and Richard Roe of the case. The South, of necessity, as well as the North, with the enterprise and energy of the American character, will need expansion. It must have expansion. If penned in with a Chinese wall applied only to the blacks, with the privilege of exit to the whites, when the country becomes overpopulated, the disparity will become greater and greater between the two races, and insurrection, civil war, and extermination will be the natural consequences. This you seek to hasten; this the Republican party of the United States proclaim to be their supreme purpose. To increase their strength, to increase their hopes, to encourage them in their prospects, our best of friends on this question, heretofore, have gone over to them. I speak it with extreme regret. I will never build up the enemy of my country, even if I do have some small objections to the proceedings of my political friends. Even if the proceedings in Kansas did not come up exactly to my notions, I would not go to the aid of the enemy, on a dangerous vital point like this, that strikes a fatal blow at the heart of our country.

My old friend from Kentucky, too, I find on that side; not for the purpose of aiding them—I know his patriotism too well to believe that—but because he has objections to the proceedings in Kansas. Well, whether he has objections ill or well founded, he should not aid in building up, and I hope he may not, a party which will, if any party ever does, divide this Union. The more especially am I astonished at him, in consequence of another reason. I understand him as being favorable to the principles of the American party. I am no American in that sense, but I have no hostility to them personally, and do not esteem them dangerous, in comparison to the Republicans. To one of their principles, at least, I heartily subscribe to: that no man ought to be permitted to vote until he is naturalized. That, however, is a question for the States, not Congress. But, sir, this emigrant aid society seeks to abolitionize Kansas; and their programme is to extend to every other Territory, after succeeding there. Here is their organization. Their purposes are declared, and the instrumentalities they intend to use are shown. Here is what they say in their address:

"Of the whole emigration from Europe, amounting to some four hundred thousand persons, there can be no difficulty in inducing some thirty or forty thousand to take the same direction," [to Kansas.]

They are to bring their appliances to bear on the freshly-arrived emigrant before he becomes familiar with our institutions and induce him to go to Kansas to abolitionize Kansas. These are the instrumentalities they make use of. The Senator from Kentucky, abhorrent as he esteems that class, as much as he thinks they ought not to be permitted to participate in the Government, is to encourage and aid the very party that makes use of them to accomplish this damning deed. How far will they be able to accomplish their ends, by taking their stand at emigrant ships, and catching a newly-arrived emigrant, and before he becomes familiar with our institutions, before he becomes imbued with the character of our Government, extending to him a hand and saying: "I will help induce you to go into a new Territory about being opened, if you will keep African slavery out of there?"

They apply to him arguments like these: "The African comes into competition with your labor, and it is your interest to vote against slavery." Thus, that class are deceived, misled, many of them honestly misled. They have prejudices against slavery, and they are strengthened in it if they are taken in hand by the emigrant aid societies, whose purpose is to keep up a relentless war against slavery, and against the South. They continue to do this by making use of the emigrant, and my old friend from Kentucky still stands by them. They have done it to a great degree in regard to Kansas. We, of Missouri, from our proximity, from the facility of our settlements over the line, maintained a permanent majority in the Territory of actual bona fide inhabitants, and defeated their schemes up to the adoption of this constitution, and because they encouraged this sort of subsequent emigration, they now think they have a majority. I should not be surprised if they had; but up to that time we had the majority. By subsequent proceedings, making use of instrumentalities like these, they sought to prevent Kansas from entering the portals of the Union.

Mr. President, establish this as the system, establish this as the settled policy of the Government, by the aid of those of the South who may have some little peculiarity of distinction, and are called by the name American rather than Democrat, still our interest in the great question is none the less identical; and if ruin should overtake us by southern defection, the fatal effects will fall upon all alike, while execrations will follow the faithless. It is not the importance of holding slaves in Kansas that is the great question; but the decree is to go forth from the decision of this question whether the South shall be permitted to expand as well as the North. Disguise it as you may, explain it as often as you please, proclaim it from the house-tops, and publish it from hill to hill, and from mountain to mountain, let it echo and reëcho over the valley that A, B, and C, did not vote against the bill on that account, still the public judgment will stand that it was on account of slavery. Then Black Republicanism—I use the term with respect—will become bolder, and onward and onward in its career, crushing out the last hope of Democratic aid at the North; and will never find its barrier until it meets the sullen, stubborn cannon of the South.

To the Democratic party of the North, noble, bold, and true as they are and have been to us, though we may differ on some peculiarities of the proceeding in Kansas, are we to bid them an everlasting farewell? I trust we are not; but whether we do or do not, is their influence to be cast in the scale, in a cause like this, that will be for weal or for woe to the Union? Do it, and you break down the last hope of Democracy. Do it, and that party which has held the reins of Government, under which we have prospered, expanded, progressed, as no other people on the globe have, falls powerless, scattered into forty thousand atoms. The pride, the honor, the glory of the party has been that it was not confined to the South or the North; that it was not confined to the East or the West; and I trust the time will never come when the Democratic party will be thus circumscribed. The scorching sun of the South will wither up Republicanism. It can fructify only in the snows and icebergs of the North. There is something cold in the heart that sustains it. The warm, gushing feelings of the man that sympathizes with the whole country never permits it to find a lodgment. If, on a question like this, the Democratic party is to be broken up and torn asunder—if a sectional party is to be substituted for it—if a single idea, and that idea based on the right of Government to annihilate the property of a citizen, is to predominate—the consequences will be upon those who take the fatal step. However rightful the motive may be; however praiseworthy the object, it never can be explained; the people cannot be deceived; they will know that it was on account of slavery. The moral influence of this decision will be felt as decisive action on the one side or the other. It will either be to sustain the Constitution and rights of the people, the rights of the South, and the rights of the North—for if I could bound my vision by the line that separates the slaveholding from the non-slaveholding States, I would deserve to be thrown out of the walls of the Capitol—or that party thus expansive in its views, noble in its purposes, and thereby powerful for good, will be broken down. If it is done by the aid or sanction of southern men, the consequences to the South and North will be equally disastrous.

We are appealed to on another subject. It has been said General Calhoun has given certificates to the anti-slavery party in Kansas. Well, sir, suppose he has done so, is that a reason why you and I shall defeat a great principle? I told you in the beginning that "Kansas" is but the form of the issue, and the name of the case. Shall we sacrifice the opportunity of establishing a great principle, vital to the South, and, as far as the North depends upon the South, vital to the North?—for our interests are so interlocked that they never can be separated without injury to both. I say this is a vital question, and the principle is not to be affected by the election of officeholders there. Where is the Senator, where is the member of the House of Representatives, who will say, "I would vote to admit Kansas if my party had prevailed in the State election? I would vote to admit Kansas if the American party had been elected? I would vote to admit Kansas if the Republican ticket had been elected; but I will vote against it if the Democratic ticket is elected?" Where is the Democrat who will say, on the reverse, "I would vote to admit it, if the Democrats carried the election; but I will vote against it if either of the other parties had carried it?"

When you act upon that principle, you violate the Constitution of your country that you have sworn to support. That Constitution gives you a right to look into the constitution of a new State, to see if it be republican. It does not give you the right to go and inquire who has been elected Governor and members of the State Legislature. With the same propriety you might inquire whether Governor Wise has been legally elected; whether Governor Banks has been legally elected; and you might institute a commission with as much propriety as the Kansas Legislature did, to see if frauds were committed in the election of Governor Banks, or in the election of Governor Wise, or in any State election. What right have you, then, to look into that question? None; and if not, what right have you to vote against the admission of a State merely because the newly elected State officers are not such as you approve? If the Constitution does not give you that right, you dare not attempt to exercise it.

Again: the Senator from Illinois complained, some two or three weeks ago, bitterly complained, that Calhoun was here in the city, and keeping the people still in doubt whether the Democratic ticket was elected, or whether the Republican ticket was elected. He absolutely complained of that. Last night, when he addressed the Senate, he spoke of the fact of issuing the certificates, and he complained still louder. Why these double complaints—in one case for not acting, and in the other case because he did act? It reminds me of certain persons of whom it was said they were

"Like unto children sitting in the markets, and calling unto their fellows,

"And saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned unto you, and ye have not lamented.

"For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, He hath a devil.

"The son of man came eating and drinking, and they say, Behold a man gluttonous, and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners."

He then complained because it was not done; and, on the other hand, he now complains still more loudly because it is done. But I care nothing about it in either event. It is none of my right to stop and inquire into the election. The Constitution under which I am acting does not give me that privilege; and if I dare transgress the boundary of my right and duty under the Constitution in the one case, where shall I stop in any other case?

Now, Mr. President, I intend to close my remarks. My object has been to show that there has been no fraud affecting the legality of this proceeding. That there have been frauds in all the elections, I think highly probable; but so there have been in New York city; so there have been in Baltimore; so there have been in Louisville, where, I believe, two thousand men were disfranchised at the last election—at least it has been so reported; it may not be true.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to state one thing I would like to hear him upon in this connection?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator whether the Lecompton constitution did not direct the canvass of the votes cast upon the constitution itself, and in both elections, to be made within eight days after the elections were held; whether, in regard to the question of fraud, he attaches no importance whatever to the delay which has attended the ascertaining and reporting of the results of those elections. If the honorable Senator will take it in kindness, I should like to hear him on that point.

Mr. GREEN. It does not embarrass me in the least; the subject does not require me to be bashful. The election on the 4th of January, for State officers, is a question with which we have no concern. It is an election that cannot come before us, and I should be traveling beyond my duty, and touching upon ground that does not properly belong to me, if I should undertake to give any opinion at all upon the subject. Suppose the returns were to be made in eight days. Were they or were they not? I do not know, nor does the Senator from New York. Suppose they were not made in eight days: does that affect the legality of this constitution after it has become a finality, after it has been adopted and become an entirety? Could it affect any vote in this Chamber?

While the Senator from New York was asking me this question, the momentary pause I made brought to my mind another subject, upon which I must say a few words. It is this: it has been alleged on the other side of the Chamber that the submission of the seventh article of the constitution, including the slave clause, was not a fair submission. The people could have voted out slavery, if they had a majority, and chose to come forward; yet they say, if they had voted it out, slavery would still have been retained in Kansas as perfectly as if that article had been retained. The able and distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] so completely and so triumphantly answered that objection that I should do wrong to undertake to improve it. I cannot do it; it is not susceptible of improvement; it is conclusive and unanswerable.

But there is one point growing out of the same idea that I must notice; and that is, that point upon which the Senator from Illinois dwelt so long when he spoke of the right of property being older than the Constitution, and he held that declaration up to animadvert upon. He contended that it was a fallacy; and because the Washington Union published that fallacy, therefore he would not vote for the editor for a certain office. I do not complain of his action on that question. He had a right to do it. My opinion is founded on the Declaration of Independence: we hold these truths to be self-evident—speaking of the white race—that all men are created free and equal, and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—that pursuit of happiness includes the acquisition of property; and to secure these ends governments are instituted. What ends? Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. What does the pursuit of happiness include? The lawful acquisition of one's own labor; and therefore it is before the Constitution, older than Government, and Government cannot destroy it.

I go further than that. This declaration says these are inalienable rights. What is meant by an inalienable right? That which a man cannot alienate from himself: he cannot part from it. In forming a political association, the government you create has just such power as you can confer upon that government, or may confer upon that government, or choose to confer upon that government. Now, if this pursuit of happiness is one of the inalienable rights, and the pursuit of happiness includes the right to private property, and it cannot be alienated, then the government never can possess it. If government never can possess it, and a man cannot part from it, much less can a majority take it from a minority. I go so far as this: if I were in Kansas and had a horse, or a slave, or a saw-log, or a farm, or a Yankee clock, and every man in the Territory or State should vote to say that clock shall not be your property; that horse shall not be your property; that farm, or that saw-log, or slave, shall not be your property, I hold that their vote of ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and ninety-nine against me alone would not and could not divest me of my right. In the regulation of future political action in the Territory you may say we will not have a slave here; those that are here we will set free, but we will pay you for them. He who brings them in after the law prohibits it, comes in with his eyes open, and the law, in taking the property from him, does not confiscate it—he is forfeiting property by his own act. That is the difference. No man can be despoiled of his rights by numbers. They may crush him; they may overpower him; they may trample him in the dust; but still the voice of justice will cry aloud to Heaven for redress—not for vengeance; for I never want to hear vengeance invoked in this Chamber.

Kansas—Lecompton Constitution—Mr. Crittenden.

SENATE.

In reply to the question put some time since by the Senator from New York, I will state that I am informed by a friend here that all the returns with regard to the State election were made within eight days. That is a matter en pais, but I had never turned my attention to it. My attention had been confined to the legal point on which I had the right to act. The Senator from New York, therefore, is now answered. They were returned within that time.

There is one point, however, that I have hastily passed over, and that is the one which the Senator from Illinois animadverts upon with so much peculiar zest—the mode of amendment of the constitution. The Senator says that, when the Constitution prescribes a certain mode of amendment that mode only can be pursued; and if any other mode is resorted to, it is revolutionary. He quotes the article from the declaration of rights, to be found in the report I made to the Senate at the time the bill was presented, and he says that is a revolutionary right. He says it is like the Declaration of Independence. Here it is:

“All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper.”

This, says the Senator from Illinois, is a right of revolution by war—grim-visaged war—a revolution by the sword. I answer that such is not the interpretation; and I intend to prove, to my own satisfaction at least, the position I take on that subject. This provision is but copied, in the language of President Buchanan, from various other State constitutions. Nearly all the States of the Union have a similar declaration in their bill of rights. When, therefore, it was put into the declaration of rights in Kansas, it was put in there with its known construction and ordinary execution and application. What is that known construction, ordinary execution, and application in the several States? I will tell you. Indiana, with a similar provision, and also a provision in the constitution which said that no change should be made in it for twelve years, called a convention and amended it before that time, not in the method pointed out in the constitution. It has been thus construed in Indiana; it has been thus construed in Maryland; it has been thus construed in Delaware; it has been thus construed in Pennsylvania; in New York, and in various other States. Now, with this known construction, with this known application, it was incorporated into the bill of rights in the State of Kansas; and what truer, more unanswerable rule is there than this: that when a law has been received with a certain known approved construction uniformly, if another community adopt the same law, they are held to adopt the same construction? Hence, I say, they adopted it with that known application.

But I have two other reasons to present to the Senator. He says it is a revolutionary right. I do not care what you call it:

“That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.”

Call it revolution, if you please. It is a civil means in conformity with the declaration of the Constitution by which the people may reform, alter, amend, or abolish their constitution. I care nothing about the name. He says it is a revolution by the sword. I say it is not that, but a legal change through the agency of the ballot-box. First, this provision is found in all our State constitutions. They are all republican, because they could not be in the Union without being republican. Second, the Constitution says that the Federal Government shall protect each State from domestic violence. It is bound to do it. Suppose the Senator from Illinois should undertake to put his construction into effect, and say it is a right to draw the sword to revolutionize the Government: it would be domestic violence, and the Federal Government would have to crush it on the instant. Therefore it proves that it cannot be understood as implying a resort to the sword to revolutionize a State government. That construction, therefore, is excluded.

Finally, when a constitution makes two provisions on the same subject, it is the duty of both the judge and the statesman to give a construction to both clauses that will give force and effect to each if it be possible; and if not, if they be so repugnant that they cannot stand together, one or the other must give way. Now, a reasonable construction can be given to both of these clauses which will enable both to stand and have vitality, force, and effect. I explained this before, but I passed over it so hastily that perhaps I shall be excused for repeating the same idea again. The constitution says, after the year 1864, the Legislature, by a two-thirds vote, may proceed to amend the constitution. The constitution also says that the people at all times have the right to amend their constitution. How shall you construe the two clauses so as to allow the people at all times to have the power to amend it? I answer; if the government takes the initiative, if the government of its own volition—I mean the governing power, the Legislature—undertakes to amend the constitution, they can only do it in the way pointed out in the constitution, because their power is derived from the constitution; and if a certain method be specified and pointed out for their action, it prohibits the government, the governing officers, the Governor, and Legislature, or otherwise, just according as the amending power may be vested for the time being, from pursuing any other method. Now, the governing power is limited to the mode pointed out. The people are not limited, and cannot be limited. How can you get them together? I answer, just as they always do get together. They instruct their Legislature to provide a rule of uniform action to enable them legally to come together. It may be called revolution if you choose, but when the people come together en masse, or by representatives under the sanction of law, they are in the exercise of their original rights untrammelled by constitutions, unrestrained by any provisions in their old constitution. They can do just as they please, consistent with private rights. This is the construction that is to be placed upon the two provisions.

If you say otherwise, that will bring you in conflict with the honorable Senator from Michigan. It amounts just to this: if they may be tied up and prohibited from amending their constitution until the year 1864, they can be until 1865, 1866, 1870, and seventy times seventy. The principle is the same; and yet the Senator from Michigan says the people will never submit to the doctrine that they shall not govern themselves. If they will not, they must retain the power of amending their constitutions in a legal, orderly method. Otherwise, a preceding generation governs them. Otherwise, the people may be restrained from changing their constitution for as long as they live, which is a doctrine repugnant to the genius of our institutions. There is no question about this fact that this is the received and known construction, that it has been followed out time and time again.

I believe, with others, that constitutions ought not to be changed too frequently; that they ought not to be twisted and turned to suit the emergency of any particular occasion; that they ought to have stability and uniformity, and be continued long enough to command veneration. If our Federal Constitution had been changed every year, there would be but little veneration for it. If our State constitutions were changed every few years, there would be but little respect for them. I desire, therefore, to see stability, uniformity, and every constitution kept in existence long enough to command the entire respect of the people. If they see the blunders and errors, they can suggest a remedy without endangering its other better parts. They can resort to legal means, call a convention, and mold and make a new constitution. What I mean by legal means is, to devise a rule which shall make the action uniform, equal, and just; just as the convention law in Kansas was; just as the convention laws in all the States of this Union are and have been. It is simply to prescribe a rule by the existing Government, at the instance of the people by which they may come together, in person or by representatives, and exercise an original power in the reformation of their government.

I shall now leave the subject. I have shown that this is a legal constitution, fairly adopted; that the allegations of fraud made against it are unsupported; and that there is no well-sustained allegation of fraud against any single proceeding affecting the validity of this constitution. I have also endeavored to show that it is a very important question, vital to the interests of the whole Union, vital to the Democratic party, vital to the South. I would not appeal to “Americans” to build up the Democratic party, but I would appeal to them not to assist in building up the only party dangerous to the integrity of the institutions of our country. I would appeal to them, if they cannot be of us, at least help us to break down the common enemy of us both.

MR. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, I do not intend to reopen this debate by any general reply to the honorable Senator who has just taken his seat. The usual course of debate here would forbid that; but I desire to answer the appeal which he made to me at the close of his remarks, and I shall endeavor to confine myself to that.

The Senator says that in the argument which I addressed to the Senate some days ago, I contended that there had been fraud in the formation of this constitution, and that the only proof which I offered of it was the opinions of Governor Walker and of Secretary Stanton—that I relied on their evidence alone to prove the fraud. I am sure that upon the least reflection the honorable Senator will find that in this he has done my argument at least great injustice. That is not the only evidence I referred to, by any means. It was a general sort of proof derived from high and authoritative sources, witnesses that neither the Administration nor the members here supporting the Administration would object to. They were the men chosen out of all the world but a few months ago to represent the authority of the Government, and act for it in this Territory. The act of the Government gives them credit with me and with all the world; and so far as I know, they were well entitled to it, and have done nothing to detract from or diminish it. I cite them therefore as witnesses present on the spot engaged in the official transactions of the Territory, holding intercourse constantly with the people, learning there on the spot its true history from the mouths of thousands of witnesses. I think I may appeal to them as respectable witnesses on such a point. They, being public officers, communicated to their Government—and they were bound to communicate to it the truth—the fact that this constitution had been got up and made in fraud. That is the substance of all they say; and not only that, but against the will of an overwhelming majority of the people. I did rely upon this; but this was not all the testimony I presented, by any means. What does the gentleman say to the election on the 4th of January last, when ten thousand voted against this constitution? That is evidence of record, high as any which the gentleman adduces to the contrary. Is not that an evidence that this instrument was fraudulent?

Look again at the resolutions of the Legislature of the Territory, passed during the present winter, denouncing this constitution as an unfair piece of trickery; as an attempt to impose upon them a government against their will. I alluded to that. Is not that evidence? I alluded to what is reported and shown by one member of the Committee on Territories, to whom all this subject was long ago referred, who states that the most glaring frauds were committed in the election, who sets down particular precincts in which the frauds were committed; and there is the testimony of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President of the Council, affirming, upon their own knowledge, that the three famous precincts of Shawnee, Kickapoo, and Oxford, did not contain anything like the number of voters whose ballots were cast at that election. Is not this evidence of fraud?

Here is an investigation conducted by a committee of the Legislature, held openly, a court for the examination of witnesses examined under oath, and they proved the frauds to be more great and more enormous than either Mr. Walker or Mr. Stanton had suggested, and more extensive and more outrageous than the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Council had certified to be their opinion upon this subject. What they gave as matter of opinion has been converted into fact and sustained by actual proof and examination.

These are the evidences upon which I relied; and, further, I relied upon this constitution, standing in connection with and being contaminated with the frauds that had been committed all around and about it, to show that it was a scene of fraud of a minority government, seeking by trick and contrivance to maintain a supremacy over a majority of the people. Sir, is the right of self-government to be here denied to them? These were the proofs on which I relied, and not, as the Senator supposes, on the simple testimony of two gentlemen, though they were the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, giving their opinion on the subject. I relied upon facts which are proved. They have been sufficient to convince my mind; and convincing me of truth, I have endeavored to follow it. That is my guide, so help me God, here, and it shall be my guide forever. I thank my God that he has given me some faculty to distinguish between right and wrong, and I thank Him, moreover, (for the gift would have been worthless if He had not gone further,) that He has given with it the little courage that is necessary to dare to speak it. I have spoken it, and I intend to follow it, and fear nothing in following that path appointed to all men to pursue.

These are my convictions. The Senator regrets, however, that these convictions require me to act on this question with a party that he thinks dangerous and injurious to the country. Mr. President, I told you, when I had the honor of addressing you before, that I belonged to no party that had any great representation here. What I do, if gentlemen will give me credit for candor, I do from my honest convictions and in the endeavor to do justice and follow the truth. I do not act thus to build up one party or to put down another. I have no connection with these parties. I stand here, the independent Senator of my native State of old Kentucky. All that I know on such subjects she has taught me. She has taught me to be just and to be honorable. That is her maxim; and, so help me Heaven, I will endeavor to act up to it.

The question is not between me and the honorable Senator who has just addressed you, who is best supporting a party. I do not seek to support the Democratic party, nor do I seek to support the Republican party. I seek to do what I believe to be the truth and the right before my whole countrymen and for my whole countrymen. I believe that the course I have taken is the best for the South, the best for the North, the best for the whole country, and more than anything else calculated to wipe out those sectional lines and those sectional feelings which dwell so much in the hearts of men and are so dangerous to our Union and our Government. I believe that I serve the North and the South and the whole country best by the course I pursue, or I should not pursue it.

I have seen it already stated that I announced myself in express terms as now taking my part with the northern Democracy. Gentlemen will all bear me witness that I said no such thing. I do not remember half what I said, and I have never read what I did say since it has been published; but I know I never said that, because I know I never thought it, and I very seldom say what I do not think. If such words could possibly have escaped between my heart and my lips, they could never have come from the heart or from the understanding, and I here take the earliest opportunity of disclaiming them. But, sir, I never used them. I took a different position—one that I thought befitted better a man of my age and the representative of old Kentucky.

The Senator says that I have supposed always in my argument that the constitution does not embody the sense of the people of Kansas. I certainly have supposed so; and the evidences on which I relied are too much in the knowledge, and too fresh in the recollection of the Senate, to require any repetition. I believe it is against the sentiments of a large and overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas. I do not undertake to justify the action of the people of Kansas who are opposed to this constitution. In times past, they have acted in a very disorderly and reprehensible manner, seeming to be regardless of the peace of the country and of the laws of the country, and anxious only for the pursuit and accomplishment of their own purposes. I think they could have borne longer, and they could have borne more, if they were oppressed to the whole extent that they say they were. For the boon of liberty and free government we must expect to pay a heavy price, and they ought to have been ready to pay their part, by bearing temporary evils for the sake of imperishable and lasting principles. I agree further with my honorable friend from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] that if the pro-slavery men there had fallen, as they might have done, into the same predicament, "they would have borne longer and more before they would have resorted to means tending so much to rebellion and to war." I believe so, and I should have hoped, but for the knowledge of the contrary that has been brought home to us, that the opponents of the Lecompton constitution in Kansas would have borne more and longer, until a time should come when a returning sense of justice on the part of the Government, or an opportunity to assert their rights, might have restored them to them, unfettered by any act of rebellion on their part. This great Government is such a sheltering place, and such a glory to our country, that they ought not to have endangered it, or one of its principles, or an hour of its peace, by the course they pursued. But still, sir, they are a political community, and I would not, for their offenses, break down the principle of self-government. Such examples of intrusion upon, and infractions of, great principles, are always made upon occasions when some bad case has excited the public indignation. It is under such excitement that encroachments are made. These persons did act in such a way as to offend, to a great extent, the people of a certain portion of this country, myself among them, by their want of constitutional and of legal submission, and temper to bear what they suffered a little longer, in the assurance of the rescue and the remedy which was ultimately to come in this Government. I will not, however, because of that, trespass a single hair's breadth on their political rights as a political community and citizens of this country. I will preserve those rights sacredly, because adherence to principle is the great remedy for these temporary evils and effervescences whenever they may occur. They are like little eruptions on the human body; they will pass away if you preserve the general health. So will these political evils pass away if you preserve untouched, and as a sacred rule to be continually and faithfully followed, the principles and the Constitution of your country—the principles of liberty, and that supreme law which our fathers laid down to us in the form of a Constitution. That is my view of this subject.

The evidences seem to me to be complete, that this constitution is not according to the will of the majority of the people of Kansas. In connection with this point, I said that if we even doubted as to this question, inasmuch as the constitution upon which we are called now to put our sanction is to be permanent in its character—a permanent law for the people of a State—let us be sure that it is in accordance with the will of the people. When the inhabitants of Territories have come here heretofore, asking for admission into the Union, they have come with unequivocal evidence of a universal assent. They might differ about other things, but they all wanted to become a State. This is the first instance, that I know of, where doubts have attended a constitution as to whether it is the will of the people or not. Is not that a question well worthy of inquiry, when we are giving our sanction to a constitution—a constitution, too, which even restricts the people themselves from changing it, except in the mode appointed and prescribed in the constitution? One part of the people come here and protest against it, and another part of the people come here and insist upon it; the one urging that it is the will of the people as obtained in an authentic form through the ballot-box, and the other urging that there was fraud in the ballot-box, that they could not vote because test oaths were required, which those who applied them knew must exclude them from the polls. All these parties are all now before us. We are the great paternal tribunal to do justice—not merely the justice that is administered according to legal forms and legal solemnities, but justice in its broad, political sense. Would it be anything but paternal in us now to say, "Fellow-citizens, you have got all that into that Territory by yourselves, and you have got into dangerous and destructive feuds, putting at hazard the peace of the country; you are in dispute as to whether this constitution is the will of the people; go home with it, put it to a vote of all the people, and we shall perhaps, on a second trial, see what we are not now so fully informed of?"

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he understands that there was any test oath required for voting on the 21st of December?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir; I know there was.

Mr. POLK. Or was there on the 15th of June, when delegates were elected to the constitutional convention? Do you understand that there was any test oath at that election?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I am speaking of one at which there was a test oath—the election on the constitution. It was an oath to support the constitution—a test oath to be taken before the vote was received.

Mr. POLK. Was there any test oath required in the election for the constitution?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. POLK. What was the test oath?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The test was that they should swear to support the constitution as it might be adopted, before they were allowed to vote upon it.

Mr. POLK. If adopted.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Swear to support the constitution just as I have said.

Mr. POLK. I should like to know exactly what is the test oath to which the Senator from Kentucky referred?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will read it to the gentleman, for his more precise information:

"Any person offering to vote at the aforesaid election, upon the said constitution, shall, if challenged, take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution, under the penalty of perjury under the territorial laws."

Mr. POLK. I want to know if that is the test oath to which the Senator referred, and which he considered objectionable?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I cannot tell what the gentleman wants. That is the test oath I alluded to.

Mr. POLK. I suppose the Senator is not offended?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Not at all.

Mr. POLK. I wished to ask him what was the test oath he referred to, and I certainly did it with respect.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly, I so understood; and I intended to answer the gentleman respectfully. Well, sir, I asked on this subject, in my argument, if it was not competent for Congress to send this constitution back, and have another election now, to ascertain and make certain whether this was the will of the majority; and I said that it would be competent for Congress to send it back and back again. I spoke simply of the power of Congress. They have that power unquestionably. Nobody will deny that; but shall they do it? That depends altogether on the circumstances of the case, and the ground there may be for a reasonable doubt on the subject. The power is within the competency of Congress. Whether they will exercise it or not in this or that case, is a mere question of expediency depending on circumstances. I think this a proper case for it, and I said so—not for sending it back, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. GREEN] says, time and time again, and crying slips, as he did at school, and trying it over. I spoke of this as a thing that might be done;

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Mallory.

SENATE.

which it was within the power of Congress to do; and when I speak of Congress, I always speak in the sense that they shall exercise their powers with prudence and discretion. The Senator laughs at this idea of sending it back. Why, sir, if it is of any importance to us to know the will of the people, if we desire that the will of the people shall be the rule of the government of the people, is it not a matter of importance, if it is left in doubt by any proceedings that have taken place, to repeat those proceedings until we are assured of the public will, and then make that public will the basis of our action? This is the right of the people to govern themselves, and by that I stand. There is no question of slavery involved here, as I understand this case. That as to Kansas is a settled question.

The Senator from Missouri is surprised at my feelings. He says that I am loyal, and intimates that I have had bad schooling. Mr. President, I know my defects, and can hear them spoken of without the least degree of offense or resentment. The Senator is wrong in attributing it to the school in which I have been brought up. Sir, I have been brought up in the best of schools, and if my education is still defective, it is on account of some defect in me, and not in the school. The gentleman is a young man, and a young Senator. I hope and I wish for him a long life of public usefulness. He may have learned much more than I have done, and if so, it only shows the superiority of his capacity to learn, for I am sure he has not been in a better school. Sir, this is the school in which I was taught. I took lessons here when this was a very great body indeed—I will make no comparisons of what it is now, or was then, or at any other time; but I learned from your Clays and your Websters, your Calhouns and your Prestons, your Bentons and your Wrights, and such men. I am a scholar, I know, not likely to do much credit to the school in which I was taught, and it is of very little consequence to the world, or to the public, whether I have learned well or ill. It will soon be of no importance to this country, or to anybody. But the gentleman has a long life before him, and I trust in God it may be full of usefulness and full of honor—full of usefulness to his country, and that deserved reward to himself which an intelligent people is always sure to give for fidelity and usefulness. I take not any offense at any of the allusions that he has made to my argument. His remarks were rather marked with kindness, for which I thank him. He ought to know that I have done nothing for the purpose of offending one party or upholding another. I think I have a right to be understood on that point—that my action is an independent one, and that I belong to none of these great political organizations. I am of the American party, and I embrace their principles of reforming the ballot-box by a change of the naturalization laws. That is what I am for, and therein I am an American. By their colors I stand, and I act upon their principles here. Their great object is to purify your ballot-box, by preventing foreigners who have just arrived on your shores, from participating in this privilege, and putting their votes in with mine, with the natives of my country, with our naturalized fellow-citizens, who have as deep an interest in this Government as I have. I am in favor of changing the naturalization laws, not at all in hostility or unkind feeling towards foreigners, but because I wish to preserve, pure and untarnished, that crown and scepter which I can never trust so confidently as when held by American hands. Their principle is to protect the ballot-box, and I go for it here. Upon the same principle that I would protect it against foreigners who had no right to vote, I will protect it against anybody who undertakes to stuff it, or to put frauds into it, or to take frauds out of it. I am for protecting the ballot-box; and that is the principle on which I act here. The ballot-box is the only instrument by which the people can exercise that much talked of sovereignty that belongs to them. How else are they to exercise it? That is all nothing; it is mere words; it is mere mouthful of garbage that is uttered continually; they are like grains of powder put down a yard apart all over the country. If the people are to exercise their right of sovereignty in their own proper persons, they cannot do it. There must be a concentration of it in the ballot-box. The ballot-box is the crown and the scepter of that sovereignty which the people possess. I wish to protect that sovereignty; I wish to uphold and maintain it sacredly; and I act upon the principles of the American party, when I stand here to give my vote against what I consider a great outrage on the purity of the ballot-box.

Mr. President, I have occupied more of your time than I intended. I know that, by the courtesy of the Senate, the gentleman who introduced this measure had a right to conclude the debate, but I have felt myself called upon to explain the remarks which he had misunderstood as to the grounds of the argument.

Mr. GREEN. I do not design to make any rejoinder to the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I do not believe we misunderstand each other much. His remarks are just such as cannot possibly ruffle my feelings in the least.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. They were not so intended at all, sir.

Mr. GREEN. They are couched in terms of respect, as I intended to speak of him. I agree with him entirely, that the ballot-box, and the ballot-box only, is the way to ascertain the people's will, and not through Governors who do not make use of the ballot-box, but merely make a statement on the ground that they have traveled through the country and know something about it.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. S. R. MALLORY, OF FLORIDA,

IN THE SENATE, March 16, 1858.

[REVISED BY HIMSELF.*]

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the bill to admit the State of Kansas into the Union:

Mr. MALLORY said:

I do not suppose, Mr. President, after the exhibition we have just witnessed, in which the history of Federalism, the Hartford convention, and "modern Democracy," are so singularly mixed up with "border ruffianism" and the history of Kansas, that any effort on this side of the Chamber, without the aid of a revelation from Heaven itself, could produce the slightest impression on the mind of the gentleman who has just spoken, [Mr. KING,] or those who think with him upon the subject before us.

If apology were needed for occupying the time of the Senate upon so trite a subject, when speaking must be so barren of results here, it may be found in the fact that, from the introduction of the Kansas-Nebraska measure to the present time, neither upon that, nor upon any of the measures flowing from it, have I addressed this body. Nor, sir, would I do so now, but that some little pains have been taken to misrepresent my views upon this subject to friends in my own State, for whose generous support and unfailing confidence I shall ever feel deeply grateful.

Mr. President, it was my intention, after having heard the speech of the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] on this question, to have reviewed, briefly at least, what I considered a most extraordinary production; but during my absence from this body, I find that it has been done so ably and so thoroughly by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] that any effort of mine would but weaken the effect of what they have said, or mar its beauty; but I must be permitted to remark, that if I were called upon to designate the speech I have heard since I have occupied a seat on this floor, which was most calculated to awaken and to cherish sectional excitement, and to produce discord throughout this Confederacy, I should have to point to this speech of the honorable Senator from New York. If it was not expressly and cunningly designed to produce these results, it is exceedingly well calculated for it. It is not a broad, candid, comprehensive, statement of facts, argued out to their legitimate conclusions and logical deductions without regard to where they may lead; but it is a cunning scheme of fact and error—a web skillfully devised to bolster up the policy of the Senator and his party as to "bleeding Kansas."

But, sir, the feature which struck me as most offensive, in listening to the honorable Senator, was the cold and unpromising future of the whole production, the want of light and life throughout. It came over my senses like cold northern blasts, telling of an icy origin. Like a treacherous guide, it takes us over a barren waste, and after pointing out all the horrors of the road, leaves us without a ray of light to govern our future steps.

His labored recital of historical events, his rhetorical figures, the ornate costume of his ideas, and his epigrammatic sentences, conduct us to the subjugation of the southern States; and he tells us, in effect, that if we submit to our fate gracefully, our death may be without terrors; but submission or not, die we must!

Sir, I speak with respect, personally, of the Senator from New York, for I have no reason to speak of him otherwise, but in my judgment his extraordinary speech is not a work of statesmanship, but approaches the confines of special pleading; and I may freely say of it, that whatever there be in it which is true, is not new; and whatever it contains which is new, is not true. The Senator's political vision is limited by a geographical line, and he speaks, not to his country, but to his party. With these brief remarks I will leave it.

I expect, Mr. President, in the few remarks I shall make, to confine myself to the question before the Senate. The 23d day of January, 1854, inaugurated a period of political excitement throughout a large portion of our Confederacy, which, still progressing undetermined, has thus far been characterized by such bitterness, such a spirit of rancor towards the southern States of the Confederacy, as, in the judgment of judicious men everywhere, is not only destroying the bonds of our social, but is having an immediate tendency to destroy the bonds of our political Union. On that day the obliteration of the Missouri compromise line, so called, was made a feature of the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

A great national wrong had been done to the southern portion of this Confederacy by the act admitting Missouri into the Union, in 1820, the eighth section of which provided for the prohibition of involuntary servitude, except for crime; or, in other words, the exclusion of southern slavery from all that portion of the territory acquired by our treaty with France in 1803, which lay north of 36° 30'.

And now, when we were called upon to form governments for a portion of this territory, and the South's participation was demanded, she insisted, as a recognition of her political equality, upon the repeal of a measure, the unconstitutionality and injustice of which time had made as apparent to her judgment as it was offensive to her pride.

Standing where she has ever stood, and where I trust she will always be found, by the Constitution, she demanded nothing from the fraternal feeling, from the forbearance of her sister States; but she did demand, as a recognition of the political equality of the States, the right to go with her property into the common domain of the Confederacy. Upon this demand we went before the country; and, after a heated and excited contest, the offensive statute was wiped from the statute-book.

This was followed by such a political storm throughout the non-slaveholding States, as none but a Government, resting upon the enlightened judgment of a free people, can ever withstand.

Under the guidance of leaders, in many instances as reckless and ambitious as they were able, every element of political discord and sectional strife was invoked and brought into prurient activity; and while the bench, the bar, the hustings, and the press, entered upon one wide crusade against the people of the southern States, the pulpit, no less impious than the rest, invoked upon them the curses and denunciations of Heaven itself. But, sir, the South threw herself into the contest; she knew her rights, and determined to maintain them. She appealed to the enlightened judgment of the American people, and there she found a vindication as unequivocal as it was triumphant—a vindication which has since received the indorsement and support of the highest tribunal in the country.

In addition to the repeal of the eighth section of the Missouri act, the Kansas-Nebraska bill contained a clause which, in my judgment, was as unequivocal as it was totally and absolutely necessary; a clause which has been facetiously termed a "stump speech injected into a bill," declaring that it was "the true and bona fide intent and meaning of the bill not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom; but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." Though perfectly unnecessary at the time, it may perhaps aid us in interpreting the whole measure.

Under this great enabling act, (for it was nothing more than an enabling act authorizing the people of Kansas and Nebraska to form their State governments,) the people of Kansas did enter upon the formation of a State government, following the legitimate precedents of their country.

They elected their Territorial Legislature and Delegate to Congress on the 29th of November, 1854; and in 1855 this Legislature passed an act "for taking the sense of the people of the Territory upon the expediency of calling a convention to form a State constitution," at the general election to be held in October, 1856.

The sense of the people was then taken, and it was in favor of calling a convention.

In obedience to this indication of the will of the people, the Territorial Legislature passed an act on the 27th of February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates on the third Monday of June, to form a State constitution; and under this act, which was singularly fair and just, providing, as it did, for the registration of every legal voter within the Territory, for the purpose of excluding outside influence, members of the convention were elected, and nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one qualified voters were registered.

In conformity to the provisions of this act, the delegates to form a State constitution were legally elected in June, 1857. They assembled at Leecompton, and proceeded legitimately to perform the duty for which they had assembled—the formation of a State constitution—terminated their labors, and adjourned on the 7th of November, 1857.

The honorable Senator from New York, who has addressed the Senate, [Mr. KING,] has chosen to say that every one of those acts which I have recited is characterized by illegality. I deny it in toto. I affirm—and I have no doubt whatever that it will be sustained by the voice of the American people—that neither one of those acts is tainted with illegality. That there may have been illegal voting, I will not deny; but that the acts of the bona fide voters and the results of these elections are to be affected by the illegality of others, I deny.

The convention, justly regarding the question of slavery as the lion in the path of the progress of Kansas, as the question which had created all the difficulty, turmoil, and civil war in the Territory, provided—though I by no means acknowledge that the convention was bound to do so—for its submission to the popular vote; and, on the day prescribed by the convention, it was submitted to the people of Kansas, who, by their popular vote, did decide in favor of the constitution with the slavery clause.

The constitution, thus framed, provided for a general election on the first Monday of January, 1858, which has been held, and at which a Governor, members of the Legislature and other State officers, and a member of Congress, were elected—the popular vote thus recognizing the new constitution to this extent, being, as I learn, from unofficial accounts, about thirteen thousand.

I have thus traced, step by step, the action of the people of Kansas, her true and law-abiding people, in the formation of their State constitution, from the passage of the Kansas bill to the present moment, when we are informed by the President of the United States that he has received from the presiding officer of her convention a copy of her constitution, and that she stands at our doors asking admission to the Union. In doing so, I have chosen to ignore and utterly to disregard the assemblage at Topeka, and the existence of the so-called Topeka constitution.

The individuals who met there, not only without authority from this Government, but in open hostility, no more represented the people of Kansas, and no more possessed the right to speak for or to bind them by their acts, than the lawless mobs who, of late years, have, in some of our leading cities, set all law at defiance, to represent or speak for the loyal citizens thereof.

If the proceedings which I have briefly sketched, resulting in the formation of the Leecompton constitution, were legal, to say that those of the Topeka gathering were illegal and utterly void, is to characterize them by the mildest of terms.

I have equally ignored all alleged violations of election laws and acts of border ruffianism, from whatever quarter proceeding. No great political change, under popular forms of government, will, probably, ever be perfected without similar violations of law to some extent; and if the lawful acts of the legal people were thereby to be annulled, anarchy would necessarily be the result.

Destitute as we are of the power of punishing violations of election laws in Kansas directly, we should not resort to an indirect mode of correcting them, and, especially, to the injury of the people of Kansas. Frauds, crimes, doubtless were committed by both parties; but the lawful acts of those who steadily and rightly pursued the path of duty to the formation of the State constitution, are not to be thereby defeated.

Mr. President, it is admitted that these proceedings of the people of Kansas were pursued in conformity with law, and by authority conferred by the Kansas-Nebraska act originally; and it is admitted that the constitution they present to us is republican. Why, then, should it be rejected?

Sir, the evils which must, in my judgment, inevitably flow from such rejection, may present themselves to my mind in an exaggerated form and character. I may misconceive the times; I may misapprehend the temper of the people to whose sense of right such rejection would be an outrage; I may magnify the feeling of deep but silent scorn and indignation with which they now view this whole programme of opposition; and I may miscalculate the means to which they may resort to right the wrong which it contemplates; but if I do not, then is the rejection of Kansas fraught with evils which it will require all of human wisdom under the providence of God to avert.

Sir, we are told that in this contest the South is pursuing an abstraction; that the majority of the people of Kansas are in favor of the exclusion of slavery, and that, having the power, they will adopt immediate measures to change the constitution in this respect on their admission to the Union.

This may or may not be so; it does not lessen the importance of the question before us; for we cannot ignore the great central fact that the war cry raised against the life of the South, is, "no more slave States to be admitted to the Union;" that under this shibboleth inscribed upon their banner, her enemies in hosts are rallying, and that their ability to maintain it is here this day being practically tested; and that, if Kansas shall be rejected, it will be because of the slavery clause in her constitution.

This, sir, is the point which infuses life and light and soul into the issue before us.

Our opponents on this measure, invigorated by the temporary alliance of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] have assailed, and are assailing, the unanswerable arguments, as I conceive, of the Executive, with equal ingenuity and power; but if one were to rise amongst them, and speak with the lips of an angel, the South has too much at stake not to see the utter want of truth and justice of this opposition, not to feel that similar pretexts will ever be found when similar occasions shall demand them.

Sir, the vital principle of the Kansas bill, carefully considered by some of the purest and best men from every section of the country, and some of the prominent men of its leading political parties, too, was brought forward by the honorable Senator from Illinois, to whom it had been intrusted as chairman of the Committee on Territories; and throughout the three years' war with which its enemies have so bitterly assailed it, so nobly and firmly has he stood forth as its champion, under all circumstances, at all times, and in all places, sustaining its right, wisdom, and justice, that he has been popularly regarded as its sole and exclusive author. So well had he borne himself in this intellectual fight, that he had carved out for himself a place in the hearts of his countrymen rarely accorded to a living public man.

In this position he was nobly sustained by the united South, and by nearly every national Democrat in both Houses of Congress. He was sustained by the people in their primary and larger conventions, in their Legislatures, and finally by the supreme judicial tribunal of the country itself. Thus proudly did he stand then; but now, when the battle has been fought and won, and the fruits of victory only await our grasp; now, that Kansas is knocking at our doors, and, by clothing her with the robes of State sovereignty, we may localize the question of slavery, and enable her to still the voice of discord within her borders, we see the honorable Senator, not only withdrawing himself from his old companions in arms, but, with a bitterness hitherto unlooked for, opposing them in gaining the legitimate fruits of their common labors. In this extraordinary attitude, we see him surrounded by strange allies; the leaders of those with whom hitherto he has fought hand to hand in every phase of the fight; the leaders of those who have been the unrelenting enemies of the Kansas-Nebraska bill and himself; and who, failing in every agency of human evil, have invoked upon both the curse of Heaven itself. These are the allies with whom he is now cheered in his opposition to his tried friends. I trust the honorable Senator from Illinois will understand that, in reciting these facts, showing his position in this case, I do it in all kindness to himself, personally. My past relations to him it is unnecessary to allude to to show this.

An attitude so extraordinary has only been assumed on the most conscientious convictions of right, though we are all liable to error; and his position, therefore, will not be readily surrendered. His efforts to justify and sustain it are worthy of his fame; but depend upon it, sir, that like a strong man struggling in a morass, every effort he may make must but more distinctly disclose the unstable ground on which he stands.

Mr. President, our opponents upon this measure may succeed, or they may fail; Kansas may be admitted with her Leecompton constitution, and every element of her legitimate prosperity may be developed; or she may be rejected, and discord and civil war may continue, just as the wisdom and prudence, or the vice and folly of her people may control her counsels; but whether we admit her, or whether we do not, whatever may be the results of our proceedings here, if I am right in my conclusions of the policy which govern the Opposition, there will be but one course for the South.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me, as an act of kindness to himself, to say that his speech is a very interesting one, and I am listening to him with great pleasure; but I am sure he speaks so low that he is not doing justice to himself. If he will raise his voice a little louder, he will be heard more distinctly across the Chamber.

Mr. MALLORY. I thank you, sir. I cannot expect to overcome any noise that may be made in the Chamber, but I will endeavor to make myself heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) The Chair will endeavor to preserve as good order as can be maintained in the Chamber; and he submits to Senators that it is important, on account of the evident condition of the health of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. MALLORY. I was going on to observe that whatever may be the effect of our efforts here, from this vexed question of Kansas, the South, looking boldly out on the dangers which expand before her, surveying with calm resolve her darkening political skies, will, in my judgment, take a new departure; warned, nerved, invigorated, saddened, perhaps, but unimpaired by the past.

She cannot ignore the fact that her enemies are gathering in strength around her; every day shows it; and whether the war-cry against her life be uttered by some wretched village fanatic, whose insane ravings and mad ambition rise no higher than to induce the slave to cut the master's throat, or whether it be uttered by some higher intellect here, in large and philosophic phrase, who, with the Union upon his lips, but with treason to its best interests festering in his heart, predicts the coming dawn, which shall rise upon the last footprint of African slavery upon this continent—whether the war-cry be uttered by the one or the other, it is opposition to her that forms their common bond of union. Nor, sir, let her any longer underrate the strength of her enemies. I have before me some notes, as brief as they are instructive. I refer to a well-known book, recently published, in which political facts are collected. In speaking of the anti-slavery party, the author says:

"It first made its appearance in national politics in the presidential contest of 1840, when its ticket, with James G. Birney, of Michigan, as its candidate for the Presidency, and Francis J. Lomoyne, of Pennsylvania, as its vice-presidential candidate, polled 7,000 votes. In 1844, with Mr. Birney again as its candidate, it polled 63,140 votes. In 1848, when Martin Van Buren as the presidential candidate of the Buffalo convention, and Gerrit Smith as that of the more ultra anti-slavery men, it polled 286,233 votes. In 1852, with John P. Hale as its nominee for the Presidency, it polled 157,296 votes. In 1855, with John C. Fremont as its presidential candidate, it polled 1,341,812 votes."—Cluskey's Political Text Book, p. 1.

With these facts before us, I do not pretend to ignore the coming fate of the South. I do not pretend any disguise on the subject. Can you doubt, sir, that you are yet to see one of this sectional party in that chair; this Government administered by its behests, and the South in a doomed minority, still appealing to the Constitution? No man here can doubt it; and it is useless to close our eyes to coming events. One by one the gallant and patriotic band of northern men, who, valuing the Union beyond the behests and commands of party, struggling here, struggling everywhere, to maintain the rights of their whole country, have been crushed out; and here, in this forum of equal States, we are yet to see the Constitution interpreted by that dreaded antagonism which is founded upon geographical distinctions alone.

The constitutional rights of the South, Mr. President, never have depended, and I trust they never will depend, on an equality of slave and free States in this Confederacy. If they depend on such an equality their rights are gone now, for that day has passed. This political equality cannot be maintained. It can neither be maintained by expansion, by acquisition, nor by division of territory; for these are resources equally open to both parties. Had the South, in days gone by, been united on the expediency of acquiring Cuba, and, when the apple was ripe, plucked it, and made it a southern State—nay, sir, were she to adopt a wise policy now, and resolve to take it, and talk about it afterwards—friendly and contiguous Canada, fast gravitating towards the North, would come in to re-establish northern political supremacy. Therefore, in my judgment, we must look inevitably to a preponderance of free States in this Confederacy. If I believed the rights of the South were dependent upon an equilibrium of free and slave States, I would use every human effort of which I am capable to induce the South to go out of the Union to-morrow. It were worse than folly, it would be the basest of crimes, to postpone to a distant day of comparative weakness, the correction of approaching evils, which, in our hour of strength, we may readily avert.

Much has been said by the Senator from New York, in his remarkable address, about the white man's occupying this continent, and on the doctrine of expansion; but I did expect to hear a gentleman, who is evidently a statesman, in this rhetorical, epigrammatic production of his, define under what circumstances the white man is to occupy this continent. My friend from Virginia, I find on reading his speech, has referred to this part of the address of the Senator from New York, and leaves me but little to say; but on this doctrine of expansion let me remark, that the hour has come when judicious minds begin to doubt the propriety, the wisdom of the expansion, on this continent, of our Government; when judicious minds begin to doubt the applicability of our system of government to a widely expanded territory.

Sir, the surface of our territory now is more than double that of Great Britain, France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Turkey in Europe, Poland, Prussia, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, whose united population exceed two hundred and fifty millions.

The child is now living, who is to see, according to the present ratio of increase, a population of two hundred millions upon our present domain; and when our distant States shall become as populous to the square mile, as Belgium, Prussia, or France, our form of government will receive a test to which we may all look with doubt and apprehension.

With a population sparsely spread over a wide extent of domain of unsurpassed fertility and wealth, a population ignorant of want, with a competency within the reach of ordinary industry and frugality, with a population of voters identified with the soil, and governing by the ballot-box the land which they till with their hands, our system of government has reflected greater blessings upon the people than has any other devised by the wisdom of man.

But, sir, with expansion and its concomitant evils of poverty, pauperism, and vice—with a large minority of voters in every populous State raising, periodically, the cry of "bread or blood"—the ballot-box, hitherto the safeguard of our liberties, may become, in the hands of ambition, a tremendous engine of oppression. We may already point to San Francisco, governed by a vigilance committee; Utah, ruled by a priestly despotism; Kansas controlled at the bayonet's point; and our large cities, in the hands of lawless mobs, who go unwhipped of justice, as some faint indications of the blessings of expansion.

But, sir, I will not pursue this topic further, suggestive as it is of replies to the honorable Senator's theories.

Thank Heaven, the South possesses the conservative institution of domestic slavery, which relieves her from evils which must necessarily attend a dense population under our form of government.

But, Mr. President, I will not digress on this subject longer; I desire to keep to the point before us, which is the question of the admission of Kansas. I will not go into all the objections, the technical objections, which have been urged by gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber, because I think it will be fair to meet the objections of our friends on this side, and I will treat them as made in all fairness. I understand that the objections of the honorable Senator from Illinois, made in his opening speech immediately after the presentation of the President's annual message, have been surrendered one by one, or tacitly so, and that they are all now to be summed up in this: that the constitution framed at Leecompton was not submitted to the vote of the people, and that it does not reflect the will of the people of Kansas.

Let me ask, sir, who are the people of Kansas? The Senator from New York tells us that the people means the majority. I deny any such doctrine, sir. The only people of Kansas known to us, are the law-abiding inhabitants thereof, who, by the authority and under the guidance of law, have come before us to make their wishes known.

States have made the source of their political power, the elective franchise, dependent upon the payment of taxes, service in the militia, the tenure of freehold estate, or the color of the skin; but they upon whom this power is conferred constitute the people, whether a majority or a minority of the inhabitants. The people are represented in the lower House, but does the majority necessarily rule there? Is not a quorum of the House, a bare majority of its members, sufficient to transact its business—and does not a majority of this quorum control its action? Do not seventeen members of this body determine frequently its gravest measures?

Sir, when we speak of the people of Kansas, we speak of a political body determined by the laws of the land; of a body acting by authority and in conformity with law.

It may be, sir, that the convention which formed the constitution was elected by a minority of the voters of Kansas; but if we go behind the results of the election we shall probably find that those opposed to the convention refused to go to the polls for the express purpose of defeating the action of the law-abiding people of the Territory. Can a body of voters, by thus absenting themselves from the polls, defeat the action of those who choose to exercise their right to vote? Can the inaction of a majority thus defeat the legal action of a minority? Are not elections in every city and State of this Union sometimes determined by minorities? In this case, Governor Walker expressly notified the inhabitants that those who refused to vote, by the universal operation of our system of government, ratified the action of those who should vote.

Sir, the proposition that the convention was not elected by a majority of the inhabitants, and that, therefore, the constitution framed by it is void, cannot be maintained.

In reply to the objection that the constitution should have been submitted to the popular vote, I must say that it is becoming on those who claim this, to show that any necessity existed for such a submission. The people of Kansas did not provide for it through their Legislature; they did not provide for it through their convention; and so far as Congress could, they expressly left it to the people of Kansas to decide for themselves—for they said they should be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution." That was the only limitation. There was nothing there, I apprehend, commanding them to submit their constitution to a vote of the people of Kansas. If, therefore, we are to keep our pledge to the people of Kansas, we cannot interfere with their rights; and it is to me exceedingly strange that those who set up this doctrine that the non-submission of the constitution is fatal to it, cannot produce the authority requiring such submission. The precedents teach us that the people of Kansas have followed in the safe path of custom in refusing to submit their constitution. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. Thomson] has shown this in a close analysis of all the constitutions of the States of this Union; and there are but two constitutions that I know of, formed by the States of this Union, which were submitted by convention. His statement is as follows:

"The constitutions, now in force, of the following named States, were not submitted for ratification to the people, but adopted in convention:

"Vermont adopted her constitution July 4, 1793, in convention at Windsor. (Compiled Statutes of Vermont, page 15.)

"Connecticut, by convention, in 1818. (See Compilation of Statutes of Connecticut, 1834, pages 29 and 43.)

"Delaware, by convention, in 1831. (See acts of 1831, page 49; and Revised Code, page 43.)

"Pennsylvania, by convention, in 1833, with a provision for future amendments to be ratified by the people. (See Purdon's Digest, page 17, section 10.)

"North Carolina adopted her present constitution in 1776, by convention; amendments in 1835.

"South Carolina, in 1790, by convention.

"Georgia, by convention, on the 23d of May, 1798.

"Alabama, in 1819, by convention under enabling act. (See Code of Alabama, page 28, section 5, page 28.)

"Mississippi, by convention, in 1817; and revised in like manner in 1832.

"Tennessee, by convention, in 1796.

"Kentucky, by convention, in 1799.

"Arkansas, by convention, without an enabling act. (See Revised Statutes of Arkansas, pages 17-18.)

"Missouri, by convention, in 1820; and not submitted to the people.

"Illinois, by convention, in 1818; also appears not to have been submitted to the people.

"The following were compelled by statute to submit the constitutions framed by the conventions to the people:

"New York, constitution adopted in 1846. (Section 9, act of 1845, providing for the convention, required its ratification by the people.)

"New Jersey, act of 1844, approved February 23. Section 9 required its submission to the people. It was submitted and ratified in 1844.

"Maryland, formed in 1851, and ratified by the people, in accordance with previous act of Legislature. (See act of 1849, chapter 346, section 8.)

"Virginia, formed in 1851. Act March 13, 1851, required its ratification by the people.

"Indiana, formed in 1851, ratified by the people, as required by the law authorizing the convention. (See Act of 1850, approved January 18, sections 14 and 15.) The sections relative to the exclusion and colonization of negroes was submitted as a distinct proposition. (See Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 72.)

"Wisconsin, 1848. Section nine of schedule required its ratification by the people. (Revised Statutes, 1849.) In April, 1817, the constitution was defeated by over seven thousand majority. (Niles's Register, volume 72, page 114.) A new constitution was then formed, and the State admitted under it May 23, 1848.

"Iowa, formed in 1845. Previous laws of June 10, 1845, (over the veto of the Governor,) and of January 17, 1846, required ratification by the people.

"Ohio, the first constitution, formed under an enabling act of Congress, adopted 25th October, 1802, was not submitted to the people; that of the 10th March, 1807, was submitted to the people and approved by them.

"Louisiana, formed 1852. The constitution was, by previous enactment, required to be submitted, and was ratified by the people.

"Michigan, formed 1850. Act of March 9, 1850, required it to be submitted to the people. (See laws of 1850, No. 78, section 6, on page 65.)

"Maine, formed in 1819, by convention, (page 432 Hickey's Constitution;) amendments submitted to the people 1824, 1837, 1839.

"New Hampshire, formed in 1792. (See Compiled Statutes, page 15.) Approved by the two-third vote of the people, and established by convention September 5, 1792.

"Rhode Island, formed 1842. Ratified by vote of the people, in pursuance of act of the Legislature.

"Massachusetts, formed 1780. Convention adjourned till constitution was ratified by two third vote.

"Texas, formed 1845. Submitted to and ratified by the people.

"The constitutions of the following States were submitted by conventions to the people, without their being required by law to do so:

"Florida, formed in 1838. Territorial act of 1838 (see act of 1838, page 5) did not require the ratification of the constitution by the people. There was no authority of Congress. The convention (see Digest of Laws of Florida, page 9) required ratification by the people.

"California, formed in 1849. Convention required the ratification of the constitution by the people. There was no authority of Congress or legislative act to frame a constitution. (See Statutes of California, page 24, sections 5, 6, and 7.)

But, sir, if this argument really had any strength in it, it comes, perhaps, with less force from the honorable Senator from Illinois than it would from any of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. Anything which the distinguished Senator may say on this subject has peculiar pertinence and significance, because, from first to last, he has been identified with the measure. It will be remembered that, to expedite the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, the Senator from Illinois reported a bill from the Committee on Territories on the 17th of March, 1856, entitled, "A bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union, when they have the requisite population." After providing for a convention, this bill continues, and contains the following clause. It is the third section of the bill reported by the Senator from Illinois:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory on the United States, and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:—

This bill was not immediately acted upon; and on the 25th of June a substitute was introduced by the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] of which he gave due notice. In the twelfth section of this amendment—for the substitute was introduced as an amendment—the precise words of the third section of the bill of the Senator from Illinois were retained, giving the power to the convention to adopt, and to the people of Kansas to ratify, the constitution. Here, then, were two bills before the Senate: one reported by the Senator from Illinois, containing a clause requiring ratification by the people; and the other introduced by the Senator from Georgia, incorporating this identical clause. Subsequently the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] introduced a substitute, ignoring equally the people and the convention, providing for the immediate admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, on the acceptance of certain conditions by her Legislature.

These substitutes, together with the original bill reported by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, the Senator from Illinois, were recommended to that committee; and seven days after this, on the 30th of June, the Senator from Illinois brought forward from the committee a new bill, which, though it embraced many of the provisions of the bill introduced as a substitute by the Senator from Georgia, omitted this very important provision, which his own bill and the substitute itself of the Senator from Georgia had contained. It left out totally the provision requiring the ratification of the constitution by the people of Kansas. In fact, it recognized in that manner, unequivocally, the right of the convention over the whole subject. I think that is a legitimate conclusion. The right of the people to ratify the constitution was therefore abandoned. I say, therefore, that when the opposition comes from him, on the ground that it is a fatal objection to the constitution that it was not submitted to the popular vote, it comes with less force than it would from any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber. His bill contained, instead of the clause before quoted, these words:

"Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:—

This bill passed the Senate, but it will be remembered that it failed in the House of Representatives. In this body, with the clause requiring popular ratification abandoned, after it had been twice reported to the Senate, it received the vote of every Democratic Senator, including the Senator from Illinois.

It was my purpose, Mr. President, to have pursued somewhat the line of argument which has been indicated by the opponents of this measure, connecting itself with the subject of slavery in Kansas; but feeling as I do on that subject, feeling as I did last night when I heard gentlemen going back two hundred years to show the tenure of slave property, as if the opinions of all the judges of England could affect the right to a single slave in any of our States, or induce a master to surrender it, I see the labyrinth of discussion into which gentlemen are led when they touch that subject. I am willing to meet gentlemen on the other side upon the practical workings of the institution in this country; I am willing to take it up as a practical issue, and to show to those who here maintain the controversy that even in their own States, in their own towns, and in their own homesteads, practice belies theory—that the negro there, with all the privileges which their enlarged philanthropy has thrown around him, is in a far more wretched condition than that from which they seek to relieve him in our States.

Of all the false representations and groundless assumptions of the enemies of the domestic slavery of the South, none have afforded a more fruitful theme of denunciation than its alleged debasing and brutalizing influence upon the negro; and such is the systematic perversity with which this falsehood is circulated that there are few communities in the free States in which it does not find believers.

But what are the facts. The slaves of the South are the descendants of the Africans, brought by New England ships and seamen to this country; and a comparison between their condition and that of their African brethren will illustrate, not the brutalizing, but the civilizing and Christianizing effect of southern slavery.

Of no part of Africa—Egypt, Nubia, and the shores of the Mediterranean excepted—does our knowledge extend back beyond the times of the Greeks and Romans. Regarded at that time as too degraded and savage to invite conquest or to excite cupidity, its very name has ever stood as a synonym for the extremes of barbarism and ignorance; and though the enterprising spirit of the last two centuries has sought her shore, a spirit which has penetrated almost every other part of the habitable globe, carrying the germs of civilization to their darkest recesses—the African of to-day is the ignorant and beastly savage that he was three thousand years ago.

While in less than two and a half centuries, the white race has subdued upon this continent the obstacles of savage man and still more savage nature, developed upon it all the elements of temporal happiness, and established the worship of the true God upon a sure foundation, Africa exhibits to-day the brutal vices, the beastly ignorance, and the bloody cruelties which characterized her in the days of the Pharaohs.

The missionaries of the living God have been among them; hundreds of zealous Christians have entered upon this great field of ignorance, idolatry, and cruelty, and sacrificed their lives to a futile attempt to redeem the African, while scarcely an instance can be found of his abandoning one of his savage rites or bloody customs. Their court-yards, houses, streets, and market-places, are still paved with the skulls of prisoners taken in battle, or of slaves sacrificed at their feasts or their funerals. Wives and subjects are still offered as a bloody sacrifice or buried alive with deceased chiefs, husbands, or masters—not by scores at a time only, but by thousands.

British benevolence for fifty years has vainly sought to Christianize the African, who, in defiance alike of precept and example, always relapses into idolatry, whatever may be his professions of faith.

Sunk to the lowest conceivable grade of human brutality, exhibiting, indeed, traits less akin to human affections than do many of the beasts of their forests, there is no exception to the barbarous and idolatrous pall which rests upon pagan Africa, from which civilization can awaken the first throb of sympathy.

Without an alphabet, hieroglyphic, picture, or symbol, to convey or perpetuate thought; without customs or rites, religious or political, that do not immolate human victims upon their altars; without a knowledge of his antecedents, or the faintest conception of his future, the African, under the Creator's natural laws, under those revealed to his chosen people, and under the Divine institutes of the Savior, has been equally false to all.

Such a being cannot be degraded by servitude; but, on the contrary, any change in his condition must be an improvement; and can any candid mind look at the change which two and a half centuries have wrought in the condition of his descendants in the southern States, and believe that servitude has degraded him?

I will not dwell upon the admitted fact that our southern slaves are the best fed, best clothed and cared for, and the least tasked laboring class in all Christendom; but I will point to the more important fact, that every log cabin of the southern slaves contains a truer knowledge of the true God, and the great work of salvation, than can be found throughout the fifty millions of pagan Africa, and that a very large proportion of them are members of Christian congregations.

Human happiness, like the Creator's love, is about equally distributed among men; but if there be a class upon earth possessing more of the elements of, and fewer of the drawbacks to, human happiness, than their fellows, it is the southern slave, when uncursed by the poisonous taint of abolitionism.

Mr. President, in connection with the subject of slavery, we are told by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] that the South has governed the Confederacy, but that the reins of power are falling from her grasp, and that to other hands are our destinies to be committed. Sir, I concede it. The genius, the knowledge of government, the constitutional and conservative spirit of southern men, have as unequivocally stamped the policy of this Government, in the Cabinet and in the Senate, as their valor has led her banners in the field. Seven of your Presidents have themselves been slaveholders; and whenever the country has demanded the intellect, the genius, or the courage of her sons, they have found no more brilliant illustrations than among slaveholders.

Under the guidance of their policy, with their hand upon the helm of the ship of State, her onward progress in all that ennobles, in all that elevates our race, has been the marvel of mankind.

Domestic discords, family jars, have from time to time intruded themselves upon her path of progress; but while they are as inseparable from it as is the dust from the wheels of the locomotive, they have impeded it as little.

National policies, national parties, national men, shedding, like the gentle dews of heaven, their cheering influence equally upon every hill and valley of their country, have all combined to awaken and to cherish in our hearts obedience to the Constitution, and through it, a love for the Union.

Sectional extremes have brought their common grievances to this altar, and in obedience to its cherished spirit have renewed their common purpose to sustain it.

If, sir, the South has governed, such has been the spirit, such are the results of her government.

With exultant tone we are told that she will rule no more. Be it so. In withdrawing from the ship of State, we may, at least, with pride look back upon the track she has traced upon the pathway of nations, marked, as it is, by imperishable monuments of man's cheering progress; and we may point to the storms of faction, the open assaults of foreign and domestic foes, and the treacherous deceptions of pretending friends, which, under the pilotage of the South, and the Constitution her only chart, she has nobly weathered; and now with all her banners aloft, her fame established, and her name unstained, with placid seas beneath, and smiling heavens above her, freighted with the hopes, the liberties, the freedoms of mankind—we will resign her as the greatest, the noblest trust that ever came from the hands of men. In the language of my friend from South Carolina, [Governor HAMMOND,] "great will be our honor and your responsibility;" and be sure that you let the world behold, when we demand her back, as demand her back we may, that you restore the emblem of her glory with no stripe erased—every star undimmed. Sir, I neither deplore this loss of power, nor fear its consequences to the South. She will be more than ever watchful of her rights, more sternly resolved to maintain them.

If she has hitherto betrayed a high degree of sensitiveness upon the agitation of the slavery question in Congress, when that agitation was dwarfed by the fact that the balance of power in this forum rendered it almost an abstraction, what must she feel when, recalling the threats of her enemies, she finds her voice not only impotent here, but all the branches of the Government in their hands to enforce them?

Sir, the union of these States must soon depend upon the constitutional and conservative action of this sectional party; and as successful aggression rarely pauses in its career, it becomes the duty of the South to learn, while time for calm reflection and counsel still remains, the position she is to occupy in this Union.

Conservative as I am, hopeful if not confident, that our darkening political heavens will grow brighter, and that we shall realize politically that the darkest hour is just before the dawn, I yet trust, nay I well know, she will never submit to that greatest of all degradation to a free people, a voluntary existence under a violated Constitution.

It is not for me to indicate the path she may, in her wisdom, pursue; but, sir, wherever it may lead, be it gloomy or bright, my whole heart is with her, and she will find me treading it with undivided affections.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. JOSHUA HILL, OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 29, 1853.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HILL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I congratulate you, sir, that after this protracted discussion, we find you to-day still able to occupy your seat; for, from the long and wearisome task which has devolved upon you, one might well suppose that you would be found in the condition of the afflicted man of Uz, "broken in pieces with words." Could there be such a thing as a Representative without a constituency, I should not on this occasion utter one single remark. But, sir, it is in deference to the high-spirited and intelligent people I leave behind, and whose Representative I am, that I essay upon this occasion to make known the feelings and sentiments which will govern me in the course I shall take in regard to the matter now under consideration.

It is not inappropriate that in the beginning I should say, that, in kind and familiar conversations I have held with gentlemen of various shades of political opinion—and I am happy to say I know no enemies, personally, among those who occupy this floor—I have been asked to forbear the expression of my peculiar views upon this floor, lest perchance I might say something that might wound friends of this party or of that. I hope that I have as kind a nature as becomes any man; but I have found, in such cases, that it is safest for a man to be his own judge of the course proper for him to pursue; and so I have determined, irrespective of the advice given me, to go my own way. I am like the Frenchman, who consulted his wife as to the mode of building his house, and when, after hearing his plans, she agreed that they were most admirable, he said, "well, madame, it is very well that you think so, for it is all the same; the house would have been built that way any how."

I do not propose to address myself exclusively, by any means, to the immediate subject under consideration. I propose to take a somewhat wider range. I am in the habit of doing so. I am in the habit, I may say, of inveighing against that spirit which pervades the American nation, and which is so hurtful, in my judgment, to its prosperity and well-being. I speak it in no unkindness of spirit to those who are now in power, or to those who will, in all human probability, succeed them. But the evil of the day is, in my judgment, the partisan spirit that pervades the land—the spirit that tolerates nothing of manly independence in thought, or action, but requires blind obedience to the dictates, and behests of party. Sir, dear to me as are the fortunes of the organization to which I belong, and devoted as I am to them, if it should ever assume the control of this Government, (which, I confess, looks at this time like a very remote possibility,) and should presume to dictate rules of thought and action to me, I would leave the organization, and if I could not find one agreeable to associate with thereafter I would stand aloof, though I should stand by myself.

For the few thoughts which I may utter on this occasion—for they will be few—I beg the indulgence of the House. I had prepared something in a wholly different vein from that in which I now propose to speak, but I have yielded it up to my own better judgment. If my thoughts suit not others I can only say in the spirit of the remark of the renowned Bacon: "So I think: let those who can, think more wisely."

Mr. Chairman, the year 1854, a year ever memorable and renowned in the annals of this nation by the extraordinary events that marked its passage, dawned on the American people as peacefully, as happily, and as benignly, as any one that had marked our brief but blessed career as a nation. The disappointments and acerbities growing out of the then recent presidential election had subsided in the country. Under the influence of the legislation of 1850—known as the compromise measures of that year—and of the wise and conservative Administration of him who justly earned the proud title of the "Model President," the country was marching on without a single obstacle in its career of progress and glory.

Sir, I have been accustomed to think that, in an evil hour, (I trust it may yet prove otherwise, for I fain would that good should come of it,) for some purpose as yet, perhaps, unavowed, and certainly by me not wholly understood, it became a matter of Democratic policy to inaugurate territorial governments for those immense wilds and wastes, solitudes of prairie and forest, known as Nebraska and Kansas. I never could perceive the pressing necessity of these measures at the time. The highest estimate that was made by any speaker on the occasion was, that in all those vast Territories there were not over nine hundred white souls, consisting, as they did, of hunters, trappers, and traders, with very few women and children among them. If I were disposed to be invidious, I might conjecture that the motive for the organization of those Territories was to carve out offices for dependants and expectants. I do not know that there was any such design, and therefore I make no such imputation.

But, if it had stopped there, although I think it was a premature act, the country would not have complained. It was not a very grave error, if error it was. But the momentous part of the matter was this: that in this act of legislation the Democratic party adopted the suggestion of a then political opponent—Mr. Dixon, of Kentucky—to repeal a measure which had stood on the statute-book for thirty years; which had received the sanction of a slaveholding President and of a Cabinet second in intelligence and worth to none that ever graced the Federal city. It had existed through successive Administrations, including that of the hero of the Hermitage—devoted as he was, heart and soul, in every pulsation, to the interests of the South. And during all that time no man had come forward and asked for its repeal.

Sir, it is a matter of history that at the time the proposition was made, the Washington Union, then conducted by a politician of signal ability, came out in an editorial the very next day, and denounced the proposition as a Whig trick, designed to divide and distract the Democratic party. The more cautious and distinguished chairman of the Senate's Committee on Territories, who had reported those bills, did not follow the lead of the organ of the party. He, like a prudent generalissimo, took time to reflect upon the proposition. Ay, sir, he slept upon it; and when his strong and vigorous intellect came to a conclusion, he rose, like a strong man, from his slumbers, resolved that he would do the deed or perish in attempting to execute it. The suggestion was incorporated into those measures, and became part and parcel of them, and impartial history must ever record that whatever of glory, of renown, or of shame, may attach to the transaction, the name of the distinguished Senator from Illinois must stand out in the front rank, towering above all others, as its advocate and defender. There he stands yet; and no matter how he may be contemned and derided to-day, he is regarded as the father of this great measure, and history will so record him.

But there was another who had been thought worthy, at one time, to bear the standard of the Democratic party to battle—a veteran in politics, and a statesman who stood deservedly high. I allude, sir, to General Cass, who, on the 20th of February, 1854, in the Senate of the United States, gave utterance, in a carefully prepared speech, to the expression of doubts and misgivings as to the wisdom and propriety of this act. The distinguished Senator said:

"Mr. President, I have not withheld the expression of my regret elsewhere, nor shall I withhold it here, that this question of repeal of the Missouri compromise, which opens all the disputed points connected with the subject of congressional action upon slavery in the Territories of the United States, has been brought before us. I do not think the practical advantages to result from the measure will outweigh the injury which the ill-feeling, fated to accompany the discussion of this subject through the country, is sure to produce. And I was confirmed in this impression from what was said by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DIXON,] and from North Carolina, [Mr. BADER,] and also by the remarks which fell from the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] and in which I fully concur, that the South will never receive any benefit from this measure, so far as respects the extension of slavery; for, legislate as we may, no human power can establish it in the regions defined by these bills. And such were the sentiments of two eminent patriots, to whose exertions we are greatly indebted for the satisfactory termination of the difficulties of 1850, and who since passed from their labors, and, I trust, to their reward. Thus believing, I should have been better content had the whole subject been left as it was by the bill when first introduced by the Senator from Illinois, without any provision regarding the Missouri compromise. I am aware that it was reported that I intended to propose the repeal of that measure, but it was an error. My intentions were wholly misunderstood. I had no design whatever to take such a step, and thus resuscitate a deed of conciliation which had done its work, and done it well, and which was hallowed by patriotism, by success, and by its association with great names, now transferred to history. It belonged to a past generation; and in the midst of a political tempest which appalled the wisest and firmest in the land, it had said to the waves of agitation, Peace, be still, and they became still. It would have been better, in my opinion, not to disturb its slumber, as all useful and practical objects could have been attained without it. But the question is here without my agency."

Thus, sir, discoursed General Cass. But in the same spirit to which I have alluded, he afterwards overcame his convictions of the impropriety of this repeal, and gave his vote for it.

Mr. Chairman, let it not be understood, from what I may say here in relation to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, that I was ever its eulogist or its advocate; for however vain and presumptuous it might appear in me to dissent from its great authors and advocates, I must say in truth, from the convictions of my best judgment, that the measure was extra-constitutional. So believing, had I been acting at the time of its adoption, I do not scruple to say that I would have seen the union of these States further imperiled than I believe it was in 1820, before I would have voted for it. It is said to have saved the Union. Certainly, if it deserved to have this said of it, it was a rare merit indeed; for I take it upon myself to say, (perilous, perhaps, as the expression may be to-day,) that if this Union could be restored to the purity with which it sprang from the fires of the Revolution, there is scarcely any sacrifice upon earth that I could make myself that I would not freely suffer for its preservation. But, sir, the Union of to-day, I greatly fear, is not the Union of seventy years ago. I know that we all profess the same degree of attachment for it that the men who framed it professed; but every man has his own way, in these degenerate days of loving the Union.

The extreme man of the South demands every concession to his requirements, and that there shall be no denial of the smallest right that he may have in the institution to which he is so fondly devoted; and not only this, but he insists that those who intrude their opinions and intermeddle with slavery, even by discussion among themselves, are inimical to the Union, and unworthy of his association. On the other hand, we hear other gentlemen say, we are attached to the Union; we are brothers, we wish to preserve the Union! We say that we will never consent, however, that the hated institution of slavery shall go one inch further upon American soil. Now, sir, this is a novel mode of showing affection for the Union! Perhaps at the same time they will disclaim that they have any design or desire to interfere with slavery in the States, or with the inter-slave trade. This is held as highly commendable, as great magnanimity and generosity! This is not my mode of estimating the duties of citizens to the Union, and it is not one of the reasons for my attachment to it. I go to the charter of our liberties; I go to the Constitution, and refer to the men who framed that instrument, and to the motives which actuated them at that time. Without arrogating to myself to be purer and better in heart, or superior to others in love for the Union and in tried patriotism, I say that I will stand by that charter; so long as I am able to interpret it, I will claim, as a southern man, all of my rights and my equality in the Union, and I will be content with nothing less. At the same time, I will not say to the North, in angry tone and defiant language, "come on and wrest these rights from us, if you dare!" I will not speak of bloody fields and desolated homes; such language, in my judgment, will never convince the understanding of any man—certainly not that of a fanatic. It is not the language of a brother; and, so long as we live in this Union, we are brothers.

I will return, Mr. Chairman, to the repeal of the Missouri compromise. When the deed was done, when the blow was struck, and when the compromise of 1820 slept with its fathers, there arose throughout the land a mighty clamor, and a wail went up, long, loud, and frantic; and, I am sorry to say, it came from those that loved the lost one far better in death than in the pride of "lusty life." Beside its bier, bedewed with some tears of honest, manly sorrow, there stood as chief mourners the Abolitionist and the Free-Soiler; they came to perform the last sad offices for this legislative victim. Why, sir, Mark Antony, in the depth of his pathos over the "piece of bleeding earth" that lay before him, the "Ruins of the noblest man

That ever lived in the tide of times," was not more eloquent in his sorrow than were these disconsolates. Might not some Democratic Brutus, witnessing the affecting scene, have prophetically exclaimed: "Here comes its body, mourned by the Abolitionist and Free-Soiler, who, though they had no hand in its death, shall receive the benefit of its dying—a place in the Commonwealth—as which of you shall not?"

Was it true that, up to the time of its lamented death, these worthies had sought to preserve this cherished object of their peculiar regard? Let the history of their affectionate solicitude give the answer. Yet their lamentations were as pathetic and heart-rending as were those of Rachel mourning for her children, refusing to be comforted because the Missouri compromise "was not." I thought, as General Cass thought, that if the country could reasonably have been expected to acquiesce in the measure of repeal, it would have been patriotic and proper. No evil could then have sprung from it. I knew that, surrounded by fanatical influences, there were men of milder mood, not fitted by nature to grapple with sterner spirits, who, when this hue-and-cry was raised, mustered in crowds and came to the rescue, and placed themselves under the banner of the anti-slavery party. When it is said to me that I am over-cautious in a measure that is abstractly right, and when I ought not to have desired anything more than its passage, I reply, that if these fanatical cries be music in the ears of some men, they grate harshly upon mine. They please me not. I could not laugh such things to scorn. I looked alone to the dreaded consequences to my country. It has been written that Nero, the tyrant, fiddled when Rome was burning; but the historian has not told us that the conflagration was the less destructive. So it is here. Making this reply, they may say that the measure, if not absolutely necessary, was one that was an act of justice to the South, under the Constitution, which was violated when the Missouri compromise was passed. Conceding this to be true, it seems to me that if there was no practical advantage in the thing, it was a most unnecessary hazard to the institutions of the country.

It occurs to me, in connection with this subject, to advert to the action of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] who took a view of this subject which nearly coincided with my own at the time. I have not lost sight of him, but have regarded him with interest ever since. He was denounced in the South as being untrue to the section he represented, because he dared to vote against the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. His intelligent constituency—among the most intelligent, I believe, in the State of Virginia—have returned him again and again, and thus vindicated the patriotism of his course. Certainly it will not be expected of me that I shall stand upon this floor as a panegyrist of the distinguished Senator from Illinois; but I am apt to think that he whom I have so often and so recently heard, in my own State, and in my own district, extolled as "a Saul in Israel, towering above the political hosts," is the same to-day that he was in 1854. Men—and I thank God it is so—are not like chameleons; certainly great men are not—and I class in that category the distinguished statesman from Illinois, because his own party stamped him with that seal, and they cannot take it away from him. He is intellectually to-day, as he has been heretofore, worthy of the sobriquet which has been applied to him, "the Little Giant." Is he less honest now than he was in 1854? Why should it be said so? Is any man more honest, more sincere, than he was in 1854? And this explains the question which I put to the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] the other day: does the fact that a gentleman who disapproved of the legislation of 1854 and now approves of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, make him a better Democrat than he who devoted life, soul, and every energy he possessed, to the adoption of that measure? Well, this is all of a piece with that sort of generosity to which I have adverted.

Sir, once for all, I denounce the proscriptive policy which would bow down and crush out the highest intellects at the mere bidding of the parasites and panderers who bask in the sunshine of power. There was a better day in the Republic—the day of "the era of good feeling," as it has been termed—when even Cabinet officers, the constitutional advisers of the Executive, could disagree upon great and important questions of State, and were still esteemed worthy to sit together at the council board. At the time of President Madison's administration of the Government there were some of his Cabinet opposed to the great measure of his Administration, the Bank of the United States, then a question paramount to all others. The Executive did not exact a blind obedience to his own peculiar views. The policy which does so, has been inaugurated in later but certainly not better days.

This spirit has extended itself, and I find in the Government organ in this city, only two days ago, a tirade poured out upon the heads of two venerable and distinguished men, of ripe experience, and whose oft-exhibited firmness and integrity of character, united with a rare knowledge and intelligence, entitle them to rank as statesmen. I allude, of course, to the vituperative attack which the Washington Union has seen fit to make upon Senators CRITTENDEN and BELL. Though I dissent from the conclusions of those distinguished gentlemen, I should be wanting in truth and sincerity if I did not say that I know, from my intercourse with them, that their present course is one dictated by the same love of country, and devotion to the pacification of the land, which has hitherto marked their long and distinguished career. But, sir, we have at last come to this, that DOUGLAS and BELL and CRITTENDEN and a host of others, who have been, hitherto, considered worthy and patriotic, if they make but one false step, come to one false conclusion, all their good deeds for a lifetime are to be canceled, and to go for naught. Is this just, is it proper? Where will it lead to? Does it not lead to the abject submission of the human intellect, or ruthless proscription? That is not my mode of carrying a measure. If it cannot be carried without bitterly denouncing as wanting in integrity and patriotism those who may differ with me, I would rather it should fail. Such a course suits not my taste, and never did. Circumstances which cannot be avoided divide men who are as honest the one as the other, and charity demands that you should be patient and forbearing with your erring brethren. I do not arrogate to myself such a degree of complacency as to say that I know and feel that I am right in the position I take to-day. I sometimes have misgivings as to the convictions of my own judgment, and well I may, when I see differing with me men of the best intellect in the land, and whom I know, from their antecedents, to be as patriotic as I can pretend to be.

Sir, in relation to the immediate subject under consideration, I had prepared, to some extent, (though I shall forbear to trouble the House with it at this time,) a succinct history of what has occurred in Kansas since it became a Territory and the progress of events which has marked its history. But it is sufficient for my purpose to state that I am satisfied, from what I have read and heard, and from what I know, as well as I can know facts which did not transpire in my immediate presence, that the Lecompton convention was a body that was legally constituted, called by the proper authority, and lawfully convened.

It is my judgment that they had power to form such a constitution as, in their wisdom, they might see fit; provided it did not run counter to the obligations of the embryo State to the Constitution of the United States, and that it was republican in form. I am satisfied, from an inspection of the constitution which they did form, that it contains all the elements that entitle it to be received as the constitution of a new State. I even go further, and say that its framers have collated with signal success and ability, from the various State constitutions, all that I think was most worthy of adoption. It stands to-day, in my judgment, one of the best instruments of the sort that it has ever been my fortune to read. Intrinsically, then, I say, there is nothing in it to complain of. Perhaps some of my friends on this side of the House may think that it has anti-republican features, because it establishes or tolerates the institution of slavery. Despite what Governor Walker had said, and even though he did say it, under the direction, if you please, and sanction and approval of the President and his Cabinet, the convention had full power to submit just as much of the constitution to the people as they pleased, or to submit no part of it, if they so chose.

These, I think, are sound views. The convention has framed a constitution, and, because there was one great subject of excitement paramount to all others in the Territory, they determined to submit that sub modo; and that is the chief complaint.

Sir, I am inclined to believe that if that constitution had ignored slavery as an institution of the new State, there would have been no opposition to it. The people of the Territory had the opportunity to vote against the slavery clause. They did not avail themselves of that opportunity, but refused to go to the polls and assert their rights. Their reasons for that course—whether advised from outside of the Territory or from within—are unknown to me. But I infer that the advice came from distant communities, and for purposes foreign to the interests of the people of the Territory themselves. Shall this miserable agitation which has enlisted the interest and excited the sympathy of the nation for years, continue to go on increasing in magnitude, and perhaps increasing in danger? Sir, I, for one, think it wisest to stop it where it is. Let us take the instrument which they have sent us as their constitution, and leave them to amend it as they may hereafter see fit. It seems to be the conceded doctrine that they can do so. It is the doctrine of the President. According to my opinion, they may, at least, change it as the constitution provides, and in no other mode. They are bound by what it prescribes. If it omits to prescribe the method, they may alter it according to their own volition. And then this foul blot, this miserable stain, that now lies like an incubus on the community, and shocks the moral sense of the people of the North, will be wiped away, and Kansas be fitted for companionship with the sisterhood of the free States.

I, sir, as a southern man, have never looked for Kansas to be a slave State, and have not expected it. That was one of the reasons why I thought the repeal of the Missouri compromise was unwise and unnecessary. I thought that it would work out no practical advantage to the South, and might end in serious detriment to the Union. I am still of that opinion. I do not believe it can ever give one foot of soil to slavery; I trust it may never extend freedom beyond where it would likely have been limited if the compromise had lived forever. But it has been supposed, and often spoken of, that the opposition arises from the desire to get possession of the Government. These are speculations which run through the human mind, and you cannot get rid of them if you would. Perhaps it may be wise for politicians, when about to enact measures of great magnitude, to consider the effect which they may have on their party organization. But standing, as I do,—or lying, as I might more properly say—between the upper and the nether millstones, I can feel but little interest in any movement of that sort. One has been grinding and crushing the principles which I have advocated, and the other but emulates it at every opportunity that presents itself. I can say to my constituents, Americans and Democrats, that I am glad to see that this Kansas convention has taken a step in the right direction. Senator Douglas has stigmatized, or complained of it, because the constitution contains what he is pleased to term “a little touch of Know Nothingism”—an American feature. Any affirmation, from any quarter, of what we know is the true policy of the nation, is grateful to my heart.

Now, a word of kind advice, kindly spoken, to gentlemen on this side of the House! It is this: if you contemplate the possibility of acquiring possession of this great Government, think, I beseech you, before you take the reins in your hands, or before you again aspire to contend for the empire, whether you are to go headlong in your career of denunciation of the South and her institutions, and yet hope to administer this Government in peace.

Properly speaking, not one word should have been said in connection with this constitution, that involves the question of slavery. It has been dragged in here most improperly. It is a thing that belonged exclusively to the local community. It is wrong that the merits or demerits of the institution should be discussed here, because they have nothing to do with the question which we are considering. And I, for one, as a southern man, declare that, though I stand second to none in my advocacy of our cherished institution, born as I was amongst it, as were my ancestors, all slaveholders; determined, as I am, to adhere to it, and to abide its fortunes, let them lead me where they may; desiring to die, when my time shall come in the will of Heaven, and to be buried in the land of my fathers, still I will not consent to debate the question upon this floor, because it is not legitimately before us. I know what my rights are, and shall be ready, when the time comes, if it ever should—which God in his mercy avert!—to assert them to the utmost extreme. I shall stand prepared to take my destiny with those who are indissolubly linked with me. These are no idle enunciations. I deal not in them. They are the earnest convictions of my heart, and I will deceive no man. I say to the North, before you shall succeed to power, if you do obtain the possession of the Government, by all the glories of your boasted Bunker Hill; by the memories of your Pilgrim Fathers, whom I have never traduced, and never will; by the common blood that was poured out at Concord and Lexington and Saratoga, and on the battle-fields of the South, I implore you to give up and abandon this idea, which is suicidal to the Confederacy, of restricting the institution of slavery to its present limits. What would you say, in the event our country shall expand? But if you have determined to go on, if you have sworn in your hearts never to relent, you may, and perhaps will, have the power; but whenever you seek to use it, the unhappy day will have arrived when this nation, and civilized man throughout the world, will have cause to lament the dire calamity involved in your success.

I have sometimes thought that I have done injustice to our northern friends. I say it not as a taunt. I have thought that they acted as politicians merely, using an abstraction for the purpose of obtaining power, and not in their hearts cherishing the sentiments they profess. But I have seen exhibited, in the course of this discussion, unerring evidence to my mind, of a general sympathy with strong anti-slavery sentiments—ay, with abolition itself, and it has inspired me for the time with indignation and regret. I desire the preservation of the Union. It cannot be preserved, in my honest opinion, unless these ultra opinions are surrendered upon the altar of our country. In the midst of these various considerations, the committee will pardon me for saying that I have been accustomed, in the clashing of the great parties of this country, to look to that small, devoted band which is scattered throughout the States of this Confederacy, who preach peace and good-will to all good men, and who appeal to all to come up with them in the work of reforming our Government, of correcting the abuses which have crept into it, and of Americanizing every institution, as the nation's last hope.

NOTE.—The annexed copy of a letter, taken in connection with what is contained in the foregoing speech, fully expresses the author's views on the subject of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The words embraced in quotation marks are taken from the letter of invitation, and were copied into that, approvingly, from the special message of the President transmitting the constitution to Congress:

FROM HON. JOSHUA HILL.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, March 1, 1858.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of the invitation of the appropriate committee, to unite with them in a public meeting to be held at Tammany Hall, on Thursday evening next, at half past seven o'clock. I trust I am properly sensible of the honor intended me. I most cordially agree with the President of the United States in the sentiment which so justly demands the approval of your associates, that “the peace and quiet of the whole country are of greater importance than the mere temporary triumph of either of the political parties in Kansas;” and I even go further, and add, or of any political party in any State or in the United States. I further give my hearty assent to the proposition of the President, that “Kansas has, for years, occupied too much of public attention, and that it is high time this should be directed to far more important objects.” I am clearly of opinion that it was quite an unnecessary and wanton disturbance of the public tranquillity to enact a law for the organization of a Territory in a wilderness, without population, and with conditions attached repugnant to the conservative sentiment of the country. I never thought the Missouri compromise constitutional, but its repeal was sudden, unasked for, unexpected, and, I fear, unprofitable. Coupled as it was with the Badger proviso, without which, I am well assured it could not have been repealed, to say nothing of its accompanying covert squatter sovereignty and patent alien suffrage, both pernicious doctrines, I regarded it as of no practical advantage to the South, and hurtful to the nation at large.

I am not so well convinced that, “when once admitted into the Union, whether with or without slavery, the excitement beyond her own limits will speedily pass away.” I incline to the opinion that, so soon as the too sanguine people of the southern States lose all hope of Kansas becoming a slave State, or continuing one, they will advert to the influences which have disappointed their hopes, and if, by possibility, it should occur to them that the past and present Administrations of the General Government have, in any manner, contributed to produce so unpalatable a result, they will feel and exhibit a just indignation.

Apart from its influences upon parties, I am unable to attach any great importance to the admission of Kansas. I am free to own that, if I had any well-grounded hope that, when admitted, it would continue a slave State, I should feel deep solicitude for its admission. If any man, from any section, sustains the Lecompton constitution because he desires the admission of the new State to be followed soon by the assembling of a new convention of her people, for the purpose of excluding slavery from her system, I frankly declare that I have no sympathies with such supporter, and cannot regard him as my “natural ally.”

Hoping that good counsels may prevail in your meeting, and that good may come of your deliberations, I have the honor to remain, with high respect, your obedient servant, JOSHUA HILL.

PETER B. SWEENEY, Esq.,
Chairman General Committee, Tammany Hall.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. EDWARD WADE,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. WADE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I come to add my mite to the multitude of words expended upon this Kansas question. We have had a good deal said during this debate of excitements, and they have been deprecated by nearly every speaker, and especially by those on the opposite side of the House. I have been surprised, sir, to hear the reasons urged upon us on this side why we should discontinue all these exciting movements, and come into harmony with sentiments towards which we have been hostile from the organization of this Government down to the present time. I know of no means by which excitements can be extinguished in political bodies but by putting an end to the causes of excitements.

Now, sir, in the political as in the moral world, principles which cannot be harmonized must be left to contention. Strife is inevitable, unless we are agreed; and how can two walk together except they be agreed? Are we agreed? Are we agreed upon the policy which should animate our Federal Government in relation to the extension of the institution of slavery? Every man knows here that we stand at the opposite poles of this question of slavery extension.

I am aware, too, that gentlemen contend that there is a controlling power above the policy that is involved in these questions, and that power is the Constitution of the United States; that this Constitution confers upon the slaveholding States the right to extend their institution over all of the Territories of the Government, and that Congress, of course, has no power to forbid this extension, to limit it, to qualify it, or in any manner to interpose an obstacle to it. But I do not propose to go into this constitutional question at this time. I am content to rest this upon the action of the Government from its foundation up to the time when it became necessary on the part of the South to agitate the slavery question as a means of obtaining political power. That is the real matter of contention between the two sections of the country—political power; and through that the extension of slavery is contemplated on the part of those on the other side to wrest from the free-State portion of the people every iota of the territory of the United States that is not already organized into Territories, and the nature of their institutions determined by the laws as they exist.

From this state of the question, Mr. Chairman, there results agitation. The two institutions of free labor and slave labor are at war with each other. Gentlemen may assert as they please, that they can be reconciled. We of the free States know perfectly well that they cannot be. We know that this question is one of life and death to the great mass of the people of the free States; for, sir, if the Territories are to be preoccupied by slave labor, and free labor is to be hedged up and headed off from the Territories, then the free States are destined to accumulate an overgrown population made up of capitalists and laborers—capitalists being, in the language of southern men, substantially the owners of the laborers. And,

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Wade.

HO. OF REPS.

sir, whoever contemplates that such a state of things is to be brought about through the usurpation of the slave power, does not understand the character of the masses of the people of the free States. The great mass of that people, sir, will never submit to the Territories being preoccupied by slave labor and slave institutions. The accumulating tide of population in the free States, demands that their Representatives here stand between the aggressions of the slave power and the rights of the people of the free States.

Now, sir, are not our positions on this subject, North and South, antagonistic? I ask the advocates of slave labor and slave institutions, are not your institutions hostile to free labor? Have you ever proposed any method by which the two may be reconciled? Have there ever been proposed any means by which the two institutions could be made to harmonize? Mr. Chairman, when this can be done, we shall have a return of the golden age. The year of wonders will have come upon us, when you can so frame your institutions, so shape the customs, and habits, and feelings of the people, that free and slave labor can go on and work harmoniously, side by side—the free laborer working for his own family, and for his own pocket, for his own comfort, for his own elevation; and the slave working merely for a wretched subsistence, barely enough to keep him in working order. When you can find these two contradictions united, amalgamated, then, sir, the political millennium will have fully arrived. But it cannot be done, and hence the excitements which have grown up between the two systems of freedom and slavery. In morals, as well as in natural science, there are things which are irreconcilably hostile to each other—which can be united neither by force nor persuasion. Power compels, persuasion solicits, and you cannot unite them. There has never been a time, and there never will be a time, when opposite things could be united, either in the natural world or in the moral world. True, chemistry points you to some intermediate agent, which will work a union; but each will cease to be the same substance it was before. And gentlemen also suppose that excitements can be put down here, while these two principles of freedom and bondage are in hostile array, are but tugging at impossibilities.

How many specifics have not politicians tried, for putting an end to excitements on the question of slavery? I recollect back to the time when I became a voter, that this experiment was up in the Congress of the United States. Petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and petitions for the abolition of the slave trade between the States, were sent in. This produced excitement, as they naturally would. They were bringing the rights of freemen into conflict with the power of slavery. As a matter of course, fermentation resulted as soon as it would by the admixture of an alkali and an acid. It was just as inevitable in the political world that this effervescence should take place in the one case as in the other.

Well, how did the politicians of that day meet this question? Did they not meet it with specifics, and tell us that they had calmed the troubled waters; that they had found the means by which harmony was to be restored and agitation to cease? Yes, sir, they told us that. Now, I want to show you what was said upon this subject many years ago, and the remedy which was prescribed for this disease of agitation. I read from the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, volume 8, page 188, session of 1839-40. Mr. Buchanan was then in the Senate of the United States, and he was one of the doctors who undertook to medicate the patient at that time. He says:

"In the session of 1835-36, (said Mr. B.) when an alarming excitement prevailed on this subject throughout a large portion of the country, I took a decided stand against the Abolitionists. I then presented a memorial from the Calm Quarterly Meeting of the highly respectable religious society of Friends in Pennsylvania, asking Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and at the time of its presentation, I declared that, upon its reception, I should immediately move that the prayer of the memorialists be rejected. This memorial was received by a vote of 36 to 13; and my motion to reject the prayer of it prevailed, with but six dissenting voices. Since this decision, the Senate had adopted a practice which I think has proved eminently beneficial, because it has afforded us peace and quiet upon this subject. The memorial is presented, objection is made to its reception, and a motion to lay the question of reception upon the table is then immediately made and adopted. This precludes all debate and all agitation.

"Now, (said Mr. B.) in consequence of my conduct here throughout that session, I have borne the brunt of the Abolitionists at home. I agree with the Senator from Kentucky that the danger has passed away, at least in Pennsylvania. The crisis is now over; and the fanaticism which threatened to invade the constitutional rights of the South, and to dissolve the Union, has been nearly extinguished.

"The battle has been fought where it must ever be fought, not in the South, but in the North. It is we of the North who must ever sustain the shock in such a contest. Under these circumstances, I appeal most solemnly to Senators from the slaveholding States, whether they ought not to be governed, in a great degree, by our advices to the mode in which these Abolition petitions shall be treated. It is impossible, after all which has passed, that they can doubt our devotion to the constitutional rights of the South. Let me assure them, then, that our greatest danger is from agitation here. Excitement is the element in which Abolition lives, and moves, and has its being. A flame kindled in the Capitol would soon pervade the Union. Let a question now be raised upon the abstract right of petition—let the enemies of Abolition in this body divide upon this question, as they probably would, and they will jeopard the great cause, to the maintenance of which they are all devoted, in this most unprofitable strife. The discussion of the Abolition question here can do no possible good, and may do much positive harm. When did fanaticism ever yield to the voice of reason? Let it alone, and it will soon burn out for want of the fuel on which it feeds."

That was said during the session of 1839-40. We were told at that time that this great trouble had passed away, and that because this little paltry trick of politicians was practiced upon the people in the Congress of the United States, of course it had killed out agitation. Agitation had expired, said the great doctors at that time.

Now, what are we at in 1858? Ten years have passed away since that was spoken in the other end of the Capitol, and yet agitation has gone on increasing with tenfold power. That same remedy has been prescribed from the commencement of the slavery agitation up to the present hour. And it has been said that if you will, by some trick, some chicanery, get the matter out of Congress, you will expel it from the country. Yet, Mr. Chairman, do not gentlemen here upon this floor know that it is the excitement in the country that brings the subject here, and not the excitement here that disseminates it in the country? That is the case in the free States; and all the specifics of the political doctors, and all their quack medicines, have done nothing but to increase that excitement to such a degree that we are now told that if we do not yield to the demand of the slave power, we are doomed to see a dissolution of the Union. Such has been the march of excitement, and such the effect of putting down excitement here on the part of those who have had the engineering of this matter in the Congress of the United States.

We were told that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was to be the great sovereign specific which was to end all this agitation. Every gentleman now upon this floor who was upon it at the time of the passage of that act, knows that we were told by every advocate of that most impolitic measure, to say the least of it, that if we would only pass that bill, all excitement would be done away. I will read an extract from a speech made upon that occasion by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who, I believe, is the leader of the forces of this House who are in favor of the Lecompton constitution at this time. He says:

"The old principle in our territorial policy has passed away, and we have in its stead a new one. We are not, therefore, to be shaken in our purpose to carry out this new principle by any such clamor or appeals. Our purpose is fixed, and our course is onward. What little agitation may be got up in Congress, or out of it, while this debate lasts, will speedily subside, as soon as this new principle is once more vindicated. Why do you hear no more wrangling here about slavery and freedom in Utah and New Mexico? Because, by this new principle, the irritating cause was cast out of Congress, and turned over to the people, who are most capable of disposing of it for themselves. Pass this bill—the sooner the better—and the same result will ensue. This shows the wisdom and statesmanship of those by whom this principle was adopted as our settled policy on this subject in 1850. A cinch in the eye will irritate and inflame it, until you get it out; a thorn in the flesh will do the same thing. The best remedy is to remove it immediately. That is just what the compromise of 1850 proposes to do with this slavery question in the Territories whenever it arises. Cast it out of Congress, and leave it to the people, to whom it very properly and rightfully belongs."

That medicine was administered at that time; but has it cured the excitement? Well, now, this present Lecompton constitution is to be the last—as they say in circus and wild-beast advertisements in country villages—positively the last exhibition; and unless you avail yourself of the present, you will have no other opportunity to see an excitement in the Congress of the United States upon the subject of slavery.

Mr. Buchanan tells us, in his message transmitting this constitution to us, that if we will only impose this constitution on the people of the Territory, all agitation will cease instantly, and we shall have a new millennium. This Democratic party seems to have a singular knack at getting up political millenniums; but it has equally a knack at getting up the contests which precede these millenniums.

Well, sir, I say to you and the House what I said when that Nebraska bill was on its passage: you never can have peace on this subject until peace is made by justice, and till justice and right are administered to all—the great and the lowly, the wise and the foolish; for that alone is the harbinger of peace. We are told by Holy Writ that there is no peace to the wicked. There ought to be no peace, when justice is withheld from him who has a right to justice; and I tell you that so long as man exists on the earth, there will be no quiet, there can be no quiet, while men are unjust to each other, while one man claims for himself that which he withholds from his fellow-man, and to which that fellow-man has an equal right by the laws of God and nature.

Why, gentlemen quote Scripture here for their dogmas of peace without righteousness. The Bible tells us that the fruit of righteousness is peace; and the effect of righteousness is quietness and assurance forever.

Now, sir, it happened to be my fortune to have a seat on this floor—the first public office I ever held—during that celebrated Nebraska-Kansas controversy in 1854; and I desire now to quote from what I laid down at that time as my opinions of the effect of that bill:

"But, Mr. Chairman, this reckless departure from the old landmarks of territorial organization may, and I think will, be fraught with consequences not now dreamed of by its perpetrators.

"The excitement now pervading the country on this question cannot fail to have its influence on the minds of emigrants from the free States, and from the slave States also. This non-intervention by Congress in the question of slavery in these Territories must inevitably excite, in the emigrants thither, the sectional spirit of the regions from which they go. The spirit of slavery propaganda, ever rampant in the South, will impel emigrants from the slave States to rush in with the intent of occupying for the benefit of slavery. In the free States, emigrant societies are already organized, and in process of organization, with abundant capital, for the express purpose of appropriating the Territories to the uses of freedom.

"On this arena, therefore, Congress invites a struggle for supremacy between freedom and slavery. 'A clear field, and no favor,' is our language. 'Fight it out on your own hook; it is your matter, not ours.'"

Now, sir, I appeal to every gentleman on this floor who was engaged in that controversy, if these anticipations have not been realized to the letter? They have, sir; and it seemed to me the strangest thing in the universe, that men could not see that the device of squatter, or popular sovereignty, in its application to a case of this kind, would not, and could not, work harmoniously. It might be perfectly right in the settlement of the Territories, provided you had a homogeneous people with which to settle the Territories. I appeal to gentlemen on this floor if the motives which actuated the Congress of 1820-21 in establishing the Missouri restriction were not in anticipation of this precise state of the case—whether it was not in that view of it that the Territories were separated, and one side of the line appropriated to freedom, while on the opposite side of the line slavery was allowed to take its chance with freedom? I can just recollect the period of that controversy, though I did not understand precisely what it was about. But I recollect, in the popular discussions of that day, to have heard it said that the Union was in imminent peril until that Missouri line was fixed as the boundary between slave territory and free territory. The men of that day had undoubtedly the same views that every reflecting mind has had here, that the obliteration of that line would be the reopening of the controversy afresh, and the cause of an excitement, the end of which no man can predict.

Another reflection comes up here; and that is, that this contest between free institutions and slave institutions, without the intervention of Congress, will go on and increase in severity, as it increases in extent of surface, until the one shall grind the other to powder. There is no salvation for the weaker institution, which ever it shall prove to be, till the strong arm of Congress shall interpose between them. That is just what we have arrived at in this Kansas discussion. It is precisely the state of things that was to be expected.

We were told by the political prophets and preachers of the pro-slavery gospel that their "squatter-sovereignty" doctrines were to bring peace and harmony to the Union. Where is our peace at the present time? We, upon this side of the House, have held up over us threats to dissolve the Union, unless we retract our opposition, and permit this felon constitution to be imposed upon a majority of the people of Kansas—a constitution which the people have repudiated by a vote of four to one, or five to one, or ten to one. I do not know what the ratio is; but whatever it may be, this is evident: that you are under the necessity of resorting to force to compel a portion of that people to submit to it. If they are in a minority, then it shows the impotency of pro-slavery immigration; but if those who are resisting this Lecompton constitution are in a majority, then it shows the tyranny of Congress and of the President, in attempting to impose it upon them.

This leads me to comment, for a few moments, on the course that has been pursued in relation to the investigation of the facts surrounding this Lecompton constitution. Gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House argue it precisely as they would argue a question of demurrer or writ of error in a court of law; while we, who advocate an investigation into the facts, insist that we make out a prima facie case; that at least eight tenths of the people of that Territory are opposed to this constitution. You come here and say, in the language of the Jew, "the law allows this constitution, the judge awards it; therefore it is my right, and I will have it." We meet you as statesmen, saying that this is no mere legal question about an old horse or a wheelbarrow; but it is a question of the right of the people to govern themselves. You tell us the constitution is fair on its face. It is all right, says the President, on the face of it; so was sin, as depicted by Milton, fair externally. How is it within? We ask you to permit us to probe this fair and just and beautiful thing, as you call it. Oh, you say, it is all regular; it is absolutely beautiful; it is a pity to spoil such a regular and fair constitution. But we come here and tell you, that it is full of "dead men's bones and all uncleanness;" a mere whited sepulcher; and we ask you to permit us to take our crowbars and our picks, and to perforate it, and see what is inside of it. You say, no; you shrink from it like men conscious that you have no case; conscious, before the nation and the civilized world, that you must entrap your antagonists here, just as a twopenny pettifogger would grab a widow's cow, by virtue of a slip in special pleading. You take exactly the same course. You seek to determine the rights of men, and to fix their institutions for all time, for aught you know, by frauds as base and infamous as ever characterized a gang of counterfeiters in their dens in the wilderness, to evade the pursuit of the officers of the law. There is no escape from this. Why, if you are innocent, hang upon a wretched technicality? Do gentlemen suppose that the people of this nation, North and South, are not able to comprehend the length and breadth of this question? Here, sir, was a proposition made by the friends of the free-State men of Kansas, to ascertain the fact whether or not a majority of the people of that Territory were consenting to this Lecompton constitution. What did they propose to do? They proposed to go on and show, by indubitable evidence, that, in the election of members to the constitutional convention, in the election by which the doings of that convention were ratified, and in the arrangement of the laws respecting the elections in that Territory, there were frauds by which the people were defrauded of the elective franchise.

Mr. JENKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question to know whether I understand him correctly. I would inquire whether he is making an argument against the reception of the Lecompton constitution, upon the ground that it is the work of fraud, and not of the people of Kansas?

Mr. WADE. That is what I am doing.

Mr. JENKINS. Then, I ask the gentleman this question: whether, if it were not the work of fraud, but had been fairly formed, and represented the will of the people of Kansas, he would vote to admit Kansas with the slavery clause in her constitution?

Mr. WADE. When we have settled the question whether it is the will of the people or not, I will answer that question.

Mr. JENKINS. That is a regular Yankee answer. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADE. Yes; and it is destructive to the slaveholder's argument. That is the difficulty with it.

Mr. BOWIE. You do not answer the question at all.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question?

Mr. WADE. A question only.

Mr. JENKINS. If the gentleman would not, under those circumstances, vote for the admission of Kansas, what does he mean when he talks about the right of the people of Kansas to frame their own constitution, and to regulate their domestic institutions?

Mr. WADE. We are endeavoring to get you to permit them to make their own fundamental laws, and you will not do it.

Mr. JENKINS. But suppose they should wish to come in with slave institutions, would the gentleman admit the State then?

Mr. WADE. Will the gentleman probe this question of fraud in the constitution with me? If he will do this, then I will answer his question. But I understand you. You think you have a little the advantage of us, but like a thorough-going pettifogger, you will not relinquish it for anything we can do or say.

Mr. Chairman, the whole country will hear of this refusal to investigate, and it will satisfy your own people in the slave States of the fraud, if they could but have it honestly placed before them; and I would be willing to leave it to a verdict of the people of the slave States alone to say whether or not this Lecompton constitution should be imposed upon the people of Kansas, if you could get a fair and honest expression of that people, uncontaminated by the prejudices which would be thrown around it to pervert their judgments.

I have divers things here on this question of fraud which I designed to refer to, but I have not time.

Sir, there was a communication said to have been made by the President to Mr. Walker and Mr. Stanton, in relation to their intermeddling with these fraudulent votes in the Territory. There is no communication in the documents furnished us by the President of the date of 8th of September. I will read from the Washington correspondence of the Richmond Enquirer. I hope gentlemen will read, ponder, and inwardly digest it:

"WASHINGTON, Monday, November 2, 1856.

"President Buchanan most unequivocally condemns the action of Governor Walker touching the Kansas elections, but yet there will be no removal. Secretary Floyd was telegraphed to New York on Friday evening last to hurry home to attend a Cabinet meeting to-day on the subject of Kansas, and I feel assured Walker's actions will be pronounced an error, and he will be reprimanded for falling into it in direct violation of his instruction September 8, in which he is specially charged to leave all questions of fraud to the Legislature, where it properly belonged.

"The President regrets this blunder the more, as it places the southern members of his Cabinet in an unpleasant position, and is likely to reopen the Kansas question throughout the South. Mr. Buchanan is surprised that Governor Walker should have fallen into such an error, as his instructions were too plain to be misunderstood, and were prepared to meet precisely the state of the case which occurred. Yet, he says it was only an error, and his first one, which is also rather a matter of surprise, as he has had to steer through a narrow, crooked channel, full of snares, and enveloped in fog.

"The impression of Governor Walker's friends here is, that he will receive the reprimand, acknowledge the blunder, and let his name be submitted to the Senate. If the southern fire eaters are disposed to reject him, let them do so. Better this than sneak out of the difficulty as his predecessors did. Let the Senate reject him, and he will occupy a position from which he can properly defend himself and the Administration. Should he resign, he will properly sink into political oblivion, from which no future act can resurrect him."

How is that? He was instructed with reference to a state of the case that might occur, and that was the state of the fraudulent returns enough, to determine the election on that occasion. Now, sir, if this thing be so—I cannot vouch for it and I know nothing about it—if Governor Walker or any other Governor of Kansas Territory were instructed not to meddle with these returns in view of a fraud in those returns, it deeply implicates the Administration; and that communication of the 8th of September, if it exists, ought to be produced here, that we may know whether or not this was a scheme devised expressly for the purpose of cheating the free-State men out of their rights in that Territory.

Why could not Governor Walker intermeddle with these returns? I know it is said that the laws of the Territory referred it to the Legislature, and the Legislature referred it to a constitutional convention, and therefore the Governor had no right to intermeddle.

But, sir, I insist on it that these instructions and these modes of determining the rightfulness of these elections were devised so as to obtain a false verdict, for the express purpose of coming here with a formal constitution, which was not the embodied will of the people of that Territory, but was the embodied will of the slave power in this Government.

The New York Herald, by its Washington correspondent, of October 31, 1857, states the same thing. He adverts to the same letter of the 8th of September, as follows:

"WASHINGTON, October 31, 1857.

"The telegraph report in this morning's papers, that Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton would be removed unless they shall choose to resign, is without foundation. While the President and Cabinet condemn the course of Governor Walker in issuing his proclamation and transcending his instructions in throwing out the vote of the Oxford precinct—for he had no authority to do so under the territorial laws, it belonging to the Legislature to determine the authenticity of their own members—thereby displeasing both parties; but it does not follow that he must be removed. The whole matter will be brought before a special meeting of the Cabinet this evening.

"Secretary Floyd was telegraphed for last evening, his presence being desired at a Cabinet meeting to be held on Monday next, relative to Governor Walker and his late proclamation, which will be censured by the Administration, as in direct violation of his instructions of September 8. He had no authority whatever to pronounce upon the legality of votes, and was specially instructed to receive the returns, and let the Legislature determine their character."

The Star, of the date of November 2, 1856, stated at the same time that Governor Walker was acting contrary to his instructions. That is, he was instructed not to meddle with the election returns which he knew to be fraudulent:

"GOVERNOR WALKER AND JOHNSON COUNTY.—We apprehend that the Journal of Commerce is in error in its belief that there is no foundation whatever for the statements of Washington letters for the press, attributing to the Administration dissatisfaction with the course pursued by Governor Walker with reference to the alleged election frauds in Johnson county, Kansas. We do not, however, believe that the disapprobation of that course, which the Administration is said to entertain, is so great as to justify the newspaper correspondent's statements that the design of removing him is entertained."

"Thus, for twenty-four hours, it seemed to be believed by usually well-informed persons around us, that in assuming, as alleged, to decide upon the character of the Johnson county returns—setting aside the certificates of judges of the election, and issuing his warrants, entitling them to hold seats in the Legislature, to candidates returned to him by the said judges as having been defeated—he has overstepped his authority, under the circumstances, in a most delicate point, acting, in fact, directly contrary to his instructions. Our impression is, that in a few days those instructions will be published," &c.

So it seems that this scheme was got up for the express purpose of handing over to us a constitution that should be fair upon its face while false and fraudulent within. All investigation into these facts was to be stifled. I need not go on with this matter further. I intend to print with my speech some of these extracts, and to show that while congressional intervention was prohibited by the Nebraska bill, it was superseded by an executive intervention of a more odious and hateful character.

Let us see whether the Administration has been fair and impartial. I arraign the President for gross partiality; nay, sir, for siding with the vehemence and vindictiveness of a partisan with these Lecomptonites in the Legislature. What does he say? He says in his organ, the Washington Union, of the 7th of August, 1856:

"Governor Walker is a southern man; he has been sent out by an Administration pledged to the defense of southern rights; he is surrounded by a corps of officers, most of them from the South, and every one of them sound national men; he was instructed to regard the territorial authorities as legal, and sustain them against the rebellion of the Topeka Abolitionists; he is acting in concert with the friends of the South, and gallantly fighting their enemies. We cannot help but think that such a man so sent, so instructed, so surrounded, and so acting, is entitled to sympathy, comfort, and aid from the South, whenever they can be given with a conscientious regard to truth. With such a battle raging in his front, it was ungracious to open this fire on his rear."

Now, sir, has not the President, by the showing of his own organ, for which he is responsible, intervened in behalf of slavery, in behalf of the South? Did he not send troops to Kansas for the express purpose of maintaining the supremacy of southern influence in that Territory; and did not he appoint a Governor for the same specific purpose? His organ says he has done everything for the South. The North, the abused and insulted North, was no more in the President's contemplation in his arrangements about this Kansas matter, than though they had been a nation of New Zealanders. The North had nothing to do with it; but we intend to; and if we are not infested with too many traitors at home, we will try to do it; and if we do, we will try to take care of the traitors afterwards.

Now, let me give an extract from the Union a few (not more than ten) days since:

"If there should be seen a single Democrat to waver, suspicion of infidelity to the party must necessarily arise. The Democratic party must be preserved! If patriotic services deserve reward at the hands of the people when displayed on the field of battle, they no less deserve it when displayed in civil life."

Yes, now is the time, they say, when the fish are hungry; so hungry that they will bite at a red rag. Why, did ever you see a boy go into a pasture to catch a horse, and shake the corn at him with more distinctness and certainty than the Administration here shakes the patronage of the Government before the Democrats of the House to bring them up to the scratch in regard to this Lecompton matter? But the article goes on:

"The matter is now in the precise condition in which the executive influence may be most available and decisive. The shaky and hesitating Democrats are marked, and may be brought into the ranks. A large executive patronage is yet undisposed of. Additional patronage is to be afforded by the Army bill, if it should pass, as it will, in some shape."

Thus speaks the Union to the Democrats. It shakes patronage in their faces, and says, "Gentlemen, wake up, wake up; we are ready to give you salt or provender, just as your appetites crave; we have enough of it; no danger about that."

But, sir, in the few moments of time I have left, I desire to say some words upon the subject of these strifes between the two sections of the Union. The truth about this matter is, that the South is the weaker section in point of wealth and numbers; and if numbers, as they ought, in democracies, control, the Government ought to be in the hands of the North—the non-slaveholding States. Now, the difficulty to be reconciled under the Constitution is this eternal inequality between the slave and the free States; an inequality which I will now go on to show is, and must continue to be, hopelessly perpetual.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. CHAS. READY,
OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. READY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I propose to discuss the pending proposition for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. In doing so, it is not my intention to go into a labored defense of slavery, or to elaborate the question as to whether or not it can lawfully exist under the Constitution of the United States, as erroneous as I believe to be the opinions expressed by many gentlemen on the subject. For my present purpose, I am content to find the Constitution recognizes the lawful existence of slavery, by providing for the reclamation of fugitive slaves; that three fifths of the slave population are to be estimated in apportioning the Representatives to Congress. I might add the ninth section of the first article, in regard to the importation of slaves. Suffice it to say, "ita lex scripta est." I plant myself on the Constitution, and there I intend to stand. With its provisions I am satisfied, and I intend to maintain them, and the Union under them, as long as it may be done consistently with the landmarks of this great American chart. If the day shall ever come when it shall be trodden under foot, the Union dissolved, and broken into fragments, neither patriot nor traitor shall have cause to say to me, "Et tu, Brute!"

Nor is it my purpose to indulge in harsh epithets toward those who differ with me, or to draw invidious comparisons between the morality, intelligence, or prosperity of the different sections of the country, as they may be affected one way or the other by their local laws. I thought the admonition of the member from Connecticut, [Mr. BISHOP,] upon this point, was wholesome and appropriate; and I wish that all northern as well as southern gentlemen would reflect upon, and act in accordance with it. Having said this, I must add, that I am sure there are few if any instances in which southern men may have been betrayed into the use of remarks of the character indicated, except in response to disparaging and offensive arguments applied to their section. But I drop this now, and I trust forever. Standing, as I have just said, upon the Constitution, whose platform is broad enough for all the North, and all the South, for myself, as a southern man, "to the manner born," I am willing to meet there the men of the North, and greet them as political brothers, as long as they are willing to stand with me on terms of harmony and political equality.

Without further preliminary remarks, I come directly to the discussion of the important measure which has occupied so much of our time. Under a law passed four years since, Kansas was organized as a Territory. Her organic law was founded upon the assertion of a great fundamental principle—the non-intervention of Congress on the subject of slavery in the Territories; to give effect to which, it was necessary to repeal the Missouri compromise. Finding in the Constitution no grant of power to Congress to restrict slavery in the Territories, or elsewhere, I believed the compromise was unconstitutional. I, also, believed it was a violation of our treaty stipulations with France, by which we acquired the territory; and that it was unjust to the South. I was, therefore, in favor of its repeal, and of leaving the people of the Territory "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Whatever difference of opinion may have existed in regard to the repeal of the Missouri compromise when the act was passed, I believe a very large majority of the people of the United States finally came to the conclusion that congressional non-intervention, as declared in the act, was the true doctrine on which the question of slavery was to be settled. I was of that opinion; and believed, in common with the friends of the measure, that it would harmonize discordant elements, and give quiet to the country on this most agitating subject.

In the progress of events, a difference of opinion was developed as to the construction of the clause declaring that "the people of the Territory were left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

One side asserted the right of the people of the Territory, in their own territorial capacity, to establish or prohibit slavery; a doctrine which has generally been called "squalter sovereignty." The other side held, as I believe correctly, that neither the people in their territorial capacity, or the Territorial Legislature, have power either to establish or prohibit it. I distinctly announced this position in a speech I made in this House, in 1854, in the discussion of the bill for the organization of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska; and no friend of the bill, North or South, controverted its soundness. These conflicting opinions, at least as between the supporters of the bill mentioned, must have assumed a distinct antagonism after its passage. They have since entered largely into the creeds of political parties; have been held by different members of one of the great parties, and have been elements in the political contests of the times. Immigrants have flocked into the Territory with extraordinary rapidity, and under extraordinary auspices, for the purpose of giving the ascendancy to each side of this disputed question of power. They have been urged on by partisans in the States, until arrayed in deadly hostility against each other. The narrative of scenes of violence amongst them (no doubt often exaggerated) has but served to arouse their respective friends in the States, until the excitement has pervaded almost every portion of the country. Such is a brief history of the progress and present state of affairs in regard to Kansas.

She now presents herself with a constitution, and asks for admission into the Union. In view of her history, it is not a matter of surprise that she is embarrassed at every step taken to divest herself of her territorial pupillage, and assume the character of a sovereign State. But we should remember she is asking a high constitutional privilege, which should not be denied her, except on weighty and conclusive reasons. Shall she be admitted? I answer in the affirmative.

It is conceded by all that she has sufficient population to entitle her to admission; and I have not heard it doubted that her constitution is republican in form. Was it legally formed? If it was, there can be no valid objection to her admission. In July, 1855, the Territorial Legislature passed an act submitting it to the vote of the people to determine whether they were in favor of holding a convention to frame a State constitution, preparatory for admission into the Union. An election was accordingly held, in October, 1856, the result of which was an almost unanimous vote in favor of the measure. In accordance therewith, the Territorial Legislature, on the 19th of February, 1857, passed a law for making an enumeration of the inhabitants; for registering the qualified voters; and for the election of delegates to a convention. The then Governor, Mr. Geary, vetoed the bill, because it did not require that the constitution to be framed should be submitted to a popular vote for adoption or rejection. Upon a reconsideration of the bill in each House of the Legislative Assembly, it was passed over the Governor's veto by a two-thirds vote; and, consequently, it became a valid law. It was regularly, fairly, and legally enacted, as far as we have any knowledge or information. It is unusually guarded in all its provisions, with the view of protecting the rights of every legal voter; of guarding the ballot-box against frauds; and for securing a full and fair expression of the popular will in the election of delegates. There is nothing in it startling to fair-minded men; but much to claim their admiration and confidence. If it differs from previous laws passed under like circumstances, for a like object, the difference was in favor of the honest legal voter and against corrupt and bad men. The eleventh section of the law provides:

"Every bona fide inhabitant of Kansas, being a citizen of the United States, and twenty-one years of age, whose residence in the county where he offers to vote shall have been three months next before said election, shall be entitled to vote."

With this specification of the qualification of voters, so eminently just and proper, and the means provided for ascertaining the qualification of each and every man presenting himself as a voter, and of preventing and punishing violence, fraud, and illegality of any kind, it is inconceivable how fair men can raise an objection to it.

In pursuance of this law, the enumeration of the inhabitants and registry of the voters were taken, as far as practicable. The voters registered numbered nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one, falling but little short of the largest vote, up to that time, ever cast in the Territory. The apportionment was made by the acting Governor; and on the 3d of June, 1857, in pursuance of the law, the election of delegates took place. The convention assembled at Lecompton, on the first Monday of September, 1857, I believe; and the constitution now before us is the result of its labor.

Upon the face of the record, all is fair; and the Admission of Kansas—Mr. Ready.

HO. OF REPS.

question recurs, shall Kansas be admitted as a State, under this constitution?

It is opposed by some gentlemen, first, because there was not an enabling act passed by Congress; while others, as strongly opposed, take the ground that an enabling act was not necessary. I apprehend the grounds of the opinion of both classes are alike inconsistent with the right of admission under the Lecompton constitution.

I hold that the act of the Territorial Legislature, authorizing the election of delegates and the holding of a convention, based as it was upon the previously expressed will of the people, in pursuance of law, was the only enabling act necessary, in addition to the organic act of the Territory, which is, of itself, an enabling act:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

This provision, as I have already intimated, did not authorize the people of the Territory, while in their territorial pupillage, to decide upon the question of slavery. Congress has no power itself to establish or prohibit slavery in the Territories or elsewhere, as has been decided by the Supreme Court; and this was the broad foundation on which rested the repeal of the Missouri restriction of slavery north of 36° 30'. Not possessing the power, of course Congress could not confer it elsewhere.

It was not necessary to incorporate the provision quoted in the organic act, merely to authorize the people of the Territory to establish or prohibit slavery when they came to act in their sovereign capacity, as when framing a State constitution. The right exists as an attribute of sovereignty; was not, by the Constitution, conferred on Congress; and was therefore "reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

But there was a motive, an object to be accomplished, by this provision of the act; and it doubtless was, to enable the people of the Territory, after the period had arrived at which they could constitutionally act, in their own time and manner, either by the employment of a convention chosen by themselves or by popular vote, to decide the question of slavery for themselves, without the necessity of further congressional action. How could they be "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States," if it was necessary for Congress to pass a subsequent act to enable them to do it? If the right rested with Congress, why should it not prescribe the mode as well as the time? Then one, or both, might not accord with their wishes; and, being thereby restrained, they would not be "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way."

I might refer to the opinions of distinguished gentlemen, whose peculiar positions at the time they were expressed, and the relations in which they now stand to this subject, give them unusual point and force. I refer to the opinions of Senator DOUGLAS, in his Springfield speech of the 12th of June, 1857; and to the speeches of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton to the people of Kansas, pending the election of delegates to the convention, in which they all hold that no other enabling act was necessary.

A majority of the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, in which Republican members were in the ascendency, and many of whom are members of the present House, did not consider an enabling act by Congress necessary in regard to Kansas. The Toombs bill, carefully prepared, fair and just in its provisions, authorizing Kansas to form a constitution, passed by the Senate by a large majority, was lost in the House by the votes of the Republican party. It will be remembered they then had a favorite bantling, known as the Topeka constitution, framed by a convention gotten up without any law, in opposition to and in defiance of all lawful authority, and revolutionary in its character, under which they were attempting to bring Kansas into the Union as a sovereign State. No enabling act was then necessary in their opinion.

When the territorial act of July, 1855, authorizing the holding of a convention, reached the Thirty-Fourth Congress, then in session, and its fair, just, and wise provisions were seen, but few regrets were entertained in either House for the failure of the Toombs bill; and doubts were no longer entertained that in due season the people of Kansas would form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, in accordance with the strictest fidelity to the organic act and the Constitution of the United States. The late and the existing Administrations recognized the legality of the proceeding; and I believe I may say there was a general acquiescence in all the departments of the Government.

It has, in fact, never been considered an indispensable or necessary preliminary in the case, that Congress should pass an enabling act, though it has sometimes been done. At least half of the States admitted since the adoption of the Federal Constitution have come in without an enabling act, my own State (Tennessee) among them; her only authority for the formation of a constitution having been derived from an act of her Territorial Legislature. But I forbear to specify examples, though they are numerous, and dismiss this objection.

A second objection is, that a large portion of the free-State voters were disfranchised and not allowed to vote for delegates to the convention; that the arrangements for a registry of the votes were inadequate to the end, or that the officers failed to discharge their duty through negligence, fraud, or some other cause; and not having been registered, they were prevented from voting.

The law under which the registry was made designated competent officers in each county, with power to appoint deputies under them, and allowed one month to perform the duty, at the end of which time they were to file lists in the offices of the probate judges of their respective counties. Copies of the lists were to be posted in public places for the inspection of all; and one month more was allowed for the correction of errors, by striking off any names which should be proved to have been improperly returned, and adding any which should appear to have been improperly omitted. Here was ample time and opportunity for full justice in the premises. The number registered, nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one, could not have fallen very far short of all the legal votes in the Territory. If the election for State officers, in October, 1857, which was warmly contested, and brought out the largest vote ever polled there up to that time, and which is believed to have exhibited near, if not quite, the full strength of the voting population, may be regarded as a correct criterion, it may be safely estimated that not exceeding two thousand to three thousand votes were omitted in the registry.

It appears from authentic sources—official documents—and, in fact, I believe it is not denied, that many of the free-State men, or Republicans, refused to register; that in some instances they gave fictitious names; that they resorted to threats of violence and intimidation of the officers, as well as every other means in their power to prevent the execution of the law.

Mr. Stanton, then acting Governor, in addressing those very men, makes the following statement on this subject:

"I may say, however, I have heard statements quite as authentic as your own, and in some instances, from members of your own party, (Republicans,) to the effect that your political friends have very generally, indeed, almost universally, refused to participate in the pending proceedings for registering the names of the legal voters. In some instances they have given fictitious names, and in numerous others they refused to give any names at all. You cannot deny that your party have heretofore resolved not to take part in the registration, and it appears to me that, without indulging ungenerous suspicions of the integrity of officers, you might well attribute any errors and omissions of the sheriffs to the existence of this well known and controlling fact."

George Wilson, judge of probate for Anderson county, made an affidavit that, to his personal knowledge, this party threatened the life of any who should attempt to take the legal census; that the life of any one attempting to execute the law in this respect was in danger; and that these threats prevented the taking of the census in Anderson county within the time prescribed by law. He also swears that similar threats prevented the execution of the law in Allen and Franklin counties.

I believe these statements have never been refuted, or seriously controverted. On the contrary, the determination of the Free-Soilers not to vote in the election of delegates to the convention has become a matter of history, as also the efforts of Governor Walker and others to induce them to change their intentions, by warning them that "those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election." This principle lies at the very foundation of all representative government, which could not exist without it. Strike it out of our political system and you could not elect a Representative to this House, whose enemies might not manage to avoid his election, and render it a mere farce. In view of this important truth, those people were admonished by the Governor not to console themselves with the expectation of defeating the ratification of the constitution by a subsequent vote; for although he was in favor of submitting it to the people for their approval or rejection, he did not know the convention would so decide, and there was no power to control their discretion.

These admonitions, and the great truths on which they were founded, were unheeded, and we are now invoked to treat them as idle babblings and political heresies. For myself, I am willing to test this objection by such heresies.

I pass to the charge of fraud, which may be numbered as objection third. Fraud in the election of delegates to the convention, and fraud generally; for I believe some affect to consider everything connected with the convention, from the enactment of the law for the election of delegates to the end of their labors, and the entire work of their heads and hands, as soiled with fraud. I believe one gentleman [Mr. GRANGER] said the Lecompton constitution "is covered all over with fraud, and spotted with corruption."

This is a grave charge. It is easily made, and frequently hard to prove. It is a legal aphorism that fraud must be proved and not presumed. It is founded in good sense, and must prevail as well in political as in judicial tribunals. I ask, then, where is the evidence of fraud? It was not in the enactment of a wise, just, and efficient law to preserve the purity of the ballot-box, and the rights of every bona fide citizen; to prevent and punish all fraudulent and violent interference in the election, and to secure a full and fair expression of the popular will. It was not in the faithful attempt of the officers, under that law, to carry out its laudable intent, by making a fair registry of all the voters in the Territory, for the purpose of securing them in the exercise of the elective franchise, and to enable them to keep off aliens, non-residents, and invaders of every description. It was not in the willful obstinacy, fraud, and threatened violence of the free-State men to prevent the completion of the registry. Surely gentlemen of the Republican party will not now turn on their present co-laborer, late acting-Governor Stanton, by whom the apportionment of delegates was made, and say that was fraudulent, and "thou art the man." No, gentlemen, though I may be prepared to believe much, I cannot believe you will beguile of such ingratitude. It would be an accumulation of misfortunes on him too grievous to be borne; and, in the bitterness of his anguish, well might he exclaim, "save me from my friends!"

Was there fraud in the election of delegates to the convention? There is no proof of it. And in all the investigation of illegal voting in Kansas, I am not aware that any attempt has been made to ferret out illegal votes in this election, for the reason, I suppose, that the registry was an ample protection. But, even if it be conceded that fraudulent votes were cast, the fact would not, in legal phrase, be cause for challenging the array, or setting aside the verdict of the jury; annulling the convention, and avoiding its acts, any more than it would give cause for annulling the present House of Representatives, or declaring its acts void, because illegal votes may have been cast in the election of its members; a thing which probably occurs to some extent in every popular election. Nor would it invalidate the election of an individual delegate, unless the legal votes he received were not greater than the number of legal votes received by his opponent. Even then, if he were permitted to take and hold his seat, it would be too late to raise objections after the labors of the convention were finished, and the constitution would not thereby be "spotted with corruption." Moreover, it would not be for those to invalidate an election on the charge of fraud who refused to vote, and, as far as they could, prevented others from voting, and did all in their power to prevent an election. We are not to be misled by the cry of "stop thief!"

Was there any fraud in the action of the convention after it assembled? Were there any delegates fairly elected and excluded from their seats? Did any of the delegates violate pledges, and deceive their constituents? Was any article, or section, surreptitiously inserted in the constitution? I have not heard of any of these things. And if the constitution was soiled with fraud and corruption, where is the proof?

A fourth objection is, the constitution was not submitted to the people for their vote of approval or disapproval. Answer, it was not necessary to submit the entire instrument. There is no principle in the theory of our Government, no constitutional or municipal law, no established, positive, and recognized rule, and there was no mandate to the convention from the sovereign people which was imperative upon them to submit any portion of it for adoption or rejection by their votes. It was not contemplated by the Legislature by which the law for holding a convention was passed over the Governor's veto. It could not have been contemplated by the people when they elected delegates to the convention, or they would have then made an expression of their wishes. There had not been a uniform rule of practice established by the action of other States. About as many had come in under constitutions not submitted to the approval of the people as under those submitted. Several of the States had held conventions and revised their constitutions, which they did not submit to the popular vote. In other cases, when they were submitted, the returns of the votes showed a large portion of the people did not take interest enough to vote, and they were adopted by minority votes. Even the Constitution of the United States was not submitted to a popular vote, but was ratified by a convention of the States respectively. Judge DOUGLAS (I quote him because he is one of the prominent leaders of the anti-Lecomptonites) did not think, in 1855, it was necessary to submit the constitution to the people for ratification. He reported to the Senate, and voted for, the Toombs bill, which contains no such provision.

The people of Kansas evidently acted on the universally recognized rule of representative governments, that, in all cases in which the people act through their representatives, their entire sovereign power over the subjects in reference to which the representatives are chosen to act, is vested in them. It is, however, conceded, if there be a reservation at the time the power is conferred, that will limit it. But in this case, there being no limitation, it was purely a matter of discretion on the part of the representatives, whether their action should be final and binding, or first be submitted to the approval of their constituents; and it must be as valid in one case as the other.

Mr. Chairman, what is the real controversy in Kansas? I mean the thing in which a principle is involved—a tangible substance, as contradistinguished from a mere chimera, conjured up by passion and prejudice, or from the vain imagining of ambitious demagogues. It is the naked question of slavery, and that alone. No one can doubt it who has been even a casual observer of events in that Territory and in this House since the Kansas territorial bill was first introduced in 1854, and in the States which have supplied the fuel and fanned the fires of fanaticism in and out of the Territory. "Free Kansas; no more slave territory; no more slave States," has been emblazoned on the Republican banners everywhere; and I may add, I have seen similar inscriptions on Democratic banners, posters, and newspapers in some of the northern States. Whether those who rallied under them deceived themselves, or were deceived by others; or whether there have been such gyrations and changing of front that some of those northern Democrats have found themselves unable to follow in the giddy whirl of the waltz, I shall not undertake to decide; but truth and justice require that I should say, I know southern men have been consistent on this subject.

But to the point: Slavery, slave oligarchy, slaveocracy, slave-drivers, northern dough-faces, the rights of man, all men were born free and equal, the rights of the white man, universal freedom, slave against free labor, the degradation of white labor, free States against slave States, Kansas was consecrated to freedom, bleeding Kansas, &c., have been the burden of most of the Free-Soil speeches during this discussion. A member from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the member from the Western Reserve in Ohio, another from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] and a member from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX,] and two, I think, from Michigan, avowed some days since, they would not vote to admit another slave State, even if a majority of the people thereof had approved a pro-slavery constitution. How many others have avowed or entertain the same sentiments I will not undertake to say. It is enough for my purpose that the facts referred to establish my proposition, that slavery or no slavery is now the only real issue in regard to Kansas.

Well, sir, the Lecompton convention, in the exercise of its discretion, submitted the slavery clause of the constitution to the popular vote, on the 21st of December last. The prerequisite of a registry was dispensed with, and "every white male inhabitant of the Territory," without regard to the length of time he had been there, had the right to vote. If the free-State men were in the majority, here was an opportunity for them to secure a constitution without the slavery clause; to silence the agitator, and put an end to all their strife. If they had voted down the slavery clause, I undertake here to say, Kansas would this day be a sovereign State of the Union; that she would have been admitted without opposition from southern men; and of course she would by northern men. But they still refused to vote. Out of six thousand seven hundred and ninety-five votes cast, only five hundred and sixty-nine were against the slavery clause, leaving a majority of five thousand six hundred and fifty-seven in favor of it. But it is said this election was fraudulent, which furnishes an additional reason why the bill for admitting Kansas ought not to pass. How was it fraudulent? and what right have the free-State men, who would not vote, to complain? It is alleged the board of commissioners, appointed by the Free-Soil Legislature elected in October, 1857, have investigated and found two thousand seven hundred and twenty illegal votes, leaving three thousand four hundred and twenty-three legal votes for the slavery clause of the constitution to five hundred and sixty-nine against, giving a majority in favor of two thousand eight hundred and fifty-four votes. It is not pretended there were fewer legal votes cast for than against. If a few hundred or thousand illegal votes were cast for the clause, it did not change the result. The slavery clause was elected, according to all rules of election, and had a right to the certificate.

In the mean time, acting Governor Stanton, alarmed at what he supposed real dangers, convened the Free-Soil Legislature. There may have been a preconcert of that party to excite the fears of the order-loving Governor, to produce this very result, and secure an opportunity of carrying out ulterior plans, which were in part developed by the passage of a law submitting the entire constitution to a vote of the people on the 4th of January.

It is obvious this move was the offspring of something beyond any merely odious feature in the constitution. They already had the opportunity of voting out the slavery clause on the 21st of December, if they had the numerical strength; and, although this discussion has been of unusual length and range, I have not yet heard any other clause designated as really offensive. Expunge the slavery clause, and I am sure the most fastidious Free-Soiler would be constrained to admit it would compare favorably with the Topeka constitution.

Then why did they refuse to vote on the 21st of December? I will not say it was because they believed they had not the necessary number to carry the election, and saw defeat staring them in the face. I care not for that. There was another cause to which I refer it. The Topeka constitution was the illegitimate but darling bantling of the leaders of this party. With fair speech and promise they had beguiled the people, and it had been unlawfully conceived, in hostility to the national and to the legally organized territorial government. Its birth was attended by—I will not say just here—treason and rebellion, but by their close resemblance. Having been born under such auspices, it was necessary at the baptismal font, in order to inspire confidence in its future usefulness, that its sponsors should bind themselves by doubly solemn vows. They staked their all upon it. And they heard by presentiment, the death-knell of all their hopes, in the Lecompton constitution. Governorships, secretaryships, seats in the Senate and House of Congress, the keys of the Treasury, judgeships, &c., they saw would vanish from their grasp as if by the influence of magic, and they would be discredited as mountebanks and cheats. It was necessary that something should be done. A counterplot was laid. They succeeded in getting a law passed to submit the entire constitution to a vote of the people on a different day from that designated by the convention for taking the vote on the slavery clause. They rightly calculated that the friends of the constitution having voted on the day appointed by the highest political jurisdiction known to our system of government, would not vote again on the day appointed by an inferior jurisdiction, which, in fact, then had no power over the subject; and that, consequently, they would on that day have everything in their own hands. By such means they hoped to involve the subject in multiplied intricacies; and, if they could not thereby come in at once under the Topeka, they might at least prevent Congress from recognizing Lecompton, and get the subject referred back to a new convention, when they might eventually succeed in carrying their measures.

They held their election on the 4th of January. The friends of law and order did not vote, and they profess to have voted down the Lecompton constitution by a majority of ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six votes. How many of them were fraudulent, we have no certain means of ascertaining. There has not been a commission to investigate the frauds, because it was unnecessary. But they held another election on the 9th of March, under an act of their Free-Soil Legislature, for the election of delegates to another constitutional convention; and I have learned, from a respectable source, that in Leavenworth city the entire vote was only six hundred and fifty, (though they had a contest between two tickets,) against eleven hundred and ninety-six polled on the 4th of January; a difference of five hundred and forty-six in one town only. I have also seen a statement in a respectable journal, that the entire vote polled in the Territory at the last election is estimated at from eight to ten thousand, against a much larger vote on the 4th of January. These figures indicate a suspicion of fraud, which is strengthened by the facts that the Free-Soil party has generally been beaten by their opponents; that in two elections, when they knew their opponents would measure strength with them, they refused to vote, although they knew, in each instance, if they had the majority, they could, by their fiat at the ballot-box, seal Kansas as a free State, and silence forever the voice of opposition. Nor is it unreasonable to suppose a party would be incited to frauds upon the ballot-box by leaders who have set themselves up in open hostility to the existing lawful government, the best on earth, securing equal rights to all, and have marshaled their cohorts to carry out their ambitious designs by the sword and the bayonet. Such facts raise a strong probability that a faithful investigating committee would make some startling developments.

But suppose at the election of the 4th of January, all the votes were given by legal voters, and that there is actually a majority in the Territory against the Lecompton constitution: ought the bill for the admission of Kansas under it to be

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Gooch.

Ho. OF REPS.

rejected? I answer, no. The constitution, as I have shown, was regularly, legally, properly made, according to law, to the forms, nature, and practice of our governmental system. It was ordained by the convention, clothed with the entire sovereignty of the people, as the constitution, subject to the approval or rejection by the people of the slavery clause. In the exercise of their sovereign power, they prescribed in the constitution the time and manner of its approval or rejection; and they could not be altered by a Legislative Assembly, the mere creature of the organic law of the Territory, without any sovereign power. If they had power to do it, they had the same power to alter any other provision, section, or article in the constitution. The establishment of such a doctrine would sap the foundation, and, at one blow, strike down all constitutional government.

The election of the 4th of January, was, therefore, without lawful authority. It was a mere popular assemblage and expression of opinion by those who took part in it. No one would be entitled to a legal redress for refusal of his vote, or liable to punishment for an illegal vote. It could not have any legal effect, or be binding on any one. It is but a naked absurdity to say it could legally invalidate or weaken the constitution ordained by the convention, and ratified by a lawful election of the people on the 21st of December.

But I have heard the position assumed that, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union," it is left to the discretion of Congress to admit them or not. And, although the vote of the 4th of January can have no other force or validity, it is an argument to Congress to control the exercise of its discretion. We are asked, will you admit the new State under a constitution which a majority of her people have condemned? Especially, will you do it in the face of the popular sovereignty doctrine of the organic act of the Territory? I answer, first: it is not the popular sovereignty of a mob, or of a promiscuous voluntary assemblage, brought together helter-skelter, without the authority of a valid law, which is recognized by that act or any other; but it is popular sovereignty according to legal rules. Second: there is not satisfactory evidence that a majority of the bona fide inhabitants, being legal voters, have condemned it. It cannot be proved, except by an election lawfully held, when all entitled have an opportunity and legal right to vote, and when those who are not entitled are answerable to the violated law for unlawfully voting. Such an election was not held on the 4th of January.

Third: I answer, even if there be a majority of the inhabitants of Kansas who oppose this constitution, they are not now entitled to be heard. They stood mute when they were invited to speak, and allowed others to answer for them, in favor of the constitution. And especially are they not entitled now to be heard, because they were and are in open hostility and rebellion against the general and territorial governments, disregarding and resisting the authority of the former, and attempting unlawfully to subvert the latter.

We have the evidence of Governor Walker and Governor Denver, in their official capacity, that this party has formed a military organization without lawful authority; that an enrollment of the militia of the Territory has been ordered by their leader, and every man who refuses to be enrolled for duty, to be separately registered; that they have received arms and munitions of war from the Abolition societies. Their forces have been actually in the field, marshaled and well drilled and ready for the onslaught. We have the authority of Governor Walker that they had established an insurgent government in the city of Lawrence, "in defiance of the territorial government, and denying its existence and authority;" had imposed upon their officers appointed, the duty of taking an oath to support the Topeka constitution, thereby overthrowing or ignoring the territorial government under the act of Congress; that they had distributed handbills of their proceedings throughout the Territory, "to incite other cities, towns, and counties, to establish insurrectionary governments, thereby placing the people of the Territory in open conflict with the Government of the United States." They have assembled legislative bodies, under the Topeka constitution, for the purpose of organizing a government under it, and have only been restrained from carrying out their plans and purposes by the presence of the United States troops. All this has occurred since Congress refused to recognize that constitution or the government under it, and since the United States Government has recognized the proceedings instituted by authority of the territorial government to form a State constitution. Still more recently, even since the commencement of the present session of Congress, and within the last few weeks, their Topeka Legislature has been in session, for the purpose of organizing and establishing their revolutionary government, in defiance of the United States and the lawful government under it. Well and truthfully did the President say, in his message of the 2d of February, that these people "have been in a state of rebellion against the Government;" that "they have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied the Government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority." What is rebellion? It is "an open and avowed renunciation of the authority of the government to which one owes allegiance, or the taking of arms traitorously to resist the authority of lawful government." Both of these things have been done by those people. And shall their wishes, expressed even while they are standing boldly out in open hostility and rebellion against the Government, control the discretion of Congress? control it in opposition to the wishes of the loyal, law-abiding citizens who have lawfully ordained and established a constitutional and republican government, which they ask you to recognize?

It is a wise principle, by which courts of equity are governed, that when a man invokes their jurisdiction in his behalf "he must come with clean hands." Enlightened statesmen will scarcely hold that it is not broad and comprehensive enough to be enforced by a great political jurisdiction. The Kansas Free-Soilers and Topekaists, with their lips and hands stained with treason and rebellion, invoke our action for their benefit, against the rights of those citizens whose conduct appears regular, lawful, and loyal. I hold they should be turned away, dismissed from court, and the loyal citizens allowed all the rights and benefits accruing from their obedience to law. The adoption of any other rule would be subversion of all good government, and would be the offer of a bounty to the depraved and lawless.

What higher claim upon Congress have those revolutionary people than have the Mormons of Utah, under the lead of Brigham Young? Yet, but the other day, by an almost unanimous vote, the House indignantly laid upon the table an address from them. And why? Because, while their words proclaimed obedience to lawful authority and loyalty to the Government, their treasonable purposes were shadowed forth. If, now, you comply with the wishes of the Topekaists, and shut your doors on Kansas, with her lawful constitution, you ought to apologize to Brigham and his followers.

Mr. Chairman, so far as Kansas herself is concerned, I care but little whether she is now admitted under the constitution or not. It may be that both parties there have acted improperly. I believe they have. I also believe it is a matter of but little or any consequence to the South, more than to any other portion of the country. Nevertheless, I believe the Lecomptonites, in forming and presenting us their constitution, have shown us they stand "rectus in curia," while it clearly appears the Free-Soil party are in the wrong. And I believe sound policy requires that we should settle this agitation in Congress and in the country without further delay. If the strife about slavery in Kansas is to be kept up, let it be confined within her own borders, and her own deliberative halls. There is but one way to do it speedily and effectually; and that is, by admitting her into the Union under this constitution. I have been gratified to observe within a few days past, in the St. Louis Republican, an announcement as follows:

"By passengers from Kansas we learn that the Territory was quiet in every respect, the general feeling of the inhabi-ants being to frown down any future attempt to create disturbances, whether beginning with parties North or South in principle."

I trust, and believe from information from other sources, that such is truly the state of feeling there; and if she is now admitted, agitation and strife will cease there, as throughout the whole country.

By admitting her under the bill as passed by the Senate, and now on your table, we shall not conflict with any principle contained in her territorial act. We shall "leave the people perfectly free (as they have always, heretofore been) to form and regulate (according to law) their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." If they, or any portion of them, have not exercised that right, in the proper time and manner, it has been the fault of those who now unwarrantably complain. They will not be deprived of any right by taking them into the family of States. On the contrary, they will be placed on higher ground, by being fully clothed with all the attributes of sovereignty. They will have a right hereafter, acting with the majority and under the authority of law, to alter and amend their constitution, by the exercise of their sovereignty.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that I may say, without being presumptuous, I have no party prejudices on this subject. It has been my aim to divest myself of sectional prejudices, if I have any, (and I do not claim exemption from the infirmities of human nature,) and arrive at such conclusion on the pending measure as would be likely to advance the best interests of the whole country, and such as my conscience will approve as right. And I feel assured that, when I can lay my hand on my breast and say, "hic murus aheneus esto," my constituents and the country will approve my course.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. D. W. GOOCH,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. GOOCH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to give some of the reasons which will control my vote on the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. I am glad that so many members of this House have placed on the record their reasons for the votes which they propose to give on this question, because it will enable those who may succeed us, and perhaps often be called upon to review our action in this matter, to learn not only the votes given, but the reasons which influenced the men who gave the votes.

Although eighteen new States have been admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the question whether the instrument presented, as the constitution of the State about to be admitted, was the will of the people, is now seriously raised for the first time. Many other and grave questions in relation to the admission of new States, have arisen at the time of their applications for admission, but they have all been adjusted without permanently disturbing the peace and harmony of the country; and I trust that the question now pending, relative to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, may be so decided that no principle shall be violated, and no wrong done, either to the people of Kansas or any part of our common country. And, as this question is a new and important one, it is our duty so to decide it that the decision which we shall make may be a safe precedent for the future.

I will state, at the outset, what seems to me should be our rule of action. When an instrument is presented to Congress purporting to be the constitution of a State asking admission into the Union, and any serious question is raised whether that instrument is or not the will of the people whose constitution it purports to be, it is clearly the duty of Congress to settle that question beyond all reasonable doubt, before the admission shall be made. And if, after proper investigation, the doubt shall still remain, it is the duty of Congress to remit that instrument to the source from whence it came, in order that the people may so frame their own constitution, and communicate it to Congress with such verification, that there shall be no embarrassment on that question; and until that has been done, no State can rightfully claim admission into the Union. In the decision of this question there are but two parties; one is the State asking admission; the other the Congress of the United States, with full power to accept or reject the application, as justice and equity may require.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Gooch.

Ho. OF REPS.

Now, sir, we have presented to us, through the President of the United States, the Lecompton constitution, claiming to be the embodied will of the people of Kansas asking admission into the Union under it. But along with this instrument, through different channels, come protests from the people of Kansas, alleging that it has not the sanction, and was not made by the people of Kansas, nor for the people of Kansas, by any duly authorized agent. And we are now called upon to decide whether or not this instrument is the constitution of the people of Kansas. This would seem to be a simple question of fact, and one easily ascertained and verified. And I think, if we could lay aside everything of party and sectional prejudice, and bring ourselves to a fair and impartial consideration of this question, a very little time and a very little investigation would enable us to decide it to our own satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of all fair-minded men.

I propose in the first place to inquire, for a moment, whether this constitution is, in fact, the will of the people of Kansas. This instrument was not submitted, and was not intended, by the convention that framed it, to be submitted to a vote of the people. And yet the President tells us in his late message that he took it for granted that the whole constitution would be submitted, and that that was the correct principle. It is the correct principle; the people have a right to examine the instrument which their agents have made for them, under which all their important institutions are to be formed, and under which they and their descendants are to live, perhaps for many generations, and to see if anything has been omitted which they wish inserted, or anything inserted which they wish omitted, and then decide whether, on the whole, they prefer to accept or reject it. This right is not, and cannot be limited to the acceptance or rejection of a single article in the constitution, however important that may be. And it does not belong to the President, nor to Congress, nor to any convention, to decide that there is or is to be only one important article in, or one important question decided by a constitution; nor which is the most important article in our question decided by a constitution. In a constitution everything is supposed to be important, or would not be there. In the same message to which I have already referred, the President tells us that the will of the people of Kansas on the question of slavery could only be authentically ascertained by a direct vote of the people. Now, sir, I want the will of the people on this whole instrument authentically ascertained. And I would ask the President if there is one method for authentically ascertaining the will of the people on the question of slavery, and another authentically ascertaining the will of the people on all other questions? I know of but one way of authentically ascertaining the will of the people on any question, and that is by giving them a full and fair opportunity to express it at the ballot-box. And I ask, and every member on this floor has a right to ask, that this instrument shall come to us, bringing along with it full evidence that it is the will of the people of Kansas duly authenticated, according to correct principles, before we admit her into the Union under it. But we learn from the recent message of the President why this whole constitution was not submitted to a vote of the people. He says:

"Had the whole constitution been submitted to the people, the adherents of this organization [the Topeka constitution] would have voted against it."

Ah! yes, and there were too many of them, and therefore the submission must be of only one article of the constitution, and that in such manner and form that the "adherents" would not vote at all, or if they should, it would not avail anything, as the character of the instrument would still be the same—it would still recognize and provide for the existence of slavery in the State of Kansas.

Now, sir, the President has undoubtedly assigned the reason, and the sole reason, why the Lecompton convention did not submit the whole constitution to a vote of the people. The convention knew before, as well the President did after the vote, that the people would vote it down, and therefore they would not submit it. But I should hardly have supposed that the President would have communicated this to us as a reason why we should admit Kansas into the Union under this constitution, unless he wishes us, by adopting the fraud and treachery of the Lecompton convention, to place the Congress of the United States on a level with it. We have been favored with very full communications from the President, relating to this constitution, covering the whole time, from the day of its inception until the time he transmitted it to Congress. And yet there is one important fact he has failed to communicate. He did not remember, or rather he "remembered to forget" to communicate to us, that this constitution had been submitted to a direct vote of the people of Kansas on the 4th day of January last, almost a month before the date of his message, in compliance with the law of the Territorial Legislature, and rejected by a majority of more than ten thousand of the legal voters of that Territory; a fact certainly well worth knowing in deciding this question, whether the vote was an authoritative one or only an expression of the estimation in which this instrument is held by the people of Kansas.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to know the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the power of the people of Kansas to amend their constitution prior to 1864, under the Lecompton constitution?

Mr. GOOCH. I will answer the gentleman before I get through, and if he will listen I will be bound that he shall be answered.

I will refer to one or two other facts to show that this instrument is not considered to be the will of the people of Kansas, even by those who ask us to admit her into the Union under it. I listened to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] when he addressed the committee, a few days since, on this question. And I saw that his remarks attracted the attention, and seemed to meet the approbation of the other side of the House. He used this language, (I quote from his speech, as reported in the Globe:)

"Suppose this is a bad constitution. Suppose that it admits slavery there, and that the people do not want it there. I do not believe that slavery can exist there; I have not an idea that it can; and as it cannot exist there as an institution, I should rather see it out of the constitution. I do not object to the existence of slavery in a State where the people desire it."

I quote this because it shows conclusively that those who ask us to admit Kansas into the Union under this constitution do not believe it to be the will of the people, nor suited to their condition. The gentleman says he does not believe that slavery can exist there—he had rather see it out of the constitution—and yet he does not object to the existence of slavery in a State where the people desire it, which means just this—the people of Kansas do not desire slavery, and therefore I had rather see it out of their constitution. Now, sir, I am in favor of gratifying the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and all of his friends, and giving to the people of Kansas an opportunity of taking slavery out of their constitution, and making it satisfactory to themselves. If anything more were necessary to fully establish this point, the fact that neither the President nor any other man who has advocated the admission of Kansas under this constitution has ever asserted that he did believe this constitution to be in fact the will of the people, would be sufficient. But we find, on the other hand, when we look into the communications of the President, and the discussions at this and the other end of the Capitol, that all the advocates for admission under the Lecompton constitution tell us that this is not a question of fact, but a question of law; involving the careful construction of organic acts and territorial statutes, the application of many legal principles and nice distinctions, and all the technicalities of the law; that the organic act conferred certain powers on the Territorial Legislature, and that the Territorial Legislature conferred certain powers on the Lecompton convention, and that these powers have been exercised, and therefore this is the constitution of the people of Kansas, and they are "estopped" to deny it, on account of their "laches," no matter whether it contains their will or not; that cannot even be inquired into. Now, sir, as I have before stated, there are but two parties to this question—one, the people of Kansas; the other, the Congress of the United States. And if it is not too absurd to talk about "estoppel" and "laches" in this connection, I would say that I supposed that estoppels could be pleaded, and laches taken advantage of only by a party to the record. Who does it here? Who puts in the plea, and claims the advantage? The people of Kansas cannot do it. The Congress of the United States certainly will not do it. Congress does not want to exclude the truth, and decide this question without full knowledge of the facts. Now, if we are unwilling, or any of us are unwilling, to investigate this question, it would be much more manly, ay, statesmanlike, to say we will not investigate because we will not, than to attempt to introduce here all the odious pleas of the courts of law, frowned upon even there, because so often used to defeat justice.

But, sir, let us examine this question, and see how it stands on the law as they present it. They assert, and must maintain, that the organic act conferred upon the Territorial Legislature full power to require the people of Kansas to decide, by a vote, whether they would have a convention to frame a constitution for them, and to provide for the choice of delegates, and meeting of the convention, which convention would have full power to annihilate the territorial government, and create another in its place.

Now, if the organic act confers this important power, where in the act is it to be found? I believe that it has been rather hard to locate. Some have found it in one section, others in another. The President found it, or rather inserted it himself, in a clause of the thirty-second section of the organic act, and quotes it in his late message, as follows: "Meaning," &c., "to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free" in framing their constitution, "to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." The words "in framing their constitution" are not in the act, but are interpolated by the President, in order that he may make the clause mean what it does not mean as it stands in the law, and thus enable himself to use it to sustain his own position. It seems to be a little enabling act that the President has inserted for his own benefit.

Now, sir, I have often seen forced constructions of statutes, but this is forcing the statute itself. I think that the offense is original with the President, and may well be designated as the rape of the statute. I believe it is now generally conceded that the President found this power in the wrong place. And it is only necessary to add further, on this point, that the clause quoted by the President, and all that stands in connection with it, does not, and was not, intended to confer any power on the Territorial Legislature.

But there is another clause, and only one other, in which they pretend to find this power. It is the first clause of the twenty-fourth section of the organic act, which is as follows:

"The legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of this act."

And wherever this power may have been before, I believe it is now authoritatively located in this clause by the majority report of the special committee of this House, to whom was referred the special message of the President, with instructions to fully investigate all matters pertaining to the Lecompton constitution. I am glad that its locality is fixed at last, for we shall see, as we go along, that this power did not get into the organic act, or if it did, did not begin to develop itself until the act was three years old, (about the time original sin and total depravity are said to develop themselves in infants,) and since that time it has been going from one end of the act to the other with such rapidity, that we have not been able to keep it in one place long enough to even look at it.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Gooch.

Ho. OF REPS.

Let us now consider for a moment whether the words "rightful subjects of legislation" in the clause above quoted, can be construed to confer power to make a constitution, and give to it force and vitality. But I wish for a moment to notice the distinction between a constitution framed and adopted by the people of a sovereign State, and the instrument framed and adopted by the people of a Territory for the purpose of admission into the Union under it as the constitution. The formation and adoption of a constitution by the people of a sovereign State is an act of sovereignty—an exercise of the highest power—of uncontrollable power. An act of sovereignty needs the approbation, sanction, recognition, of no other power to give it full force and vitality. Being supreme in itself, no other power can add to it or take from it. If any act can be annulled or limited, or in any manner qualified or restricted by any power superior to the power that did the act, it has not the attribute of sovereignty, and the power which did the act is not sovereign. Now, the instrument framed and adopted by the people of a Territory, under which, as their constitution, they ask admission into the Union, has in it no element of sovereignty until recognized by Congress. It may be the will of the people of the Territory duly embodied and expressed, and authentically ascertained; but it has, and can have, no force or vitality until recognized or accepted by Congress. It is in the nature of a petition, and it should embody the will and express the wish of the people of the Territory, and Congress are bound to respect it only as it does, in fact, embody the will and express the wish of the people. Through it the people of the Territory say to the Congress of the United States—you have the power, and we ask you to clothe us with sovereignty, by admitting us into the Union under this instrument as our constitution on an equal footing with the original States. Hence we see that this Lecompton constitution, even if it have both the authority and form of law perfect in every particular, (all of which I deny,) has not so much of majesty or sovereignty in it that we cannot examine it or inquire into it, and see whether it is what it purports to be. It is only a petition, and before we grant the prayer we certainly have the right to look into the situation of the petitioner. But do the words "rightful subjects of legislation" confer the power to provide for the formation and adoption of a constitution? The Kansas-Nebraska act itself repealed the Missouri compromise line, in order, as we are told, that the people of the Territory might have full power and control over all rightful subjects of legislation in the Territory. And we were then told that the control of the institution of slavery was one of the rightful subjects of legislation of the Territory, and, therefore, Congress had not then, and never had, the right to legislate so as to introduce it or exclude it from the Territory, or make any provision in relation to it; and the Missouri compromise, although it had all the sanctity of a compact, and had received the sanction and approbation of all the great men of the country for more than a third of a century, must be repealed, because it took from the people the control of one of the rightful subjects of legislation. And the doctrine then was that Congress never should interfere at all with any rightful subject of legislation in a Territory; and this was called popular sovereignty.

Now, sir, let us see what has been done or attempted to be done by the very men who passed this organic act which repealed the Missouri compromise, and gave to the people of the Territory full and entire control over "all rightful subjects of legislation," with at least an implied pledge on the part of the authors and supporters of the organic act that the control of none of these rightful subjects of legislation should ever be assumed or interfered with by the Congress of the United States while they have the power to prevent it. In July, 1856, the very men who passed the Kansas-Nebraska act, only a little more than two years before, framed and passed through the Senate an act entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," now commonly known as the Toombs bill, which the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who has just taken his seat, has so fully described to us. This act was also voted for in the House by the very men who now advocate the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, but failed to receive a majority, and consequently failed to become a law. Now, sir, this act, by its very terms, provided for a census of the legal votes of the Territory, an apportionment of delegates among the legal voters, the election of delegates, the meeting of a convention, with the power to form a constitution—all to be done under the direction of officers appointed by the President, or holding office under the United States Government, without the least regard to the legislative power of the Territory. Now, sir, was the power to provide for the formation of a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union, one of the rightful subjects of legislation given to the people of Kansas by the Kansas-Nebraska act? and if it was, what right, I ask, had the very men in the Senate and House of Representatives, who conferred this power on the legislative power of the Territory, to attempt to take it away?

And I ask, is it right—I do not ask if Congress has the power, but I ask the other side, is it right for Congress to take away from the people of the Territory one of the rightful subjects of legislation, whenever Congress deems it advisable to do so? And if so, then I ask, what has become of your boasted doctrine of popular sovereignty, which was to give to the people of the Territory every civil and political right which man could possibly enjoy under the Constitution of the United States, and, by removing the question of slavery from the Halls of Congress, was to introduce into the legislation of the country an almost perfect millennium, which was never to be disturbed?

I do not object to the doctrine that Congress has the right to control the legislation of a Territory when Congress deems it advisable to do so. I think that the power should be exercised only when necessity demands it. But do the gentlemen on the other side of the House agree to it? Now, sir, they must admit, that when they passed the Kansas-Nebraska act and thereby repealed the Missouri compromise line, they put forth to the people of the country and the world the allegation that they did it because that compromise line interfered with one of the rightful subjects of legislation of the people of the Territory, which ought not to be interfered with by any act of Congress, no matter how old or sacred it might be, merely as a pretense and excuse to justify that which they knew would admit of no justification; and that, in two years from that time they used all their influence and power to take away from the people of the Territory one of the rightful subjects of legislation, thereby branding themselves with deception; or else that the power to provide for the formation of a constitution preparatory to admission into the Union, was not conferred upon the legislative power of the Territory, as one of the rightful subjects of legislation of the Territory, by the organic act. Now, sir, if they accept the one, they establish just what I, and the men with whom I act, have always believed to be true; if the other, then the Lecompton constitution has no authority of law, and falls a dead letter.

But, again, sir, how shall we explain the fact, that the men who framed and passed the organic act did not know that this power was conferred upon the Territorial Legislature until more than three years after the passage of that act, and not until the necessities of the Lecompton constitution demanded that somebody should find it somewhere. I know that necessity has always had the reputation of being a hard master, and I do not think the task which he set those who were to find that power conferred by the organic act, will improve his character in that respect. He probably never had more dutiful pupils, and yet, I think that they are hardly satisfied with what they have accomplished.

That the organic act should contain within itself a provision giving to the Territorial Legislature power to provide for the entire overthrow of the territorial government, the making of a dependent province into a sovereign State, the abolition of all territorial offices, and the ousting from office of all the officers appointed by the President, all of whom, by the terms of the act itself, were to hold their offices for four or more years, unless sooner removed by the power that appointed them, and that that power should be so concealed for more than four years, that no man, not even the framers of the act, knew it was there until the peculiar necessities of the Lecompton constitution demanded that somebody should find it, and, when found, that it should be for so long a time in so many places at once, that nobody could tell exactly where it was, are among the many wonderful facts that have transpired in the history of Kansas.

I now propose to admit, for a moment, that the organic act does confer on the Territorial Legislature all the power claimed by the President, and then, from his own statements, show that the organic act has been violated, both by the Legislature and the convention. In his last annual message he states the matter thus:

"The act of the Territorial Legislature had omitted to provide for submitting to the people the constitution which might be framed by the convention; and, in the excited state of public feeling throughout Kansas, an apprehension extensively prevailed that a design existed to force upon them a constitution, in relation to slavery, against their will. In this emergency it became my duty, as it was my unquestionable right, having in view the union of all good citizens in support of the territorial laws, to express an opinion on the true construction of the provisions concerning slavery contained in the organic act of Congress of the 30th May, 1854. Congress declared it to be 'the true intent and meaning of this act, not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.' Under it Kansas, 'when admitted as a State,' was to 'be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission.'

"Did Congress mean, by this language, that the delegates elected to frame a constitution should have authority finally to decide the question of slavery, or did they intend, by leaving it to the people, that the people of Kansas themselves should decide this question by a direct vote? On this subject, I confess I had never entertained a serious doubt; and therefore, in my instructions to Governor Walker of the 23rd March last, I merely said, that when 'a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence.'"

Here we see that the Territorial Legislature, in the opinion of the President, had made an omission in not requiring the Lecompton convention to submit the constitution which they might frame to a vote of the people; that the public feeling was aroused throughout all the Territory, and the people felt that they were to be defrauded. The people were excited because they wanted the privilege of accepting or rejecting the constitution by a direct vote, and the President to meet "this emergency," came forward voluntarily and expounded the organic act through Governor Walker. And he tells us how he expounded the act, and why he so expounded it. He says he never had a doubt that Congress intended that the convention should submit the decision of the question of slavery—all that is meant by "domestic institutions" in the organic act—to a direct vote of the people, and therefore he expounded the organic act, quieted the apprehensions of the people, provided for the emergency, and made everything satisfactory, by saying, "Governor Walker, when a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the free expression of the popular will must not be interrupted either by fraud or violence." It was for or against the instrument they were to vote, not for or against one article of the instrument.

Now, sir, I wish to say just here, that no man with a particle of manhood in him would have submitted any instrument which that convention might have framed, much less such an instrument as the Lecompton constitution, to Congress, with the recommendation that they would admit Kansas into the Union under it, until the pledge which he had given to the people of Kansas had been redeemed in full; not even if John Calhoun had requested it. But, sir, the President has since told us, that when he used the words "constitution" and "instrument" in that part of his message which I have just quoted, he meant only the question of slavery, and that "domestic institutions" in the organic act meant only slavery. I once heard of a distinguished Spaniard, who, when he spoke of himself, always used the plural number, and took off his hat. Mr. Buchanan seems to have the same high consideration of esteem for slavery that the Spaniard had for himself. But we will take the matter just as he states it, with all his explanations of what he did mean, and what he did not mean, by what he then said. But I must say, that it looks very much as though he was now trying to cut down the meaning of his language to a fit for the Lecompton constitution, and I hardly think he has got it small enough yet.

His statement is now, in substance, just this: the organic act required that the people of Kansas should decide, by a direct vote on their constitution, whether or not they would have slavery for one of their domestic institutions. Now, sir, if this be so, ought not the Territorial Legislature to have provided that the Lecompton convention should submit that question to the decision of the people? And in that omission did they not violate the organic act? Whatever may be the answer to these questions there can be no doubt that the convention must make such submission as the organic act requires. The organic act requires, according to Mr. Buchanan, that the convention must submit the question of slavery—all that is meant by domestic institutions in the organic act—to a direct vote of the people. Now, was this done by the convention? If we strike out of the Lecompton constitution the article which the people have the power to strike out, does the constitution still provide that slavery may be one of the domestic institutions of the people of Kansas? If it does, then the decision of that question was not submitted according to the requirements of the organic act; for slavery would be one of the domestic institutions of the State of Kansas if it were stricken out, and it would be one of the domestic institutions if it remained. Now, if we strike out the article which the people had the power to strike out, the following still remains a part of the constitution: "The property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." And the President tells us, in his message, that the principle is the same, whether they are few or many. The only difference in principle, whether the article which the people had the right to strike out is in or out, is this: if it is in, the people of Kansas can import slaves; if it is out, they can raise them. Now, sir, I have never heard that slavery is not just as much a domestic institution in States where slaves are raised as in States where they are imported; and just as much a domestic institution in the States where the slaves are comparatively few, as in the States where they are a great proportion of the population. If this be so, and it most certainly is, then the convention did not permit the people of Kansas to decide, by a vote on the constitution, whether they would have slavery as one of their domestic institutions or not, and consequently violated the organic act; and by so doing took from the Lecompton constitution all authority of law.

I now pass to some of the principal reasons which the President presses upon us to induce us to admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The first is, that the people of Kansas will then be sovereign, and can alter or amend this constitution immediately, and at pleasure. Constitutions can be altered or amended only in two ways. If the constitution contain within itself a provision for its own alteration or amendment, it can be altered or amended by complying with that provision, and the terms of the provision must be strictly complied with at every step. This is regular process, because here is jurisdiction, and a strict compliance with the forms of law in the exercise of that jurisdiction, both of which are essential to regular process. A constitution can also be altered or amended by the people, acting either through their existing government, and in union with it, or in their primary capacity, and without the aid of the existing government; and in either case, so to speak, the people take their constitution into their own hands, and alter and amend it as they please, without regard to any provision which may have been in it before, and then reestablish it; and change or modify the existing government, or establish a new government, as the amended constitution may require. This is not regular process, but it is revolution. If the existing government coöperate, or acquiesce, and the people are united, or the opposition so inconsiderable that it offers no resistance, the revolution is a peaceful and rightful one—rightful, because the constitution is made more perfectly the will of the people by general consent; but if the existing government, as in the case of Rhode Island, or the people, or any considerable portion of the people, resist, and the changes in the constitution are persisted in, then it becomes a violent revolution—a revolution of physical force—and its success will depend upon the strength and will of the opposing parties, and its rightfulness upon the necessities of the case.

Let us now consider the condition of the people of Kansas, with reference to changes or amendments of this constitution, if admitted under it. They can amend it, according to regular process, by complying with the fourteenth section of the schedule, which is as follows:

"Sec. 14. After the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-four, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors, at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention, and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives; said delegates so elected shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

Now, if the amendments are to be made in accordance with the provisions of this section, the question of submission cannot be decided until after 1864, and the Legislature cannot provide for calling the convention and choice of delegates until after 1866; and consequently no amendment can be made for more than eight years from this time. It will be seen that two thirds of the Legislature must concur in the submission to the electors, and then there is a very ugly clause at the end of the section, in reference to "property in the ownership of slaves." Now, sir, if ever there is a time, in the life-time of a people, when it is all-important that they should have the power to regulate their own domestic institutions, according to their own interests and wishes, it is during the first few years of the existence of the State. It is during this period that all their important institutions spring into existence, and take upon themselves form and character which centuries afterwards cannot wholly change. And this is especially true of Kansas, increasing as she is in wealth and population. But the President proposes that they shall alter or amend this constitution by the other method, by revolution. Can they do it by peaceful revolution? Can they have the coöperation of the government to be organized under this constitution? The officers of that government were elected more than three months ago, and yet no man knows who they are, or are to be, if we except John Calhoun. And yet, one half of the Senators already elected will hold their office, and be able to control this matter, for more than four years. But does any man suppose that after all the power and restraint of the Federal Government are removed, the people of Kansas, surrounded as they are by those ever ready to interfere in all her elections when the question of slavery is an issue, can alter or amend that constitution without bloodshed and violence?

Does not the excitement, which even the discussion of this question here creates all through the country, fully demonstrate that no change could be made in this constitution by the people of Kansas, after they are admitted under it, by common consent? If we wish to see civil war in Kansas, I know of no way in which we can so surely bring it about as by admitting her into the Union under this constitution, and then telling her to alter or amend it. If ever there was a people on the globe that needed a constitution which should not be touched or altered for years to come, that people are to be found in Kansas. And when I read the President's message, wherein he informed us how readily and easily they could alter or amend this instrument, I could but ask what is the value of a constitution? Why have it at all? I had supposed that a constitution, and especially one just adopted, was to be stable and permanent; and I desire to commend to the President the definition of a constitution, given in a judicial decision by a judge of his own State many years ago. It is as follows:

"The constitution is the form of government, delineated by the mighty hand of the people, in which certain first principles of fundamental laws are established. The constitution is certain and fixed; it contains the permanent will of the people, and is the supreme law of the land; it is paramount to the power of the Legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the authority that made it. The life-giving principle, and the death-doing stroke, must proceed from the same hand. The constitution is the work or will of the people themselves, in their original sovereign and unlimited capacity."

"The constitution is the sun of the political system, around which all legislative, executive, and judicial bodies must revolve." "The constitution of a State is stable and permanent, not to be worked upon by the temper of the times, nor to rise and fall with the tide of events; notwithstanding the competition of opposing interest, and the violence of contending parties, it remains firm and immovable as a mountain amidst the strife of storms, or a rock in the ocean amidst the raging of the waves."

Such should be the constitution of a State; such should be the instrument which the people of Kansas should have when admitted as a State into this Union, unless we wish to see her baptized in blood even in her infancy, and the first principles of her fundamental laws delineated and established by the force and violence of revolution instead of by the peaceful decision of the ballot-box. And is the Lecompton constitution such an instrument? Does it indeed and in truth so contain the embodied and permanent will of the people of Kansas, that it will be stable and permanent, not worked upon by the temper of the times, nor rise and fall with the tide of events? Are its provisions and principles so firmly fixed in the hearts and affections of her people that they will withstand the competition of opposing interests and the violence of contending parties? Is this an instrument to which the anxious statesman and the trusting people can look in the hour of perplexity and danger, and say to party strife and contending faction, thus far canst thou go but no further; all beyond is safe and secure from thy sacrilegious touch? The President admits that the Lecompton constitution has not one of these qualities, and yet urges us to take it, misbegotten and deformed as it is, covered all over with the violation of every principle of law, truth, and justice, and force it upon the people of Kansas, and then let the passions of an outraged and maddened people alter and amend it to suit themselves. Shall we give heed to such suggestions, let them come from what source they may? Shall we listen to such recommendations from the man who demonstrates in his messages to us that he has misled and deceived this people, by using to them language which could not fail to mislead and deceive them, and which he now attempts to explain to us in a manner which would subject any school-boy to the discipline of his teacher in any well-governed school in the land? How happens it that this instrument comes to us through the President, accompanied by a special message? Why did we not receive it through the representative of the people of Kansas on the floor of this House? Did the President ask from John Calhoun the privilege of communicating this instrument to Congress, that he might again charge rebellion upon the people of Kansas? Or did John Calhoun prefer the President, of all men, as his instrument to communicate the Lecompton constitution to Congress?

I wish to notice one other reason given by the President in his special message to induce us to admit Kansas under this constitution. I quote from the last page of his late special message:

"In considering this question, it should never be forgotten that, in proportion to its insignificance, let the decision be what it may, so far as it may affect the few thousand inhabitants of Kansas, who have, from the beginning, resisted the laws, for this very reason the rejection of the constitution will be so much the more keenly felt by the people of fourteen of the States of this Union, where slavery is recognized under the Constitution of the United States."

And here we have, in a single sentence, the whole matter summed up by the President himself. And I will venture the assertion that, if he had not given this reason himself, but I had charged it upon him, it would have been hurled back as false by every friend of the President upon the floor of this House. If I had asserted that he did not care for or regard the interests or wishes of the people of Kansas, in the decision of this question, but that his object and purpose were to gratify the wishes of the fifteen slave States of this Union, it is true I should have said what I believe, and what the great body of the people believe, but could not probably have proved to the satisfaction of the President's friends without the aid of his own admission. I think that the motive which controlled the Lecompton convention in framing this constitution, as well as the President in submitting it, may be found in that part of his message which I have just quoted; and I am willing to leave both him and the Lecompton convention where they stand on the record. And I now ask the members of this House from the slave States if they now ask us to vote for the admission of Kansas under this constitution for such a reason? Will you vote for it yourselves for such a reason, or will you vote for it to avoid the danger, and dissipate the dark and ominous clouds which the President sees impending? Have you so much fear for your own safety, or the safety of your institutions, that you feel called upon to heed the suggestion of the President, and disregard the rights and interest of the people of Kansas in the decision of this question? And I would ask the Democrats from the free States if they will vote for the admission of Kansas, under this constitution, for such reasons as the President has given? Are you willing to disregard the rights of the people of Kansas, and the wishes of sixteen of the free States, because the people of fourteen of the fifteen slave States will feel the rejection of this constitution so very keenly? If you are, I must say that your charity not only does not begin at home, but it does not come home at all.

There is one other very grave objection to this constitution, which I wish to mention. I refer to the fraud and violence which have been perpetrated in all the elections in Kansas, and with which this instrument comes to us tainted. The small portion of time which remains to me will not permit me to dwell upon them; neither is it necessary that I should. They are fully established by the records of this House and the arguments of those who have preceded me on this question. We are now called upon to decide whether or not, by accepting this constitution, we will give encouragement and sanction to the bold and reckless men who are ever to be found in and around new Territories, where the restraints of civilized life are much less felt, and where the temptations to fraud and violence are much greater than in other parts of the country, to act over again, in other new Territories about to organize their governments, the scenes which have been witnessed in Kansas, and which have pained the heart of every good citizen in the land. If there is any one thing at the present day which demands the stern, uncompromising condemnation of the American statesman, it is fraud, and everything which has the appearance of fraud, at the ballot-box. If we wish to maintain the integrity of our institutions, we must guard well the purity of the ballot-box. The man who sanctions fraud or corruption at the ballot-box, in order that he or his political party may gain advantage thereby, is a thousand times more false to American institutions than was the greatest traitor to the cause of the Revolution. We have already seen that in one portion of our country this evil could be cured only by revolution and blood; and unless those high in office guard well this sacred repository of constitutional liberty, the evils which we have already witnessed in that locality will extend over our whole land, and in proportion to the magnitude of the evil must be the awful severity of the remedy. Sir, let every American citizen, whether in high political office or in private life, feel that he has committed to him, in the protection of the ballot-box, a sacred trust, and let him guard it well from foes without and foes within.

And in conclusion, I will say that I am satisfied that the Lecompton constitution is not in fact the will of the people of Kansas. I am satisfied that it has no authority of law which requires us to accept it as the constitution of the people of Kansas. I am satisfied that to admit Kansas into the Union under it, would be a gross outrage upon the people of Kansas, and a violation of all the principles on which our institutions are founded. I am satisfied it would establish a most dangerous precedent, the natural consequence of which would be much embarrassment to the Government in the organization and administration of other territorial governments, and innumerable evils to the settlers in the Territories. I am satisfied that the manifestation of a willingness on the part of the Congress of the United States to accept as the constitution of a people, about to be admitted into the Union, an instrument which contains the declaration—

"ART. 7.—Slavery.—Sec. 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

would not only be a lasting disgrace to this Government and the people of this country, but a blot on the world's history which all time could not efface. And I hope that we shall remit this instrument to those from whom we received it, and either give to the people of Kansas such enabling act as shall be suited to their condition and wants, or leave them to form a constitution at such time as they may choose, and transmit it to Congress with such verification that it is the embodied will of the people as shall fully authorize Congress to admit Kansas into the Union under it, on an equal footing with the original States.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. MILES TAYLOR,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I present myself to the House with somewhat of unwillingness at this time, and the more so because it had not been my intention to address it, it had not been my design to take part in this discussion until within the last two days, and I have not had the opportunity even of making any notes. But, Mr. Chairman, what has fallen from some of the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject in the latter part of the debate, and what has just fallen under my eye, which was spoken in the other end of the Capitol in the course of the debate there, have suggested to my mind some views which have a connection with the question which we are about to decide, and which I have thought it not improper for me to present, at this time, to the House, and through the House to the country. It is not my purpose to go into the argument in relation to the constitution presented to us as coming from Kansas; it is not my design to enter into the particular issues which have been brought before the House, in connection with what is now known as the "Kansas question." That question, as now presented to us, has been fully discussed by those who have preceded me, and it would be but a waste of time for me to attempt to go over it again.

My wish is to go beyond the apparent issue which we are now called upon to decide. The position of Kansas is but an incident in the progress of the great question which has agitated the Union for years, and the objection now made to the admission of Kansas is a mere pretext for the agitation of that great question. The slavery question, Mr. Chairman, is brought before us by the opponents of the admission of Kansas; and as that is the only question now really at issue, notwithstanding all of the shallow pretexts set up to conceal it, the only one which the people of the United States are truly called upon to decide, I shall refer to it, and then proceed to give utterance to my views with respect to the attitude of that question at this time, and with respect to the future which lies before us, which will soon be revealed to our view.

Mr. Chairman, this contest, of which the issue in relation to Kansas is the mere incident, dates back very far into the past. It is an agitation connected with the existence of slavery; it is true; but it is an agitation which had its origin neither in the spirit of philanthropy or in any peculiar feeling on the subject of that institution, but in the lust for political power. It is well known to this House, as it is to the whole country, that when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, almost all the States of the Union were slaveholding States. It is well known that after the adoption of the Constitution the people of the United States were divided into parties. The first division which took place related to the exercise of political power. We had upon the one hand those in favor of State rights, and in favor of restraining the action of the General Government within the narrowest limits; we had, upon the other hand, those who favored a strong and a consolidated Government. In the issue which grew up between them, it was the fortune of the whole South to take one side of that controversy, and the agricultural portion of the North went with them. At a subsequent day, a new arrangement of parties took place, in part influenced by the relations existing between this country and Europe. When the spirit of Democracy displayed itself in France, when a new system of Government was established by her people, a portion of the people of the United States sympathized with them. Another portion felt no such sympathies, but, on the contrary, their feelings were knit to the policy pursued by the mother country, which, allied with the other Powers of Europe, was then engaged in a contest against that new-born Republic.

In the divisions that followed that new state of facts the same circumstances occurred. The masses of the southern people were Democrats. A portion of the northern people were Democrats also. But another portion—those who were engaged in commerce, those who were under English influence, those who were connected with that policy that looked forward with satisfaction to a national debt, to a funding system—took the opposite side. These contests continued; and while they went on, State after State in the northern portion of the United States got rid of slavery; and why? Because there was any spirit of philanthropy abroad? Not at all. It was then a question looked at without excitement. It was a question which produced no agitation. Slavery was got rid of in State after State because it was no longer the interest of the people of those States to maintain the institution.

While these changes were going on this country was embroiled in a foreign war. That foreign war had the effect of associating all those who were engaged in commerce—which was peculiarly affected by the war—in one body, in opposition to the measures of the General Government. The great masses of the people, resident in the country, those engaged in agricultural pursuits, took the opposite side, and constituted the masses of the Democratic party, North and South, which had inaugurated the policy of the nation which gave rise to the war, which insisted on its vigorous prosecution, and which justified it after it was followed by peace. In the early years of the Republic, the political supremacy in the nation was vested in a party which embraced within its bosom nearly the whole agricultural portion of the community. This party, it is true, extended, at all times, throughout the North and South, but its greatest strength was always in the South, because the whole South was agricultural. The opposition to this party was composed of those connected with the other great interests of the nation, who were mostly inhabitants of the northern portions of the Union. When slavery had disappeared from the most of the northern States, the fact that the strength of the Democratic party was in the agricultural South suggested to northern politicians, who were discontented at their exclusion from political power as members of a party which was inferior in numbers, the idea of laying hold of the subject of slavery as one having within itself the elements for an agitation which would, at last, alienate the Democrats of the North from those of the South.

The first occasion for the use of this new-found source of political power was furnished when Missouri presented herself for admission into the Union. When discussion grew up in reference to the propriety of admitting that Territory as a State, as a member of this great Confederacy, opposition was made on the ground that slavery existed within her limits, and, although that was the only ground of objection, the point on which the battle was fought, it was boldly declared, by some of the greatest men that took part against her admission in that controversy, that the real contest then was one for political power. That was the declaration made by Rufus King in the various discussions to which the admission of Missouri gave rise in Congress. And is there a man, "with discourse of reason," who does not know that that has been the real cause of every contest of the same kind with respect to our Territories since that day?

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal said in reference to the future. It has been asserted that, in the progress of the nation, by its advances in population at the North, the South is to be overwhelmed. It has been asserted that the slave States are to be placed at disadvantage, and are hereafter to cease to have any influence in the direction of the policy of the General Government—to have any voice in the ordering of its affairs. It is attempted to be shown that that is so, by pretending that there is an antagonism between free and slave labor; and that, because of that antagonism, the slave States of the South will continue to advance at a slow pace, under the quiet influences of a peaceful, unambitious, contented industry; while the northern portions of the United States are hurrying on with the strides of a giant, who feels the first mad impulses awakened in his bosom by the dawning consciousness of his just-developed physical strength. The gentlemen who take that view—and certainly the immediate past justifies them in some degree in looking forward to such results—have gone further, and have asserted that this difference in the progress of the two portions of the United States grows out of the fact that man swells to his full proportions only where there is no slavery; that free labor is ennobling on free soil alone; and that where slavery exists, as in the South, there labor ceases to be honorable, and a deadly blight falls upon the free man who lives in its shadow.

Mr. Chairman, if we may be permitted to judge of the designs of men from their acts, as displayed by a long course of conduct in one direction, I think that I might, with great propriety, venture to assert that it is the single aim of those who are now, and have long been, at the head of the Republican organization—who direct and control all its movements, who give shape and complexion to all their schemes of party policy—to divide the people of the United States into two great sectional parties; to alienate the men of the North from the men of the South, by every art familiar to the demagogue. And why? For what purpose? I will tell you, sir. It is with the design of breaking the bonds that have hitherto holden together those men, no matter where found, who have acted together throughout the length and breadth of this mighty nation, for the purpose of carrying on the national Government with a single eye to the public good, and to the entire exclusion of all those influences which are perpetually struggling to exercise the powers of government to advance the interests of individuals or of particular classes, at the expense of the great masses of their fellow-men.

And how, sir, do these men prosecute their unhallowed enterprise? What are the means which they employ to accomplish their unholy purpose? Why, they are perpetually engaged in making the most wanton, the most malignant, assaults upon the institutions of the South, in glorifying the favored North, and holding up what they call the slow progress of the South, and contrasting it with the wonderful, the unexampled advances of the North, of late years, in population, public improvements, and wealth. And why is this? It is with the intent and design of humiliating the people of the South, by keeping the fact constantly before their eyes that they have been outstripped in the race for physical power and material wealth by their more fortunate brethren, and filling the people of the North with a lofty pride, an overweening self-glory, which alone disposes men to engage in that career of injustice and oppression towards their fellow-men, which these leaders have long been planning in secret, and which their hot haste to enjoy has now made them disclose before the time for their success had fully ripened. And besides this, these men are also engaged in filling their greedy followers, who hunger and thirst after the spoils of office, with the expectation that they must soon expel their opponents from the high places of the Federal Government, and enter into their permanent possession; because, say they, the hostility to the South which they have already succeeded in exciting by their arts, will continue to increase in the North, so as to make any further union of the Democrats of the North with those of the South impossible. Yes, sir, and these men even go further; they do not hesitate to assert that no more slave States can come into the Union, and that this feeling of hostility to the South will necessarily pervade the populations of all of the new States which must at no distant day be admitted.

Now, for one, I take an entirely different view in regard to these matters; and I think that all experience will satisfy any one that chooses to refer to the past and to look to the future, that there is a grave error lying at the bottom of all these assertions. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that at this time the North is advancing at a wonderful rate. She is increasing in population. She is increasing in wealth in an unexampled manner. She is increasing so rapidly, that the progress of the South, great though it is, seems to be want of motion. These gentlemen say that this difference grows out of the existence of free labor on one side, and of slavery on the other. To some extent, that, undoubtedly, has a connection with the relative progress of the two portions of the United States. But that connection grows out of its accidental effect in turning aside to some degree the streams of emigration which have flowed into the country for more than half a century, and not of anything in the nature or necessary effects of slavery itself as an existing institution. It is in that way, and in that way alone, that slavery has produced any effect in preventing the growth of the South.

When we look back at the past we see that up to the period when the political societies of Europe were so much disturbed and upheaved by popular commotions that great numbers of their people were compelled to emigrate, the progress of the South in population and in material wealth was more rapid than that of the North. But after civil commotions had disturbed the whole framework of society in Europe, there grew up that feeling of uneasiness which induced multitudes to flee from scenes of strife and carnage; to flee from scenes of distress; to flee from those countries that were to become the seats of war and of civil strife. And, as a matter of course, as all these disturbances took place in a northern climate, the population thus disturbed flowed into the northern portion of the United States, because it possessed the climate congenial to them and because there those pursuits with which they were familiar were followed. Scarcely any emigration tended to the South, and the progress which the South has made has grown out of the natural increase of her people and their steady prosecution of industrial pursuits. The North has been swollen by this mighty tide which has flowed in for half a century because of the political disturbances which have agitated the Old World, and which will now continue to flow on until the populations of the two hemispheres are equalized.

But, Mr. Chairman, our northern brethren should not exult because of the glory of their present situation. It is necessary for the statesman to look to the past and the future, as well as to the present. And he fails in his duty to the public, if he limits his view to the circumstances which immediately surround him, when he is about to determine upon the proper policy of a people—upon his course of conduct—because it is not what will suit to-day, but what will suit all future time, that ought to guide him when engaged in devising and establishing on a solid foundation the policy that is to govern mighty nations like this. Now, sir, whilst the northern States are in their present situation, whilst we have an immense national domain which is still unoccupied, labor will be honorable at the North; the man who labors, and earns his bread in the sweat of his brow, will be clothed in all the dignity of his nature. But am I to be told that that state of things which now exists in the North is to continue through the unlimited future? Mr. Chairman, the institutions of civil society which exist throughout the whole North are precisely the institutions of civil society which exist in England and France, which occupy a great portion of Europe, and pervade and control many of the nations of Asia. And what is the spectacle there presented? Wherever population is dense, wherever the soil is fully occupied, everywhere, turn your gaze where you please, you will find that capital has the mastery over labor; you will find that when those institutions operate upon freemen without let or hindrance until they have worked out and produced their final results, capital at last centers in a few hands, and it is the lot of the many to toil to swell the fortunes and minister to the enjoyments and luxuries of the few. Let us for one moment look at the position of Great Britain, and what do we see there? In the works of their great political writers who have looked at the relations between the members of the different classes of their society, what is the principle which is enunciated, and which all experience shows to lie at the foundation and to be the very basis, the substratum, of their whole social fabric? Nothing but this dreary, this dreadful, this unhappy truth, that in all crowded communities the sole recompense for labor is the means of living. In Great Britain you will find that that state of society which is founded upon institutions such as exist throughout the North, prosecuted through a series of years, when the people were in the possession and enjoyment of as much individual liberty as has ever fallen to the lot of any people that ever flourished upon this earth, has terminated in concentrating the soil in the hands of thirty thousand landholders, and has had the effect of producing a state of things in which ninety-five hundredths of the whole mass of the people that live and breathe and have their being within that mighty empire are but mere hewers of wood and drawers of water to their happier brethren who are in the possession of capital. By referring to their statistics, you will find that whenever any agitation takes place in the political world which has the effect of disturbing in the slightest degree the operations of trade, not thousands or hundreds of thousands, but millions of men are deprived of employment; and that they and their families have to suffer the pangs of hunger, and to pine and perish from want. Want in the midst of countless wealth—famine in the midst of piles and heaps of surplus food, owned and denied to their necessities by capital.

Now, sir, I have before me a statement, taken from a recent English work, giving details in relation to the history of their poor-laws; which shows that the public burden imposed upon the people of England and Wales alone, when they numbered but 9,000,000, amounted to the sum of $20,000,000 a year for the support of their paupers. And it appears from the same work that, when their number had augmented to 11,000,000 in 1818, these contributions amounted to the enormous sum of £9,500,000, or nearly fifty million dollars; and you will find further, by reference to these fearful statistics, that in England, that seat of philanthropy—England, which has been engaged in this crusade against southern institutions—England, which has been the stimulator of our northern brethren to engage in warfare upon us—in England, with a population of about 15,000,000, in 1840 1,200,000 persons were supported by the hand of public charity; that in 1841 there were nearly 1,300,000; and that in 1842 the number had swelled to 1,500,000.

But when you turn to Ireland—unhappy Ireland!—what is the spectacle presented there? When political difficulties, when commercial difficulties disturb industry, she always suffers; but when, in addition to these causes, Nature withholds her kindly influence, and there is a partial failure of the crops, Ireland, unhappy, downtrodden Ireland, always suffers almost beyond the limits of human endurance. What, sir, has befallen Ireland within our own day? I refer the House to the details given—and they are of a character to move the heart of any man—in the work of Sir George Nichols on the history of the poor-laws of Ireland. It will be found, that because of the destitution following on the failure of the potato crop in 1845 and 1846, a great portion of her total population, then exceeding eight millions, were dependent on the Government for the means of escape from starvation. "In July, 1847," says this writer, "the system [of extraordinary relief] reached its highest point, and 3,020,712 persons then received separate rations, of which 2,265,534 were adults, and 755,178 were children!"

In 1848, we learn from the same writer that 2,043,000 persons were relieved from the pressure of famine; and that, in 1849, the number had increased to 2,142,766. What a sad, what an afflicting spectacle! A free people, in possession of one of the most fruitful countries that the sun shines on in his daily round, a population as industrious as any the world ever saw, and in the full enjoyment of that inestimable privilege, the unlimited right of disposing of their labor at their own will and pleasure, were subjected, during the course of more than three years, "to all the ills that flesh is heir to." Yes, sir, during the whole of that time they suffered from famine, from pestilence, engendered by want of food, from all the evils which necessarily overwhelm the toiling millions of mankind, no matter how free they are, when overtaken by circumstances like those referred to. And then, sir, they perish away from the very face of their native earth, in the presence of their usual employers, because to them has been applied the principle of that state of society—that "the recompense for labor is the means of living"—and that inexorable rule which goes along with this principle—that nothing is due from capital to the laborer but in exchange for his labor. Who can realize all this without shuddering at the mere thought of the agony which wrung the hearts of that free but suffering people? Why, sir, in that time of calamity, nearly one entire fourth of the free sons of Ireland sunk into the grave. The fearful statistics are here. The population, in 1841, amounted to 8,175,000; in 1851, the population had fallen to 6,500,000. The census commissioners, in their report on that subject—which is quoted in the work referred to—say, after stating that the number who had perished amounted to 1,622,739:—

"But this being merely the difference between the number of the people in 1841 and 1851, without making any allowance for a natural and ordinary increase of population, conveys but very inadequately the effect of the visitation of famine and pestilence."

"We find that the population of the 30th of March, 1851, would probably have numbered 9,018,739, instead of 6,522,385, and that, consequently, the loss of population, between 1841 and 1851, may be computed at the enormous amount of 2,496,414 persons."

What is the position of France? I have before me a statement contained in a work which ought to be good authority, as it was dedicated to a gentleman who was at the head of this movement which aims to strike at southern institutions, and for years the head of the British Government—Sir Robert Peel. It is a book published in 1844, and the writer of that work, which was then published in London, and is to be found in our Congressional Library, examines the condition of France.

It is stated in this work that France, at that time, contained above 34,400,000 inhabitants who were disseminated over the country; not as in England, congregated at many points in large masses. This population, exclusive of 1,855,000, who were said to be paupers, was then divided into classes, as shown in the following table, which will be found on page 91:

	Masters, &c.	Servants, Workmen.
Agriculturists.....	1,394,000	16,246,000
Tradesmen.....	1,168,000	5,812,000
Manufacturers.....	764,000	3,426,000
Total	3,326,000	26,084,000

And the writer of this work goes on to remark that—

"The result of this subdivision is that the three classes are now reduced to two. The first, composed of 3,326,000, devoting their capital, and their intelligence to the pursuit of agriculture and industry, are, in some sort, independent. The second, amounting to 26,084,000, have no other capital than their bodily strength, which they let on hire to those who compose the first. This is the working class, owing their daily bread to their daily labor, and precluded, by their poverty and their occupation, from all participation in municipal or political action. Add to them the poor, the indigent, estimated at 1,855,000, and we have a total of 27,939,000 individuals completely shut out from civic life; in one word, the French Helots."

And now let us turn to still another country which displays the workings of the ordinary institutions of civil society; when, existing in the midst of denser masses than are anywhere met with in European countries, which are in the legal enjoyment of the most unrestricted, unlimited freedom. Let us glance at China, one of the largest empires which ever existed upon the face of the earth. What is the spectacle presented there? I hold in my hand a paper which I have transcribed from the recent work of the Abbé Huc. I read his words:

"At all epochs, and in the best governed countries, there always has been, and there always will be, poor; but unquestionably there can be found in no other country such a depth of disastrous poverty as in the Celestial empire. Not a year passes in which a terrific number of persons do not perish of famine in some part or other of China; and the multitude of those who live from day to day is incalculable. Let a drought, or an inundation, or any accident whatever, occur to injure the harvest in a single province, and two thirds of the population are immediately reduced to a state of starvation. You see then forming themselves into numerous bands—perfect armies of beggars—and proceeding together, men, women, and children, to seek in the towns and villages for some little nourishment, &c. Many fall down fainting by the wayside and die before they can reach the place where they had hoped to find help. You see their bodies lying in the fields, and at the road side; and you pass without taking much notice of them, so familiar is the horrid spectacle."

"Why is it, then," it may be asked, "if communities composed entirely of free men are subjected to such terrible evils, elsewhere, by the mere workings of the institutions which characterize all civilized society, that they do not now show themselves in the northern States?" The answer, sir, is simple. The existence of a vast public domain has hitherto prevented the development of the results necessarily growing out of the social system now existing in the North. When our western wilderness is peopled, when population becomes dense within the limits of the northern portions of the United States, then, I say, the state of things which now exists in England, the state of things which exists in France, the state of things which exists in China, will spring into existence there, because it is, sooner or later, a necessary result of the existing condition of their social fabric. It grows out of an absolute, an iron necessity, entailed upon all crowded communities by the undisputed mastery of capital over labor. And I would say to my northern friends that if, instead of wasting their time in carrying on an unjust warfare against their brethren in the South, they were to direct their energies to the investigation of the causes of this state of things, and if they were to exert their ingenuity for the purpose of devising some means by which labor could be put upon a footing of equality with capital, they would be doing the world some service, and would deserve well of their fellow-men through all time. But they will not attempt to do that, as long as they are warring upon a state of society in which the dignity of labor is now maintained, and in which alone it always will be maintained.

In Europe, where all the people are nominally free, the great and broad distinction which obtains, is a distinction between those who have capital and those who have none; between the men of money, and those whose only capital is their "bone and muscle," their capacity to toil, and who are dependent for the barest means of subsistence upon the employment which is furnished to them by the men of money—those who possess capital. No matter what may be a man's worth; no matter what may be his moral qualities; if his poverty compels him to discharge menial offices, that man stands there in an inferior position. And now, let me ask my northern brethren if this feature of European society is not displaying itself among them? Is not the man engaged in the performance of menial services—is not the man who labors for his daily bread, who wins it day by day by honest toil, looked upon to-day, in every northern city, in every northern village, in every northern hamlet, as inferior to their happier and more prosperous brethren? Are they not spoken of familiarly, most familiarly, as belonging to the lower classes? I know it is so. Sir, I honor labor with my whole heart; and my bile has been deeply stirred there by the slights which I have often seen the "curled darlings" of fortune put upon their less favored brethren.

But this can never be in the frame-work of southern society. Such can never be the state of things in the frame-work of any society in which slavery exists as it exists in the southern States, where a different and an inferior race is subjected to thrall-dom. There all menial offices are performed by this inferior race. My northern brethren seem to think that labor is without honor in the South. I say it is the only portion of the United States where it receives due honor. In the South the white man's labor is made use of, and it is as successful as it is in the North. It is directed to what is necessary. White men till their fields; white men push the plow; white men work at the anvil; they build our houses, and carry on all the legitimate operations of mechanics. The white man at the South is still a white man, and belongs to the governing and superior class; and no matter what may be his poverty, he is the peer of his fellow-man. If you go beyond the confines of our southern cities, in which the same vicious state of society exists as is to be found in the northern capitals, and in all European cities and communities, you will find that our planters, the men of the greatest fortunes and the largest capitals, meet with their fellow white men, poor though they be, though their days are passed in honest toil, whether it be in the fields, or in the work-shop, in our public meetings, and in our public social entertainments, upon the footing of the most perfect equality. I speak with knowledge; I speak of scenes which have been presented to my eyes day after day in my own State, in my own neighborhood, in my own circle. In the North those men would be spoken of as persons belonging to the lower classes. At the South they are high-minded, honorable men, with as much claim to public consideration as he who lives in the midst of luxury; who wields millions.

When I look to the future, I see that the day will come when these evils which follow upon a dense population of freemen living in that state of society which exists in the western, the central, and the southern portions of Europe—in all Europe, indeed, except Russia—which exists in rich, prosperous, and powerful England, will be inflicted upon the North as the inevitable consequence of the prevalence of the principles necessarily involved in the workings of their existing social institutions. No such evils, however, can ever afflict the South so long as that domestic institution which has provoked both European and northern hostility for more than a quarter of a century shall continue to exist among her people as a part of their social organization. And why? Because that class which makes up the masses of mankind where population is dense, and whose condition of complete and perfect dependence upon the calls of capital, though the law declares them to be absolutely free, whose common and almost unchangeable destiny is so sadly yet eloquently told in the fearful sentence, "the recompense of labor is the means of living"—that class, I say, has no existence in her social system.

Wherever that necessity which knows no law reduces the masses of free men, who are subjected to the pressure and restraints of civil society in the over-crowded communities of the world, to become the hevers of wood and the drawers of water to their more prosperous brethren, they are inevitably oppressed, ground down, crushed, hopelessly, beneath the weight of the most dreary of all despotisms—that of capital. When the unhappy subjects of this despotism in free and enlightened and philanthropic England, in joyous and heroic France, in teeming China, have work, and are able to work, they can only hope to barter their daily toil for their daily bread; to exchange their present labor for present subsistence; but when there is no work for them, or they are unable to work, no matter from what cause, what then? Why, sir, they are left naked and helpless in the stern gripe of that relentless, un pitying foe, which never, for one moment, ceases to keep close upon their track—grim, remorseless, exterminating want. But it is not so with the common laborer of our social system in the South. The African, the black slave who occupies that position there, is at least free, and always will be free, from the tyranny of capital. He makes a portion of capital. It uses him, it is true; but it also nourishes and protects him, as well when there is no labor for him, or when he is unable to labor, as when he labors; and he is not destined to suffer from hunger, or from cold, or even liable to be deprived of the little comforts and pleasures that cheer his humble lot in life, because of the vicissitudes of trade, the uncertainty of the seasons, or deficient harvests.

But, sir, this is not all. The existence of this class, say what you will, gentlemen of the North, has the effect of ennobling and giving dignity to the laboring white man. Labor though he may, and no matter in how humble a position, he is still white. He belongs to the governing, the superior class. In law, he is not only the peer of the master of the slave, but if he possess intelligence, good manners, probity of character, he is everywhere recognized, socially, as the peer of his neighbor, whatever may be that neighbor's superiority in wealth or in the extent of his possessions. In the South, Mr. Chairman, labor does not degrade the white man, but the white man elevates labor. The same disparities in fortune exist among white men in the South as elsewhere; but they do not there give rise to the same distinctions in rank which always result from them where slavery does not exist.

And not only is the laboring white man more honored, and his labor more honorable, under our social system in the South, than elsewhere, but his labor is of a kind which exempts him, in a great degree, and will always continue to exempt him, from the fluctuations which have been, and always will continue to be, the curse of the laborer under a different social system. The species of labor which requires mere thews and sinews—physical strength, directed by the most ordinary human intelligence, is, with us, rarely performed by the white man. That is done by the inferior race, while the laboring white man is called on to perform the work that puts in requisition intellect and skill—mechanical aptitude, care, judgment, faithfulness. And as all labor of this kind is necessarily the helpmate of capital and not its subject, the demand for it is far more steady, and the laborers who supply it are comparatively free from the terrible evils which so frequently afflict all of the other classes of free laboring men.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have not more time, for I would like to speak upon this subject at length. But, though I have treated it in a hurried manner, I trust that I have said enough to show our northern brethren that they are in error when they assert that our social system in the South degrades labor, and debases the laboring white man. And I trust that I have also said enough to make those who are willing to look at what the past has imposed on other countries, and to divine from that past what the future will fasten upon us, to consider dispassionately and well whether there is any reason why the statesman and philosopher should look to the North in the boundless future with that spirit of exultation which the leaders of the Republican party have been so long accustomed to display in these Halls; or whether there is room for any well-grounded apprehension that the social system of the South is less favorable to the perpetuation of well-ordered republican government, or to the progress and advancement of a great nation in everything that concerns the freedom, equality, and permanent happiness of her people.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, turn to the other subject to which I before referred, and proceed to show that the expectations of the Republican leaders, that the South is to be crushed out, that her people are to be deprived of all voice in the direction of the public policy and business of the country, because nearly all of the States which will be hereafter admitted into the Union will be hostile to her, are as unfounded as the representations to which I have already called your attention, with respect to the effects of slavery, were erroneous.

The members of that party, which is arrayed in a solid body against the South, speak as if the South were about being pushed to the wall; as if we are to lose our weight in this Republic because of this crusade against us, which has been so long preached by the brawling apostles of free soil to a portion of the freemen of the North. Why, sir, a grave Senator, at the other end of the Capitol, announced from his place the other day that there had been a war waging for a long time between the two sections of the Union, and that the battle had been fought and won. And that honorable gentleman, after rubbing his hands together in great glee at the important announcement, seemed to look into the future as though he saw the South already in his clutch.

Mr. Chairman, when I look to the future, I see a different sight. I remember that there is only a small portion of territory still to be occupied by our people that is the peculiar domain of our northern brethren. Within a few, a very few years, the only new States presenting themselves for admission into this mighty family of nations will be States which have been established, which have grown up on the waters of the blue Pacific.

Will their people have this feeling? Will they have the institutions that will make them join our northern brethren in their warfare upon us? I believe not. I conceive, sir, that their position will be widely different from that which has been assigned to them in fancy by the Senator from New York, and by his coworkers, his partners that are to be in his approaching greatness.

Looking to the west, across the vast Pacific, Asia lies in view—Asia which furnishes from her teeming millions, those thousands upon thousands of the free poor, dogged by want and destitution, which philanthropic England and philanthropic France are now engaged in bringing from their homes, in obedience to the demands of their planters in their tropical colonies, to fill, as indentured apprentices, the places in their cane fields which had been before occupied by slaves, of which their previous philanthropy had deprived them. Yes, sir, which furnishes the coolies which, under the protection of their laws, and of their flags, are transported to the cane fields of the West Indies, of Mauritius, and wherever else there are a soil and a climate favorable to the growth of tropical productions.

From that continent mighty streams of emigration will certainly flow in upon our western Territories. And what, let me ask, must be the inevitable results of that emigration? The population thus thrown in upon them is of such a character that it cannot assimilate with the people inhabiting the United States. They are foreign to them in habits, foreign to them in their feelings, foreign to them in their religion. They are of a different race and of a different nature. If they are admitted as equals, they would soon constitute a majority of the inhabitants. And what then? Would they not proceed to carry out their own views? to adopt their own civil institutions? establish their own religions? and to set up their manners and habits and usages? Certainly they would; and if admitted as equals these strangers would soon fill those vast territories, destined, as I hope and trust at no distant day, to be great seats of American empire, and Christianity would give place to Buddhism and to the worship of the god Fo, and of the long list of other idols that figure in their heathen mythology. The ministers of the meek and lowly Jesus would give place to the bonzes, and to the varied tribes of ignorant and besotted priests, who bow down before the misshapen and monstrous images of their gods; and the civilization, refinement, and elevated philosophy of the white races of Europe and America who now people those shores, would be trodden out by the pagan barbarism of the yellow races of Asia.

And now, sir, let me ask, is there any one who is disposed, in order to gratify the sickly sentimentalities of Exeter Hall, or the fanatical and ferocious dogmas of the Tabernacle, or the fine-spun theories of those who back the Kansas-shriekers of the North; is there any one, I say, who would stand idly by and permit such a wrong to be done to all true religion and civilization? I think not. And for one, sir, I do not hesitate to believe that it is both the right and the duty of the people there to look to it in time, and apply the needful remedy. Their position will force this question upon our brethren who are in possession of the almost boundless regions beyond the Rocky Mountains. And, sir, they will be compelled, by a political necessity, to decide it in favor of the religion, the morals, the civilization, and the refinement and manners of the white race.

No, sir; our brethren there will have no choice. They must recognize the fact which the Almighty stamped upon these races when he created them inferior to the white man, and refuse to regard them as equals, or to admit them to the enjoyment of any of the political rights now freely accorded to our fellow white men who come among us to find new homes. I do not claim the spirit of prophecy, but I will venture to say this: that in my day, and before half a dozen years shall have passed by, it will have become the settled policy of the people on the Pacific slope to refuse to permit the individuals of the Asiatic races who come among them to become members of their political society; to deny to them the right to enjoy any of the political privileges or immunities accorded to citizens of the United States. There will be a discrimination against them because of their race. They will, in all likelihood, be subjected to the operation of the same system of laws which England has established in the Mauritius and Trinidad and the West India Islands, and which France is seeking to establish everywhere.

What is that condition of society? The position of the people who are the subjects of this system of policy is one of inferiority; it is one of vassalage; it is one of quasi slavery. But whatever it may be, and however philanthropic England and imperial France may expatiate upon its civil advantages and moral beauties as contrasted with slavery, one thing is certain: the people among whom it exists will have no sympathy with that feeling which has displayed itself in many portions of the North. It will be found that among these people a new spirit will be born. And that spirit, sir, will be nourished by the streams of emigration and by the tide of commerce setting in on these shores, until it has swelled and expanded itself so as to fill the whole Pacific coast. It will ascend the valleys of the western slope. It will climb the Rocky Mountains; and when it has reached its summits, and its colossal proportions and its glorious features are displayed to our gaze as it casts its first glances to the eastward, the demon of fanaticism will stand rebuked, and the fell spirits of sectional hate and civil discord will cower under its majestic presence and flee forever from our confines. Then, Mr. Chairman, and then alone, will we again become a united people.

For myself, Mr. Chairman, when I look to the future I feel persuaded that the leaders of the Republican party will be defeated in all of their deep-laid schemes; that an irresistible, an overruling necessity will soon repulse their ambitious attempts, and put a stop to this crusade against us. I feel, sir, that there is a Divinity above us, the great Disposer of human events, who —“shapes our ends, Rough hew them how we will.”

If we pass this crisis in safety, as I trust in God we may, what I see in the future makes me feel that we shall soon become the greatest people that the world has ever seen. We shall then be in a condition to grasp the rod of empire which lies within our reach; and then, sir, moving along the highway of greatness, this mighty people will sway the destinies of the whole civilized world. And if they themselves continue under the guidance of that wisdom and moderation which have hitherto distinguished their policy towards other nations, they will be enabled to discharge that high mission which the Almighty has, as I believe, imposed upon them, for the future good of the whole human family.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. ABRAM B. OLIN,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

MR. OLIN said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: I am well aware of the embarrassment which every man must feel who rises to address the House at this stage of the discussion on this important question. No talents, however commanding; no acquirements, however extensive, would probably command the attention of any respectable number of the House. Were I to consult my own wishes, I would content myself with giving a silent vote on the question when it comes to be presented to this House for decision. But it is due, in part to the people whom I represent—knowing as I do that my convictions of duty in regard to this measure correspond entirely with theirs—that their views should be expressed on this floor. It is due, also, to the expression of both branches of the Legislature of my State, as contained in their resolutions introduced into this House protesting against this measure, that I should speak in regard to it. I do not suppose that I shall be able to present this question in any new or striking light, or to give the House any information on this subject which it does not already possess. In reference to any practical results to be attained by further discussion of this question, I am very much of the opinion of the editor of the Washington Union, a paper which I seldom read, but which I happened to lay hold of yesterday, and which contained the following:

"Forty set speeches in the House—forty hours of easy-reading in a deliberative body—forty lay sermons on politics in Congress! Why, it is worse than forty years in the desert, or forty days fasting in Lent, or the horrors endured by the forty thieves in their forty jars when the hot oil was poured in upon their frying bodies and souls."

Now, in most of that I concur with the editor of the Union; and there is but one affliction, in my judgment, that a man could be subjected to, which would be worse than having to listen to speeches upon this subject on this floor, and that would be if a man were condemned to read the editorial effusions of the Washington Union by the hour. [Laughter.]

The President tells us, in the remarkable message that accompanied this constitution, that there is a strange delusion existing in the country in reference to the affairs of Kansas. Now, sir, if that message contains a truthful representation of the affairs of that Territory, there is indeed a strange delusion, and that delusion exists with entire unanimity among the people whom I represent.

Sir, the plain scope and tenor of that message is, that from the time of the formation of the government of that Territory, a large portion of its inhabitants—actuated by no conceivable motive, except such as is ordinarily charged in common-law indictments, "instigated by the devil"—have been in open rebellion against the territorial government, and have been endeavoring to subvert that government. No fact, no circumstance is alluded to in the message, which is claimed to justify, palliate, or excuse resistance to the lawful government. Now, who does not know that a statement of that description is an untruthful, prejudiced, partisan, and false statement of the affairs of that Territory? Sir, there is a maxim in law, which is equally true in morals, that oftentimes the suppression of truth is equivalent to a falsehood. Who does not know, without reference to a single fact outside of this paper, that this message is not only a libel upon the people of the Territory, but a libel upon human nature itself? There never has been found—there never will be found, while human government remains but "the badge of lost innocence"—a people who have rebelled against an established government, from the mere love of rebellion. Men commit crime; the world is full of it; but they have the ordinary motives of crime. The President, however, in his view of the affairs of the Territory, has not found any motive or excuse which is claimed to palliate the conduct of that people.

Mr. Chairman, I trust I have a becoming sense of what is due to the Chief Magistrate of this Republic. When I reflect that he occupies his present proud position by the voluntary choice of the people of this Republic, I bow to their majesty, and have toward the object of their choice no other feeling than that of reverence and respect. But when I read this message, when I remember the history of the people of Kansas and their countless wrongs, when I remember under what pretenses the Missouri compromise was stricken down, when I remember the pledges that were made in his name, when I remember the delusive plea that was set up of popular sovereignty—that this was a great Democratic measure, that the people were to be left entirely free to form their own institutions and to manage their affairs in their own way, and the promise that all the powers of this Government should be exercised, if need be, to secure those rights, when I know and see that all these pledges have been shamelessly violated—when I remember all these things, it is difficult to restrain a feeling of something like indignation at this message, and of contempt for its author; and I think that that feeling animates the breasts of a vast majority of the American people at this hour.

I do not intend to discuss the merits or demerits of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. As a question of policy originally it never received my approbation, and had I had an opportunity to vote upon it, it never would have received my assent. I am one of those who believe that Congress has power to govern the Territories of the United States, and that it can never safely dispense with the exercise of that power. It was claimed before the people that this Kansas-Nebraska bill contained a new revelation on this subject—that it embodied the great principle of popular sovereignty—that great principle that lies at the foundation of our Government, and ought to receive the sanction of the people of this country. But, sir, that principle was never contained in the Kansas-Nebraska bill. It never was designed to be put there originally, and so far as it was claimed to have been there, we charged upon its authors that we believed it to be a fraud, and an intentional fraud; and the history of the country, I think, has shown that that charge was not only made in good faith, but that it was true. So far from containing the principle of popular sovereignty, it withheld from the people the exercise of certain essential and fundamental rights, without which no popular sovereignty ever could exist, and without which there was nothing worthy the name of free government. Why, sir, we knew, the country knew, everybody knew that bill contained the machinery which, in the hands of corrupt and venal men, would enable them to control the affairs of that Territory, irrespective of the wishes of the people. What rights were withheld from them? The election of their Chief Magistrate. If they were fit to govern themselves, and to frame their own institutions, certainly they were fit to elect this officer, an officer possessed of a large and discretionary power. Not only was the election of their Chief Magistrate withheld from them, but judges were appointed for them over whom they had no control, and who were in no wise responsible to them.

I have said thus much, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the policy of that measure, because the persons opposed to the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution have been charged on this floor with becoming all at once the champions of popular sovereignty.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss, at some length, the power of Congress to govern the Territories of the United States. I deem this proper in reference to the manner in which the application of Kansas for admission into the Union comes before the House at the present time; and inasmuch as it is claimed by the President and his friends to be here clothed with all the sanctions and formalities of the law. They contend, indeed, that this Lecompton constitution comes before this House with strict regularity, in every step of its formation. No one, I believe, denies the power of Congress over the Territories to govern them in any way it deems proper, provided it does not exclude slavery from them, or attempt to exercise any of the powers prohibited in the Constitution of the United States, such as the establishment of religion, &c. In the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, known as the Dred Scott case, the power of Congress to govern the Territories is discussed to a very considerable extent. Permit me to call the attention of the House, for a moment, to some remarks of Chief Justice Taney, to be found on pages 54 and 55 of the volume printed by the order of the Senate:

"The power to acquire territory necessarily carries with it the power to preserve and apply to the purposes for which it was acquired. The form of government to be established necessarily rested in the discretion of Congress. It was their duty to establish the one that would be best suited for the protection and security of the citizens of the United States and other inhabitants who might be authorized to take up their abode there."

I might also read in the same volume from the opinion of Mr. Justice Campbell. They both concede the power of Congress to govern the Territories except in relation to the prohibition of slavery. I may be permitted to observe here that it is a curious fact to notice whence the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court chooses to derive the power to govern the Territories of the United States. Instead of resorting to the express language of the instrument itself, where the power is fully given in proper and apt language, as may be seen by consulting almost any elementary writer on the subject of law, he chooses to deduce or imply the power from certain other powers granted. The language is familiar to all:

"Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, and other property of the United States."

Now, instead of resorting to this clause as the source and origin of the power of Congress to govern the Territories, the court chooses to find that power in the right to acquire territory; and as that power is not to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and was for a long time questioned by its very founders, the court derives the right to acquire territory from the power given in the Constitution for Congress to admit new States into the Union. Now, why was this interpretation of the Constitution resorted to? If the court had contented themselves with resorting to that clause of the Constitution which grants this power, in apt and proper language, they would have been constrained to admit it to be a full and plenary power, and that it invested Congress with authority to make whatever rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States Congress, in the exercise of its discretion, should think proper. But if the court should resort to some implied power from something else which was implied, the court could then fix the limitation upon this power, by implication, to suit themselves.

Now, would it not be a curious study for an admirer of the Virginia resolutions of 1798 to ascertain how to imply a power to govern the territory of the United States from the power to acquire territory, which power must itself be implied from the power to admit new States into the Union?—an implied power in the third degree. I think it would be an agreeable and pleasing occupation to some devotee of these Virginia resolutions of 1798 to see how this could be constitutionally and lawfully done.

If there be one historical fact undisputed in reference to the formation of the Federal Constitution, I assert that fact to be that the power to admit new States into the Union was granted in the Federal Constitution with reference to the then existing Northwest Territory, and to the territory which was held by the then existing States under the expectation of a future cession of it to the General Government. The discussion which arose upon the Louisiana purchase, calling the attention of the founders of the Federal Constitution to that subject, when all the circumstances attending the formation of the Constitution were fresh in the recollection of living men, demonstrates beyond controversy that that grant of power was not made in reference to territory to be acquired. You all know the opinion of Jefferson on that subject. Anxious as he was for the acquisition of the Louisiana territory, he resolutely insisted that it could not be lawfully acquired unless the Constitution of the United States was amended. So it is manifest, if the power to govern the territory of the United States is not to be derived from that clause of the Constitution which empowers Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, &c., and which clause received a practical interpretation in the first Congress assembled under it, which construction has been sanctioned for more than fifty years beyond dispute and controversy, then there is no power in Congress whatever to govern the Territories of the United States.

On the formation of the Federal Constitution certain powers were granted to the General Government, and others were reserved to the States, or the people of the States; and the exercise of certain powers was forbidden to Congress, the States, and the people. The aggregate of all these powers constitute what we call sovereignty—that is, all the powers that organized society may right-

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Olin.

Ho. of Reps.

fully exercise for the protection and government of the members composing it. This power or sovereignty is necessarily incident to, and grows out of organized society—cannot be annihilated. Its full and free exercise may be restrained by force, or constitutional limitations.

Now, it must certainly follow that the power to legislate upon the subject of slavery must be found in Congress; or its exercise prohibited in the Constitution; or it is conferred on the States; or is among that class of undefined powers reserved to the people of the States. But the rights reserved to the people of the States by the Constitution are rights which pertain to them as citizens of a State, and only while such citizens.

The right, then, to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories not being in the States or the people of the States, must necessarily be in the people of the Territory or in Congress. It cannot be in the people of the Territory, unless the people of the Territory are independent of the Federal Government. It follows, therefore, that power must be in Congress, and may be lawfully exercised, unless some provision be found in the Constitution expressly restraining that right. No such limitation is found, or claimed to be found, in that instrument. But it is attempted to insert in the Constitution an implied limitation upon the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the Territories from considerations of public policy, and the recognition alleged to be contained in the Constitution of the right of property in slaves.

But if we were to accede to the position assumed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, that the power to govern the Territories was derived from the right to acquire territory, Congress would still have the right to prohibit slavery in the Territories, for the simple reason that the prohibition or regulation of that institution is confessedly within the scope of legislation. If the power to govern at all be vested in Congress, that power is absolute, unless restrained by constitutional limitation, the existence of which is not claimed or pretended.

But it is said that the Constitution recognizes property of the master in his slave. Suppose it does. If the power to govern the Territories exists in Congress, may not Congress prohibit property being carried into the Territory? may they not prohibit a particular kind of property from being carried into the Territory? nay, may it not prohibit the citizens of the States themselves from going into the Territories?

Surely gentlemen will not say that the regulation of each and all of these subjects is not within the scope of legislation. What are the limits of legislative power? Why, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, Congress may do everything of right, and lawfully, which organized society might do. It would be, what Blackstone affirms of the British Parliament, omnipotent.

But the Supreme Court say these Territories can only be acquired for the purpose of being formed into States to be admitted into the Union, and that they cannot therefore be held and governed as colonies.

Indeed! Suppose the Federal Government had power to acquire Territories for the purpose of admitting them into the Union as States, and Congress empowered to govern them during their territorial existence, and to decide upon their admission into the Union; under such a grant of power, would not Congress be the sole judge as to the manner of governing the Territory, when and how they should be admitted into the Union? or would such a power vest authority in the Supreme Court to determine how Congress should govern them? To whom is Congress responsible for the exercise of this power? The power to acquire territory is conceded, and the power to govern it while it is held as a Territory is conceded. Where, then, is the limitation that the court can impose on the exercise of this power? Where is the discretion vested as to how long the Territory shall be held, and when it is to enter into the Union? Congress is the sole judge.

But, the court say, or rather the Chief Justice, that "the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution."

Nothing, as a matter of fact, can be further from the truth than this proposition.

The only two clauses relied on to prove this proposition are—first subdivision, section nine, article one, is:

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808, but a tax may be imposed on each person," &c.

The second clause, where this recognition is found, is:

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such labor or service may be due."

Now, in relation to the first provision this most extraordinary language is used by the Chief Justice:

"The right to traffic in it [slaves] like an ordinary article of merchandise and property, was guaranteed to the citizens of the United States, in every State that might desire it, for twenty years."

And here is to be found that provision of the Constitution of the United States which recognizes and guarantees the right of property in slaves.

Consider the full import of that word guaranteed! That is, to insure the title—to make certain as if with covenants—the title of the man who chooses to traffic in that merchandise.

Why, look at that provision of the Constitution. It was simply a restriction on Congress from exercising (what was confessedly a power given to Congress) for the period of twenty years the power to prohibit a traffic which the civilized world has denounced as piracy, and consigned to the gibbet the guilty wretch who engages in it. Power was given Congress to prohibit the slave trade, but in granting that power, its exercise was restrained for twenty years. And this language, by a kind of Jesuitical judicial jugglery, is tortured into an express recognition of property in slaves by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Can a grant of constitutional power, to take effect at the expiration of twenty years from the grant, authorizing Congress to inflict the extreme penalty of death on the guilty wretch who should engage in this infamous traffic, be properly, justly, and necessarily construed as a recognition of property in the articles of traffic thus prohibited, or a guarantee of title?

Let us look at the other section from which this doctrine is evolved. This section recognizes no property in man, in that sense, in which we use the word property when speaking of articles of merchandise. It simply recognizes the fact that persons, in some of the States, by the laws of such States, may be held to service; and when they escape into another State, prohibits such State from interfering to discharge such persons from service or labor, but provides they shall be delivered up on claim. It affirms nothing of the rightfulness or the contrary of the relation; but, for the sake of peace and quiet, it prevents one State from interfering with such legal relations as some other State may institute among its citizens or people.

It is conceded this provision applies as well to persons bound to service for a term of years, as to slaves. If it affirms property in slaves, it affirms property in apprentices, which is absurd. It is the same abuse and misuse of language as the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MARSHALL] indulged when he affirmed a man had a property in his wife, his child, and his ward. It neither approves or condemns the relation; it only provides each State shall determine its propriety and legality for itself.

I have thus discussed at some length the power of Congress to govern the Territories of the United States, because, in my judgment, it was necessary, in order to understand correctly and to appreciate the position assumed by gentlemen on this floor, that the application now before us for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, is a legal application, and that, notwithstanding all the frauds in connection with it, in every stage of the proceeding, in consequence of its legality and formality there is something like a legal obligation resting upon this House to admit her into the Union under that constitution. I have before stated that the Supreme Court, in its discussion of the power of Congress to govern the Territories, concedes this right to be in Congress to the fullest extent, with the qualification that I have before alluded to. I do not understand that it is denied upon this floor that the Congress of the United States has power to govern this Territory. Gentlemen who have advocated the admission of the Territory under this constitution have sought in various ways to find what, in the former history of this Government, has answered the purpose of, or been denominated, an enabling act; because it would be a bald and difficult proposition to support here, if Congress has power to govern the Territories, that the people of a Territory may at any time when they see fit to do so, assemble a convention and frame a constitution, and by that act entitle themselves to admission into the Union as one of the States of the Union. There has, therefore, been an industrious effort to find some power in the past legislation of the country in reference to this Territory that would subserve the purpose of an enabling act and authorize the formation of a constitution by this people.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SMITH,] has, with marked ingenuity, found an enabling act in the treaty made with France in the purchase of Louisiana; and that I may do the gentleman no injustice, I will read from his speech in the House upon this question. He says:

"I need not enlarge upon this, because, as I before stated, there is an enabling act for the formation of a State government for the Territory of Kansas, dated anterior to the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I know, sir, that some, who heretofore belonged to the Democratic party, are of opinion that there ought to have been an enabling act—such as the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLASS]—but at the same time admit that an enabling act is not necessary to the formation of a constitution. Upon examination, I find that the treaty between the United States and France, of the 30th April, 1803—that treaty which is the supreme law of the land—provides: what? That Congress shall pass an enabling act? No, sir; but it provides that the people of the Territory of Kansas, which is a part of Louisiana Territory, shall be admitted into the Union as a State or States, as soon as practicable.

"The following is the article of the treaty referred to: "That the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

Now, sir, it does strike me that the honorable gentleman must have been very hard pushed, to resort to the provision of that treaty to find an enabling act that would authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to come into this Union as an independent State whenever they chose to do so, by virtue of a compact entered into between this Government and the Government of France. Why, sir, there are a thousand answers to this proposition. If that were an enabling act, when were the people of the Territory authorized to form a constitution? What were to be the limits of the Territory? How large or how small were the States to be? How many inhabitants must the Territories contain, before they were entitled to come into the Union? Were all these things left in the discretion of the people in the Territories themselves? But, the gentleman undoubtedly knew, as a lawyer, that whatever the provisions of these treaty stipulations were, the compact was not between this Government and the people then in the Territory, but between this Government and the French Government. If Congress chose to violate any of the provisions of that treaty, what was the remedy of the people of that Territory? Did it lie in the courts of the United States? Did it lie anywhere? I know not how the theory of the power of governing the Territories may change in a few years. It is possible, that by-and-by the Supreme Court will issue a mandamus commanding Congress to admit these Territories into the Union, upon the theory that there was an enabling act in the treaty. But, suppose it to have been a compact, which it was not, with the people of the Territory, and that they could, in some sort of sense, enforce the obligations of that treaty: why every man, woman, and child in the Territory, at the time of its acquisition, had been admitted into the Union long before the formation of this territorial government.

The compact was perfectly performed in all its

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Bennett.

Ho. of Reps.

parts, and it is not the people of Orleans Territory who are now complaining in reference to the form of government to be established in Kansas. Besides, the principle has been repeatedly affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States "that a contract made by the political department of the Government with a foreign nation, can be enforced only by the nation with which it is made, and not by the judiciary department of the Government which makes the contract." (Foster vs. Neilson, 2 Peters, 253; Garcia vs. Lee, 12 Peters, 511.)

Mr. Chairman, an ingenious and honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] has found an enabling act in the Nebraska bill; not in that portion of the act where the President has found it, but in another portion of the bill. I am not at all surprised at this; for we have so many, so various and contradictory readings of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, it is manifest that everything and anything can be found in that bill that anybody desires to find in it. I believe the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] has found the whole Levitical law in it, except that portion which prohibited eating pork. The enabling act, according to the view of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, is to be found in these words:

"That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act."

What was the act? It was an act organizing a Territory, and creating a Legislative Assembly empowered to make such necessary rules and regulations as were proper for a Territory during its territorial existence. It was the ordinary power of legislation conferred upon the Legislature of a Territory. There is nothing about forming a constitution here contained; and how could such a power be implied, when such power would subvert the territorial government under which they professed to obtain the authority?

But the President has found this power in another clause of the Kansas bill—in the clause known as the stump speech—and which is in these words:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

On this point the President has used the following language in his special message:

"That this law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without any enabling act from Congress, to form a State constitution, is too clear for argument. For Congress 'to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free,' in framing their constitution, 'to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States,' and then to say they shall not be permitted to proceed and frame a constitution in their own way, without an express authority from Congress, appears to be almost a contradiction in terms."

The President says this proposition is too plain for argument. Sir, there is something still plainer than this proposition; and that is, that the President has dishonestly interpolated language in that clause not to be found in the act, and which perverts its entire scope and meaning; and that without that interpolation, no man, even with talents of an angel, could make even a plausible argument for the President's proposition. It is generally conceded that the people of the Territory have the right to form their constitution. But it is said they may delegate that power, and when they do delegate that power the constitution they form is as much the act of the people as though sanctioned by a direct vote of the people.

Suppose this proposition were granted: where is the evidence that the people of Kansas ever intended to part with the right to vote for or against any constitution which might be framed? Is it found in the act of voting for a convention? or in voting for delegates to the convention? Why, that is the only practical mode of framing a constitution at all; and if this mode of framing a constitution furnishes conclusive proof that the people did part with the right to approve or disapprove of a constitution when framed, then there never can be an instance in which it is necessary to submit a constitution to a vote of the people; for if the act of calling a convention and electing delegates to it be sufficient and conclusive proof that the people not only desire a constitution to be framed, but that they thereby give their assent to any possible frame of government the delegates choose to make, it follows, necessarily, that in no case is there any obligation, or propriety even, in submitting a constitution to the vote of a people.

Admit, for the sake of argument, that a people may give their assent to the terms of their fundamental law before it is framed, as well as afterwards—but in this case there is no evidence of such assent, unless it may be found in the act of calling a convention and voting for delegates: and I have before shown, if that proves assent in one case it proves it in all cases. That the majority of the people have the right to form their constitution, all agree; but, it is said, inasmuch as they may delegate that power to others, they are as much bound by the act of their delegate as though formed by themselves. That the maxim, "qui facit per alium, facit per se," applies here. This proposition will, I think, on examination, be found based on an abuse of language and a confusion of ideas. What is meant by the phrase, the people may delegate the power to frame a constitution? Is it meant that the people may consent to give to John Calhoun and company, or any other set of men, the right to draw up such a form of government as they please, and agree in advance to give their assent to such constitution, whatever it may be? If that is what is meant, the proposition thus far is a harmless one, and may be true; but we have no evidence that any such delegation of power has been made.

If it be said that the calling of a convention and the election of delegates is itself a delegation of power to frame such constitution as the convention please, then I answer that the people can never, upon that principle, form their own constitution; for if the people meet in mass convention, they must, of necessity, depute some one or more to frame the fundamental law. They cannot all do it; they can only give or withhold their assent to what is done by their agent, delegate, or committee. The legal maxim quoted, has no more application than the famous Latin maxim put in the mouth of General Jackson, by Jack Downing: "E pluribus unum, sine qua non." This legal maxim expresses an elementary principle in the law of agency, that when a man procures an act to be done by another person, which act affects some third person, such third person may hold him responsible who procured the act to be done, in precisely the same way and to the same extent as though the person himself did the act, instead of procuring it to be done by another. Now, where the right of no third party intervenes, this rule has no application whatever. Here was no third party to be affected at all. Strictly speaking, it is an abuse of language to call the delegates of the conventions the agents of the people. The idea of agency involves the doing of acts for a principal, affecting some third person. The relation of delegates to the people would be more accurately expressed by that of servant than agent.

I think I have shown that in no proper sense have the people of that Territory been permitted to frame their fundamental law. This is asserted by the President to be their right; and his friends and supporters on this floor ought to be stopped from disputing it.

But it has been gravely argued by an honorable gentleman, [Mr. GARNETT,] I believe from Virginia, that the constitution need not have the express consent of the people, since our Government was not a pure democracy, but a representative Government. This is that kind of logic which proves that a part is not only equal to the whole, but is the whole; which designates the entire system of our Government from a single feature of it. It is true, this Government is sometimes said to be a representative Government, and sometimes a popular Government, or a Government of the people; and this language is all sufficiently intelligible when properly used. But did it never occur to the honorable gentleman, what constitutes this Government a representative Government—a popular Government? Is it not your Constitution—your organic law—framed by the people?

Sir, the hour is past to which, by the rules of debate, we are restricted, before I have had time to touch those topics upon which I most desired to speak.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. H. BENNETT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BENNETT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A select committee was ordered by the House, authorized to send for persons and papers, and instructed to inquire whether the Lecompton constitution was acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas; and to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution, and the laws under which the same was originated; and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation thereof, having relation to the question or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution.

The contradictory statements of the different parties, the allegations contained in the President's Kansas message, and the charges of fraud in relation to the Lecompton constitution, all required this investigation to be made, that the whole truth should be known before Congress acted upon the admission of Kansas. For this purpose a select committee was ordered by the House. No bill was referred to it, nor was it authorized to report any measure for the action of the House. It had no legislative duty to perform. Its whole duty was to send for persons and papers, and take evidence of the facts upon the subjects of inquiry referred to it, and to report the facts and the evidence to the House for its consideration. It was strictly a committee of investigation.

The Speaker, by appointing a majority of this committee opposed to the investigation and to the resolution of the House by which it was ordered—a thing unprecedented in appointing a committee of this kind, and in violation of all sound parliamentary precedent and authority—placed an insurmountable obstacle in the way of proceeding with the investigation without some further order or action by the House. No witness has been called or examined, and no evidence desired by those in favor of the investigation has been allowed to be taken. The proceeding has unfortunately been conducted as a party question, and the majority of the committee have persistently overruled the minority in all their attempts to comply with the order of the House, and proceed with the investigation. The majority have permitted copies of a few papers to be procured, such as go to sustain their line of argument in favor of the Lecompton constitution, which were open and public, and within the reach of every member of Congress without the aid of a committee. But they have refused to take any evidence which would go to controvert their positions or allegations.

In effect, the majority of this committee, by a strict party vote, have refused to proceed and take evidence and examine witnesses, and have, by their action, overruled and disobeyed the order of the House, upon the ground that in the view they entertain the whole inquiry is immaterial; holding this constitution as a legal record complete and perfect, that no evidence could contradict or impeach, and no fraud could vitiate or destroy. This position is as unsound as the course of the majority is indefensible.

The action of a court required to investigate the facts in relation to a disputed deed, that should allow its production, but refuse all evidence to show it a forgery, or that it was obtained by fraud, no one would justify or defend. Yet, that does not state the case so strongly as it may be stated against the action of the majority of this committee; as in that case the court would not only take the evidence, but decide upon it. The position of this committee was more like that of an examiner directed to take the evidence in a cause, having no power to decide upon it, but to return it for the consideration of the court, who should set up his opinion that the court ought to act in the case without proof, and should therefore refuse to take the evidence and return only his views and opinions to the court instead of the evidence directed to be taken.

The question of the effect of the evidence was not to be decided by this committee; that would be to substitute their opinion for the judgment of the House. That question would properly arise after it was taken, and when it was considered by the House, and not before. And upon that subject there might be great differences of opinion. Each member would be entitled to judge and decide for himself, with all the facts before him. And the majority of the committee, in overruling the judgment and order of the House, and in substituting their views, have not only disobeyed its authority, but deprived every member of his right to have the facts before him, and of judging and deciding thereon for himself.

The House and the majority of said committee are directly at issue. Whether the dignity and authority of the House shall be maintained and its order enforced, or, in this manner, overruled and defeated, is a matter to be decided by the House. The duty of the minority in this respect has been performed by calling its attention to the subject, and stating the facts as an explanation and apology on their part for not proceeding with the investigation, namely, that they were prevented from doing so by the action of the majority, which, at the last meeting, after directing one of their number to make a report, adjourned the committee without day.

II. EVIDENCE TAKEN.

The majority of the committee say the only proof they deem material is documentary, "about which there can be no dispute." Had that been the opinion of the House, no investigating committee would have been ordered. The majority return an opinion that the facts to be investigated are immaterial; in other words, they are in favor of the Lecompton constitution, no matter how dishonest and fraudulent it may be, and no matter how much the people may be opposed to it. Therefore, all the evidence proposed, they say, is immaterial; yet they present quite an imposing statement in their report as a full history of this constitution. 1. The law to take the sense of the people as to calling a convention. 2. The law to call the convention. 3. The registry and apportionment. 4. The proceedings of the convention. 5. The constitution. 6. The vote as to the pretended adoption of the constitution. All these they deem material. And they say they permitted the following to be taken as immaterial: 7. The law of December 17, 1857, submitting the constitution to a fair vote. 8. The result, as certified, of that election. 9. Mr. Calhoun's statement to Senator GREEN. When this statement is examined, it will be found that no evidence has been taken, of any kind sought or contemplated.

The laws referred to as published, and the constitution as presented, all could have, and they have, in no way been proved before the committee. How these laws have been executed, or what has been done under them, is not shown. There is no proof as to the proceedings taken under the first law. It is said only a few votes were given, and that it could in no sense indicate the sentiment of the people. There is no evidence, even, which way the majority was, so far as votes were given. There is no evidence as to the number of people there are in Kansas; but the best evidence to be had would not make its whole population fifty thousand—not enough to entitle it to admission, or to a single Representative in Congress.

The proceedings under the law to elect delegates are not shown. A copy of an extract of a Kansas newspaper has been obtained, which is not evidence, and which, if admitted, only shows that the law was not complied with. The result or vote at this election is not shown. The proceedings of the convention are only shown by producing a part of a mutilated journal, called the journal of the convention, but not proved in any way. An extract from a newspaper, and part of a journal, mutilated and not proved, is the sum total of facts, or evidence of facts, obtained by this committee. The last part of the journal, that which might show something as to the adoption of the constitution, or about its submission, has been taken off. There is no proof the constitution is as adopted by the convention. It has been in suspicious hands ever since, and there should be some evidence of its genuineness, as well as of the election of the delegates according to the law. That election was to be held after a census and registry of all the legal voters! There is no evidence this was done. What a full compliance with the order of the House! In one word, there has been no legal evidence of any fact taken before the committee. The House might as well not have ordered the committee as to have one thus appointed, and thus refusing to act.

III.—ENABLING ACT.

The Territories of the United States are under the government and control of Congress. No legal proceedings can be taken to organize a State government in a Territory, except by the authority of Congress. Any proceeding adopted in the Territory for that purpose, (without such authority,) whether originating with the Legislature or the people, can only be regarded as an unauthorized voluntary application, and is entitled to no consideration, except as an expression of the sentiments and wishes of the people. If it is clearly shown to be the expression of the will of a majority of the people, Congress may adopt it; otherwise it should be rejected.

The Territorial Legislature, as such, has no power to call a convention to form a State constitution, in order "to subvert" the territorial government. In the case of Arkansas this was so decided by the Attorney General, Mr. Butler. He said:

"To suppose that the legislative powers granted to the General Assembly include the authority to abrogate, alter, or modify, the territorial government established by the act of Congress, and of which the Assembly is a constituent part, would be manifestly absurd. Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to a convention to form a constitution and State government, nor to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void; if passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

In the case of Michigan, the President (then in the Senate) held the same doctrine. He said:

"No Senator will pretend that the Territorial Legislature had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

But the President and his friends insist that the organic act, in this case, conferred upon the people of Kansas the right to form their State constitution in their own way. If this were conceded, the authority was given to the people, and not to the Legislature. The authority granted to the Legislature is specified in that act, and none was given in any form to call a convention to form a State constitution. If the act authorized the people to form a State constitution, it was independent of the Legislature; and the Topeka constitution was made and adopted in a legal and regular manner.

IV.—TOPEKA CONSTITUTION.

Early in 1855, and long before the Lecompton fraud was planned, impelled by the alarming condition of the Territory, the people took proceedings to form a State constitution, to ask admission as a State, and place themselves under the protection of law. The first convention of delegates elected, met at Topeka on the 19th of September, 1855. They made no constitution, but provided for a fair election of delegates to a constitutional convention in October, 1855. And at a general election, delegates were fairly elected from the whole Territory, by a vote of two thousand seven hundred and ten, all voting who chose to vote, and the rest assenting, according to the latest Democratic creed. The delegates assembled and proceeded to form a free-State constitution—one as unobjectionable as that of any State in the Union. That convention directed the constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people for their adoption or rejection, at an election to be held on the 15th of December, 1855. At that election, it was voted upon and adopted by a vote of between two and three thousand, only forty-six votes being given against it.

As before, this election was fair, and all had an opportunity to vote, and all were therefore concluded.

This movement originated with the people. It was three times before them at elections, at the last of which it was fairly adopted. At each of these elections a larger vote was given than was given for the Lecompton delegates. And if ever those not voting should be held as assenting and concluded, it should be so held in this instance. The people of Kansas have, then, "in their own way, and in strict accordance with the organic act, framed a constitution and State government," "which is republican in form," according to the President's own theory. This constitution framed at Topeka was, in truth and in fact, the act and deed of the people of Kansas, made by them, without any dictation, and in their own way. If no enabling act was necessary, it was strictly legal and regular. And, in any view, it was as legal and regular as the Lecompton constitution can be regarded. Besides, it was fairly submitted to, and adopted by, the people. The other never was.

As early, then, as December, 1855, there had been a State constitution not only made, but adopted by the people, and the Territory was prepared for admission as a State. If, after that time, as the President insists, "no authority existed in the Territorial Legislature which could possibly destroy its existence or change its character," then the whole of the proceedings of the Lecomptonites were irregular and void. For the law to elect the Lecompton delegates was passed by the Territorial Legislature in February, 1857, more than a year after the people of Kansas had, in their own way, made and adopted a constitution, and prepared the Territory for admission as a State.

V.—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The first proceedings for the Lecompton convention were taken, not by Congress, or by the people of Kansas, but by the so-called Territorial Legislature. This was irregular and wrong.

1. If it had been a legal Legislature it had no power to do thus. "It was an act of usurpation," according to the President.

2. This was not a legal Legislature; it was not elected by the people; it could not represent them. It was an unlawful assembly, imposed upon the people of Kansas by foreign violence and votes, as has been established by legal evidence, taken by order of the last Congress. Congress could not make this illegal assembly the real representatives of the people. It never attempted to do so, as has been erroneously assumed. The people refused to recognize it. And in the last Congress the House of Representatives denied its authority and declared all its proceedings void. The following is a copy of the preamble and first section of the act as passed by the House:

"Whereas the President of the United States transmitted to the House, by message, a printed pamphlet purporting to be the laws of the Territory of Kansas, passed at Shawnee Mission, in said Territory: and whereas unjust and unwarranted test oaths are prescribed by said laws as a qualification for voting or holding office in said Territory: and whereas the committee of investigation sent by the House to Kansas report that said Legislature was not elected by the legal voters of Kansas, but was forced upon them by non-residents, in violation of the organic act of the Territory, and having thus usurped legislative power, it enacted cruel and oppressive laws: Therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all rules or regulations purporting to be laws, or in the form of law, adopted at Shawnee Mission, in the Territory of Kansas, by a body of men claiming to be the Legislative Assembly of said Territory, and all acts and proceedings whatsoever of said Assembly, are hereby declared invalid, and of no binding force or effect."

For both reasons the law calling the convention was void. But even that law was never complied with.

3. The census and registry were never made as required.

The law under which the delegates to the Lecompton convention claimed their election, passed by this unauthorized and illegal Legislature, is said to be "a fair law." It required a census to be taken, and a registry of all the legal voters in the Territory to be made, before that election; the lists of voters to be carefully corrected by the probate judges; one copy of such corrected lists to be filed with the Governor, another with the Secretary, and copies of the voters in each election district to be printed, and generally distributed among the inhabitants; one copy to be delivered to each judge of elections, and three copies to be posted up at each place of voting. And no person was to be permitted to vote whose name did not appear on such corrected lists. After the census and registry were "completed," and not before, an apportionment of the delegates to be elected was to be made by the Governor and Secretary, "by dividing the whole number of legal voters in the Territory by sixty."

No such census and registry were ever made and "completed," and consequently no apportionment of delegates could legally be made under the law.

4. The census and registry never being "completed," the apportionment was made in violation of law, and the convention was illegally constituted, even if the law had been valid.

By a copy of an extract from a Kansas newspaper, directed to be obtained by a majority of the select committee, (the only evidence given of the census and registry required by the law,) it appears a census was made in fourteen counties, and a registry in eighteen counties. There being thirty-eight counties in Kansas, this left twenty-four counties in which no census was taken, and twenty counties in which no registry was made. (Often called nineteen, but in fact twenty, as now appears.) These twenty counties were wholly deprived of delegates or representation, and no one residing in them could vote.

The pro-slavery party had the whole machinery of the territorial government in their hands; and it was their duty to see this law faithfully executed. They did not do this. The registry was unfairly made as far as it went. Non-residents were registered in all the border counties, and the free-State voters, to a large extent, were designedly omitted. In the eleventh and eighteenth districts some counties were registered, and others omitted. The counties in which the pro-slavery party claimed majorities were registered, and the others omitted. This was as unfair and as much a violation of the law, as it would have been to register one party, and omit the other; indeed, that was done in effect. All the border counties, where colonizations and frauds could be practiced, and where the pro-slavery party were strongest, were registered; and those where the free-State party were strongest were omitted.

Governor Stanton said, in a recent speech, that he was "satisfied the officers did not perform their duty even in the eighteen counties in which an imperfect registry was obtained;" that, in some instances, he knew they did not do their duty. And he said he knew the officers refused to take the census, or make the registry, as required, in some instances; and that, if he had then known the facts since ascertained, he would not have made the apportionment. And he certainly ought not to have done so. The registry was fraudulent as far as it went, and it never was "completed." The apportionment and election under it were in direct violation of the very law ordering the election, and in violation of the rights of every legal voter who was disfranchised by this law, and the manner in which it was fraudulently executed. The law was thus made a means and an instrument of fraud!

No one denies that these twenty counties, by the fault of pro-slavery officers of the Territory, were deprived of the right to vote, and to be represented. But, again, it is said not to be material, as Calhoun says there were not many voters! Even the committee of fifteen agreed that his statements were no evidence, and much less could his opinions be. But who knows how many voters there were in these twenty counties, settled as rapidly as Kansas had been? No one; no reliable estimate could be made, even by an honest man. That was one reason why a registry was required. The law required a registry of all the legal voters. These partisan officers could not deprive a single county of the right to vote, and of representation, but by a direct violation of the law. But the pretense that there were but a few voters in these counties is untrue in fact. Governor Walker states that fifteen of these counties, "in which there was no registry, gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six-months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution." It cannot be known how many more there were who did not vote. More than half the counties were deprived of representation, and nearly half the legal voters of their right to vote—taking into account the many omitted in the eighteen registered counties, and the total omission of all in the remaining twenty counties. Had these counties been represented, it would have controlled the result, not only as to submitting the constitution to a vote, but as to what it should be; for so well did the delegates understand the force they enacted, and how much their proceedings outraged public sentiment, that only a bare majority attended. The constitution was adopted by less than a majority of the convention, and the refusal to submit it was decided by a majority of only two of those attending, as it is said.

It is said the people prevented a registry from being taken. This is not shown. The majority refuse proof, and then resort to such allegations. It would have been disproved had evidence been taken. The pro-slavery party had the power in their hands: three thousand United States troops, "dragoons and a battery." This law did not affect the persons or property of the people. Their names only were required. In every settlement they could have been readily obtained. The law allowed an officer for each precinct. It might as well be objected that the census could only be taken in half the States because some maiden lady in one of them refused to give her age, (which her next door neighbor would readily have done;) after which all further efforts were abandoned. Those refusing, if any, were liable to penalties; those not refusing had a right to be registered. Did each voter in twenty counties refuse? Ask Calhoun. It was not pretended to be taken. It was not intended to be taken. This was only another fraud. And this silly pretense shows there is no answer to be made to it.

A copy of the census registry and apportionment, as it now appears, is annexed.

Four counties were wholly omitted in the foregoing list. There are thirty-eight counties in all. Thirty-six counties are named in the constitution. It then gives one Senator and one Representative to the country lying west of Wise, Butler, Davis, and Hunter, not naming the counties. There are two counties west of these, Arrapahoe being one.

VI.—POPULATION INSUFFICIENT.

In fourteen counties where the census was taken there were twenty-three thousand one hundred and forty-nine inhabitants. To these counties fifty of the sixty delegates were given. At the same rate as to voters, the population in the other four registered counties would be four thousand six hundred and twenty-nine—making a total in the eighteen counties of twenty-seven thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight—not one third enough for a single Representative, which requires about ninety-three thousand five hundred. If the twenty counties not registered contain only some three thousand inhabitants, as our opponents assert, Kansas has only one third the population required for her admission as a State. And that is a good objection. If these twenty counties have twenty thousand inhabitants, the number is still too small for admission, while it is so large as to destroy all pretense of fairness in the election of delegates to the Lecompton convention. The fraud would vitiate the proceedings; and in any view the number is not much more than half enough. The time has not arrived for the people to determine their own institutions for themselves.

VII.—REMONSTRANCE OF THE LEGISLATURE.

The Legislature recently elected, and fairly representing the people of Kansas, protest against the Lecompton constitution, as follows:

"Preamble and joint resolutions in relation to the constitution framed at Lecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th day of November, 1857.

"Whereas, a small minority of people living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties of this Territory, availing themselves of a law which enabled them to obstruct and defeat a fair expression of the popular will, did, by the odious and oppressive application of the provisions and partisan machinery of said law, procure the return of the whole number of the delegates of the constitutional convention recently assembled at Lecompton; and whereas, by reason of the defective provisions of said law, in connection with the neglect and misconduct of the authorities charged with the execution of the same, the people living within the remaining nineteen counties of the Territory were not permitted to return delegates to said convention, were not recognized in its organization, or in any other sense heard or felt in its deliberations; and whereas, it is an axiom in political ethics that the people cannot be deprived of their rights by the negligence or misconduct of public officers; and whereas, a minority—to wit, twenty-eight only of the sixty members of said convention—have attempted, by an unworthy contrivance, to impose upon the whole people of this Territory a constitution without consulting their wishes, and against their will; and whereas, the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in thus acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof; and whereas, the action of a fragment of said convention, representing as they did a small minority of the voters of the Territory, repudiates and crushes out the distinctive principle of the Nebraska act, and violates and tramples under foot the rights and the sovereignty of the people; and whereas, from the foregoing statement of facts, it clearly appears that the people have not been left 'free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way,' but, on the contrary, at every stage in the anomalous proceedings recited, they have been prevented from so doing:

"Be it therefore resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State, and the representatives of said people do hereby, in their name and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission.

"Resolved, That such action on the part of Congress would, in the judgment of the members of the Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution in its stead of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority.

"Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves.

"Resolved, That the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from the Territory."

These facts, thus authoritatively stated by the legal Legislature of the Territory, should be taken as indisputable, unless disproved by higher evidence, that has not been done or attempted. And these facts brand that constitution as irregular and fraudulent, and prove that the people of Kansas are opposed to it.

VIII.—PLEDGES.

In 1820, the Missouri compromise line was established by southern votes; and Kansas and all the other territory acquired of France north of that line was pledged to freedom, and slavery therein "forever prohibited."

This, like all efforts to admit slave States, was a political question, to increase and extend the unequal political power given to the owners of slave property, by the admission of new slave States, with their Senators and Representatives in Congress. The effort to make Kansas a slave State, has the same object in view. The slave States have about six million of free people. The free States about thirteen million. Yet the slave States have already more than four times the extent of territory, admitted as new States, in proportion to their population, than the free States have. The slave owners numbered, in 1850, less than three hundred and forty-seven thousand, yet they are counted, in representation, at between two and three million; and they have, by this unequal power, controlled the Government for the last sixty years. They wish to make this inequality still greater, and to make their power absolute. Nine new slave States have been added, with eighteen Senators and forty-eight Representatives in Congress. And this unequal power is held by them all. New free States have not been added in the same proportion. According to population, the additions made to slavery are more than four times what has been allowed to the free States in proportion to their numbers. But all this does not satisfy the slave power!

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Hence, when Kansas was to be settled, they made their arrangements to reduce that to slavery. To do this, the Missouri prohibition was repealed, in 1854, against the uniform action of the Government from the day of its establishment, upon the plea that it was unconstitutional, that Congress had no power to legislate upon the subject of slavery, and the great principle that it belonged to the people was adopted. To extend slavery into free territory, the compromise of 1820 and the finality of 1850 shared the same fate; the slavery question was reopened and renewed; it was unsettled where it had been settled, and the struggle transferred to the people of the Territory to be again settled by them. They have again settled it; but their decision is now disregarded! By the terms of that act Congress and the Government were bound not to interfere, but to leave the people "perfectly free" to settle that question for themselves in their own way. The Democratic party declared that as their party creed in their Cincinnati platform. The President indorsed it. He got upon it so emphatically, he thought he was a part of it, and in his inaugural approved of the conception of Congress in applying the rule "that the will of the majority shall govern in the settlement of the question of domestic slavery in the Territories," and said "it was the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved." How was this sacred right of each individual preserved at the election for delegates?

In his instructions to Governor Walker he said:

"The institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted by force or fraud."

And further that

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their rights to vote for or against the instrument. And the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

And in his letter to the Connecticut clergymen, he said:

"It is my imperative duty to employ the troops of the United States, should this become necessary, in defending the convention against violence while framing the constitution, and in protecting the bona fide inhabitants qualified to vote, under the provisions of this instrument, in the free exercise of the rights of suffrage, when it shall be submitted to them for approbation or rejection."

This was on the 15th August last. Up to that time it was not only their right to vote upon the constitution, but it was his imperative duty to protect them in the exercise of that right.

Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, in their published letters and speeches, state that they pledged their honor and character to the people of Kansas, in every way, that the constitution should be submitted to them for adoption or rejection. And told them they expressed the views of the President and the whole Cabinet. They spoke to them officially as the officers of the President. Even the delegates to the convention gave pledges to see that this was done—a majority of them in writing, as it is stated. A copy of one of these is annexed as an example:

To the Democratic voters of Douglas county:

It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolutions, which were adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily indorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

I. S. BOILING, JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPICKLEY, L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duty it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers in this Territory, as the majority of the voters shall decide."

All were pledged to this—the party, the President, the Governor, and the Delegates, as deeply as men could be; yet all these pledges have been deliberately and wantonly violated by this Administration.

IX.—WHY THE CONSTITUTION WAS NOT SUBMITTED.

The answer is easy, why the constitution was not submitted to the people. Because, if it had been, it would have been rejected by a vote of more than five to one. This was a matter of entire and absolute certainty. The refusal to submit it was a confession of its weakness. Speaking of the free-State party, the President says:

"They have ever refused to sanction or recognize any other constitution than that framed at Topeka. Had the whole Lecompton constitution been submitted to the people, the adherents of this organization would undoubtedly have voted against it."

But that would have been no harm, and no reason for refusing to submit it, even with the pro-slavery party, unless the free-State party, by voting against it, could have defeated it; and that is conceding this to be the constitution of a minority, to which the majority were known to be opposed. Rebellious people; preferring freedom to slavery! Why, indeed, submit it to them, when they were unalterably opposed to it, had predetermined not to have it, and "would doubtless have voted against it?"

Again, the President says they refused to vote for delegates to the convention, not because "there was an omission to register the comparatively few voters who were inhabitants of certain counties of Kansas," "but because they had predetermined, at all hazards, to adhere to their revolutionary organization, and defeat the establishment of any other constitution than that they had framed at Topeka." Disloyal subjects! what right had they to adhere to their own constitution and their own opinions, against United States troops and Federal dictation; against a legal minority sustained by the President! The "few voters of certain counties," were all the voters in more than half the counties of the Territory, by fraud deprived of all representation and of all right to vote! Is that maintaining the sacred right of each individual to vote? And if those not voting were free-State men, as the President assumes—and as is doubtless the fact—they composed more than three fourths of the legal voters, even in the registered counties. Here, those who could vote are censured for not voting! They expected and desired to vote upon the constitution, but that is not allowed, because they "would doubtless have voted against it," and the minority had "predetermined, at all hazards, to adhere to" the constitution they had framed at Lecompton!

The arguments used in favor of this constitution concede, or assume, that the majority of the people are opposed to it. The President does not deny this; the majority of the committee do not deny it; no honest, unprejudiced man can deny it. Is there a member of this House who will rise here in his place and say that he honestly believes a majority of the people of Kansas are in favor of this constitution? I ask for a reply. Will any one say "yes" to that inquiry? Not one! No one believes it; and yet you are for forcing it upon them against their will. Is that your non-intervention? Is that the "popular sovereignty" you promised them?

The argument is, one party is legal and the other illegal; that is, one party has a right to their opinions, and the other party has not; that the people in fourteen States will not like it if Kansas is not made a slave State. Was there any pledge made to them, because they voted for the President, that Kansas should be made a slave State? If not, why should they demand any interference by the President? Why should he urge the absurdity that, after a pro-slavery constitution, irrevocable as to slavery, is once firmly fixed upon the people, they can get rid of it and make it a free State much easier than they can before? A proposition so repugnant to reason as to require no answer. Its statement is its refutation. Make it a slave State, beyond the power of change, but by revolution, in order to give the majority a better chance to make it a free State!

X.—ELECTION ON THE FOURTH OF JANUARY.

The refusal to submit the Lecompton constitution to the people for their adoption or rejection in violation of the organic act, of the general understanding, and of all the promises that had been made, created such a feeling of just indignation that acting Governor Stanton, in order to preserve the public peace, judged it advisable to convene the Legislature to take such action as might be deemed proper to prevent the attempted fraud from being consummated showing that he at least intended to fulfill the promises he had made. For his integrity in this respect he deserves the thanks of all good men.

In his message he advised against repealing the law calling the convention or interfering with its action, recommending simply the passage of a law submitting the constitution to a fair vote, and expressing his confident belief that if adopted, Kansas would be peaceably admitted under it; and if rejected, that Congress never would violate the rights of the people by forcing a constitution upon them against their will fairly expressed. The Legislature met and passed an act in accordance with this recommendation on the 17th December, 1857, submitting the constitution fairly to the people at an election to be held on the 4th of January last. On that day an election was held under the law, and according to law, and the vote stood, for the constitution, 162; against it, 10,226—being the largest vote ever polled at any election in Kansas, and the last election held, and the question being directly upon the Lecompton constitution. The election was fairly and peaceably conducted, and this vote stands of record as the actual and legal expression of the will of the people of Kansas against this constitution; rejecting it not only by a majority, but by a vote almost unanimous. The people have decided, and rejected the Lecompton constitution.

This election was recognized and approved by the Administration before it was held, and Governor Denver was directed to see it properly conducted "without interruption." And he did so. The election was fairly and peaceably conducted.

Secretary Cass, in his instructions dated 11th December, 1857, says:

"The Territorial Legislature doubtless convened on the 7th instant, and while it remains in session its members are entitled to be secure and free in their deliberations. Its rightful action must also be respected. Should it authorize an election by the people, for any purpose, this election should be held without interruption, no less than those authorized by the convention. While the peace of the Territory is preserved, and the freedom of elections is secured, there need be no fear of disastrous consequences."

Why should not the decision of the people of Kansas be respected? It is their right to make their own constitution; they are to live under it, and be governed by it. And that right was guaranteed to them by the organic act. But because the decision was in favor of freedom and against slavery, the Administration now disregards this election. The President objects: First, that he has had no "official information" of the result. Second, that after the doings of the convention, the Legislature had no power to order the election.

1. As to notice. The President, upon the principles of special pleading, adopted in the message, does not deny information, but admits it; his denial is, that it has not been "officially communicated." If it has not, it is the fault of the President's friends, who give or withhold "official information," just as he wills and directs. Calhoun, president of the bogus convention, has long been here. Why is official information improperly withheld? Are the fraudulent returns still incomplete, or secreted in so many places he has as yet been unable to gather them together? But we have an official and admitted report.

PROCLAMATION.

In accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act submitting the constitution framed at Lecompton under the act of the Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, entitled 'An act to provide for taking a census and election of delegates to a convention,'" passed February 19, A. Some precincts have not yet sent in their returns, but the above is the complete vote received to this date.

J. W. DENVER,
Secretary and Acting Governor.

C. W. BABCOCK,
President of the Council.

G. W. DEITZLER,
Speaker of House of Representatives.

January 14, 1858.

It is said if all the returns had been made, the majority against the constitution would have been over twelve thousand.

2. As to the validity of the election.—The act of the Legislature calling the convention did not require the constitution to be submitted to the people. Governor Geary vetoed it for this reason, and the bogus Legislature passed it by a two-third vote, over his veto. Was the fraud since attempted, then designed?

All concede that the Legislature could then have required its submission! But no one contends it could have dictated the form of the constitution. Why this difference? The right to form the constitution was delegated to the convention, the right to pass upon it belonged to the people. The delegates could not ratify their own acts. The act of the Legislature (and the President says it was an act of usurpation) only authorized them to form a constitution. That was all the authority the convention had. It had no legislative powers. The Legislature could not be affected by it—that remained the same until Kansas was admitted as a State as if no convention had been called. Yet the convention assumed legislative power, and provided that all laws not repugnant to their constitution should not be altered, amended, or repealed (they omitted to provide against the passage of a new law) until after the constitution was adopted; and that all civil and military officers should hold their offices until after that time. The convention met in September and adjourned over until after the October election, to know what kind of a Legislature might be elected; and with all the frauds practiced, it was against the pro-slavery party. Then they legislated their laws to stand and their officers to hold over, in the convention. In effect, the convention abolished the Governor and Legislature without a pretense of authority to do anything of the kind. Until it is admitted as a State Kansas must remain a Territory. The President calls it a Territory and keeps the territorial officers there. And the Governor and Legislature hold their offices until others are commissioned to act. No caucus or convention could deprive them of their offices or impair their authority.

This convention also displaced the legal officers and judges of election, and appointed John Calhoun to a dictatorship, with full power to fill these places with his own corrupt tools and agents, acting under no legal responsibility or sanction whatever, for the convention could not impose any, to conduct an election for the pretended submission, and for State officers under this constitution, so as to declare their friends elected, let the result be as it might! This election was to be held on the 21st December.

Before that time, and before the constitution was pretended to be in existence for any purpose, the Legislature provided by law for its submission to a fair vote of the people.

On the 8th of December the President said, in his annual message:

"Whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State must eventually, under some authority, be decided by an election."

On that very same day Governor Stanton convened the Legislature of Kansas to provide for such an election. On the 17th of December the law was passed; and under it the question has been decided "by an election!"

The President also said:

"The truth is that no other authentic and satisfactory mode exists of ascertaining the will of a majority of the people of a State or Territory, on an important and exciting question, like slavery in Kansas, except by leaving it to a direct vote."

Here the only authentic and satisfactory mode has been adopted, and the will of the majority has been ascertained "by a direct vote!"

Had the Legislature calling the convention enacted it might put the constitution into operation without submitting it to the people, its authority to do so would have depended entirely upon that act of the Legislature; and that act, like any other law, might have been changed or repealed, or a submission required at any time before the constitution had been put into operation under it; and no State constitution could be put into operation until Congress admitted the Territory as a State. Attempting to do this, is called rebellion! And where there was a general dissatisfaction expressed, the Legislature should require it to be submitted to a vote, as they did. A mere law may be changed by the same power that can enact it. A further law may also be enacted.

When it is admitted the power belonged to the Legislature, and that it might have directed a submission before the convention met, it may not be denied the same power still remained, and a submission could just as legally be directed afterwards as before; and this provision, afterwards made, would be as legal as if embraced in the original act. This power had not been surrendered. The Legislature could not lose it, or the convention acquire it, by implication. The law for the submission is as valid as the law for the convention; one rests on the same authority as the other, and must have the same force and effect. The law ordering the election was, therefore, legal and valid; and the decision of the people under it, final and conclusive!

3. As to the effect of this election.—The past and present Administrations have constantly urged the people of Kansas to settle all their difficulties peaceably at their elections. Yet, the President now refuses to recognize that fair and peaceable mode of settlement. The professions and practice are in conflict. At one time when the Legislature was elected, an armed invasion interferes and prevents a fair election; at another, they are required to vote viva voce, so that frauds may be practiced to any necessary extent. And by the President's officials the people in twenty counties are disfranchised and denied the right to vote. All these fraudulent proceedings are recognized, and these are all held to be valid elections. But when a fair election has been held, the President will not hear the result, or recognize its force when heard!

He says a submission to the people is correct in principle, and he trusts will be adopted "on all future occasions." Why apply this correct principle to future occasions only? No case can ever arise where a greater necessity for it will exist. In this case it was made indispensable by the organic act.

It is not only correct in principle but it is universal in practice. There is not an existing State constitution in the Union that has not in some way been sanctioned by a vote of the people governed by it. Why should Kansas be made an exception?

Whether the law for this election was valid, as the people all believed, or invalid, as is now pretended, is, in truth, wholly immaterial, so long as the election was fairly held, and the will of the majority fairly expressed. No legal objection or legal quibble can change or alter the great fact that the people of Kansas, not only a majority, but the whole people, with almost one unanimous voice, have repudiated, rejected, and condemned this constitution. That no man may deny or dispute. The assent of the people is as necessary as the assent of Congress to this instrument; indeed, more so; for they are to live under it and be governed by it. Congress cannot rightfully force a State into the Union against their will, and under a constitution rejected by them. This would be an arbitrary and unconstitutional exercise of power. A government thus imposed upon a people would not be republican either in form or in fact.

Had the people of Kansas all signed a remonstrance against this constitution, and sent it here, would it be any answer to say no law had been passed authorizing them to protest against it in this manner? The fact is the same, whether their wishes are or are not expressed under color of law. The voluntary expression of public sentiment is the same as if it was done under the forms of law. And here the fact cannot be denied, the people are opposed to this constitution.

XI. VOTE ON THE STATE OFFICERS ON THE FOURTH OF JANUARY.

According to the official certificate of Governor Denver and the presiding officers of the Legislature, who were present at the canvass, the free-State officers and member of Congress were all elected, the lowest majority being over three hundred. To the Senate, thirteen free-State and six pro-slavery members were elected; and to the House, twenty-nine free-State and fifteen pro-slavery members were elected. Mr. Calhoun, however, who does the heavy work in this Kansas business, has never declared the result, either as to the State officers or members of the Legislature. It is said he stated freely, in Missouri, that the entire pro-slavery State ticket was elected, and also the pro-slavery member of Congress, and that the pro-slavery party had a majority in both branches of the Legislature. And this, no doubt, will be the declared result, contrary to the true result, as certified by Governor Denver. If intended to be made otherwise, it would have been actually settled long ago, and been used as an argument in favor of the expediency of accepting the Lecompton constitution. Withholding these election returns, and refusing to declare the result, with the knowledge, and, as it must be presumed, the approval of the Administration, is one of the many things that mark the true character of this Lecompton fraud. But the secret is out at last: Calhoun, in his statement to Senator Green, says the whole free-State vote at this election was seven thousand and fifty-nine, of which six hundred and thirty-one were "illegally cast," and that the legal pro-slavery vote was six thousand five hundred and eighty-one. Deducting the six hundred and thirty-one votes which he declares illegal, and the pro-slavery party has a majority of one hundred and fifty-three!

XII.—DELAWARE CROSSING.

On the 4th January the free-State officers were elected, as I have stated, by about three hundred majority. This majority it was necessary to overcome, and to change the Legislature by having a majority in Leavenworth county. Enough votes to do this were fraudulently returned from Delaware Crossing, namely, three hundred and seventy-nine—every vote pro-slavery?

It has since been established; and Isaac Munday, one of the judges of the election at that precinct, testified that only forty-three votes were polled at that place; that the returns had been taken off, a forged return of three hundred and seventy-nine votes added, and the certificate of the judges attached; that the true returns were given to Henderson to carry to Calhoun before this forged vote was added. Calhoun denies receiving them, but the forged returns are found secreted on his premises. In this transaction Calhoun, his chief clerk, McLane, his brother-in-law, Diffendorf, and Henderson, one or all, appear to be implicated, and their testimony and statements do not agree. This appears to be a sore place; and Mr. Calhoun was forced to come out in the newspapers with a story that he, poor soul, was imposed upon! The proof of the fraud could not be disputed, and Calhoun said if Governor Denver would take the testimony of the judges of the election, he would count out this fraudulent and forged vote. Mun-day, on his way to give his evidence, was shot. The dead tell no tales. His testimony was never taken again, as Calhoun required. He exposed the crime. Who were the criminals? The pro-slavery men say Munday shot himself, or was murdered by some free-State man! How improbable! He had no reason for suicide; he had concluded to serve God and let slavery alone. Who had anything to fear from Munday's evidence? What party might lose? what men be exposed by it? Who could have any motive of fear or of revenge, to prompt them on to such a deed? Those who had been guilty of forgery or perjury, or both, in regard to this transaction! If he was murdered, it was not by free-State men; they were glad to have him tell the truth; they wanted his evidence! It was done by some fiend of the pro-slavery faction from fear, or for revenge—another crime in the effort to make Kansas a slave State.

Delaware Crossing.

Isaac Munday, being sworn, deposes and says: I reside at Delaware Agency, Leavenworth county, Kansas Territory; was one of the judges of election at that precinct, on the election held there on the 4th of January, 1858, for officers under the Lecompton constitution; I was before this board to testify at Leavenworth city on the 26th day of January, 1858; I did not then see the poll-books of Delaware Agency precinct. I have been shown now, by the board, a roll, which purports to be the poll-books of that precinct; I find, on examination, a certificate made out upon a portion of a sheet of paper, containing the certificates of the judges of election, signed by me and the other judges; the signatures, I believe, are genuine, but the preceding seven sheets of paper, with lines drawn between two columns of names, and numbered to represent three hundred and seventy-nine names, I never saw before; the portion of paper upon which the certificates are made out appears to have been cut from the original poll-books, as made out and signed by the judges of election, and has been wafered to this list, which was never made out by us; the poll-books which I signed at the close of the election were made out upon three sheets of paper, wafered one upon the other; the heading of the original poll-books was made out upon a broader sheet of paper than this, and in an entirely different handwriting; the names on the list were in one column, and numbered differently from what they are in this; I see nothing genuine in these poll-books, except the certificate which is appended, and which has apparently been cut from the original roll; there were some names signed on the last sheet, just above the certificate; this has been cut between the certificate and the names; the paper which we used was wafered together with red wafers; these are fastened with wafers of a different color; the names of the persons who really did vote there on that day were written in a different order from what they are here; there were just forty-three votes taken in by us there, and those were all the names written on the list; on this I find three hundred and seventy-nine names, and names of men who did not vote there, and men that I never saw or heard of; I believe the whole thing is a forgery, except what appears on the last sheet, which contains the certificate, as signed by myself and the other judges; I have been shown by this board a tally-list, accompanying the poll-books, which tally-list gives to each of the Democratic candidates three hundred and seventy-nine votes; I never saw that tally-list before; the heading and the certificate which we used at the election were brought to the poll-room on the day of the election, I think, by Mr. Garrett; blank spaces were left for the name of the precinct to be written in; I think Mr. Findlay, one of the clerks, filled in the name of the precinct in the blank space in the heading and certificate; I do not know whose handwriting the original heading and certificate were made out in; I do not think it was in the handwriting of Garrett, Wilson, or any of the clerks or judges of election; I do not know where Mr. Garrett got the heading and certificate; the impression made on my mind at the time was that he had brought them up from Wyandot; something was said about making out the poll-books, and he remarked that he had brought them up all prepared; I have been shown an affidavit by this board as follows:

"Territory of Kansas, County of Leavenworth:

"The undersigned, judges and clerks of the election held for State officers and members of the State Legislature, held at the precinct known as Delaware Agency, on the 4th day of January, 1858, do hereby certify that the returns made by us of said election were correct and genuine; and that any statement made by any person as to the vote of said precinct can only be determined, as to its truth or falsity, by a reference to said returns made by us as managers and clerks of said election at said precinct."

I signed an affidavit worded as above, at Westport, Missouri, on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1858, before Samuel Salters, an acting justice of the peace for Johnson county, Kansas Territory; the affidavit was signed by myself and the other judges and clerks of the election; I heard, prior to signing the affidavit, various rumors as to there being forged returns from our precinct; the affidavit was made in Westport; was drawn up by Mr. J. H. Danforth; fearing the various reports as to there being forged returns from our precinct, and knowing that Mr. Garrett had been arrested, and that some one had been at my house to arrest me, on a charge of having something to do with it, I went to Westport for the purpose of seeing General Calhoun, who it was reported would be there; I did not find him there; Mr. Danforth was there; I met him at the post office; never saw him before that day; at the time I signed that affidavit I did not know that there were any forged returns with my signature attached; I supposed then that the genuine returns were in the hands of Calhoun, and believed that if we made this affidavit, Calhoun would get our signatures correctly, and would correct the returns as made out by us; we left the affidavits in Danforth's possession; I sent for Grinter and Wilson to come to meet me at Westport; Garrett and Findlay were there; we went there expecting to meet Calhoun; at the time Danforth wrote the affidavit I think he had heard that there only forty-three votes polled; I mentioned at the time that perhaps it would be better to state in the affidavit the number of votes polled being forty-three; Mr. Findlay said that he thought it would be better to state that the returns as made out by us were correct; Mr. Danforth gave as his opinion that it would be the proper way, and so wrote the affidavit; the affidavit was made before Samuel Salters; I do not know where Salters or Danforth lives; Mr. Garrett told me that he had stated publicly in Lawrence and Lecompton, and had told Governor Denver, that the actual vote was but forty-three; and I supposed that Calhoun knew what the true vote was, and if we made oath that the returns as made out by us were the only evidence as to what the real vote was, it would be counted only as forty-three; I supposed that Calhoun had the correct returns, as Henderson was at our precinct when the polls closed, and suggested to take them up to Leavenworth and give them to Calhoun; I have no idea who committed the forgery of those returns.

ISAAC MUNDAY.

XIII.—VOTING BY FREE-STATE MEN.

That part of the free-State party that voted for State officers on the 4th of January, (about half the free-State men refused to vote,) have been claimed as indorsing and assenting to the Lecompton constitution. This is an error. They voted to take from their enemies, in any contingency, all pretense of authority; and they voted protesting against the Lecompton constitution. The convention nominating the free-State officers unanimously

"Resolved, That the candidate nominated by this convention, on accepting this nomination, will be considered as pledged, should the constitution be approved by Congress, to adopt and execute immediate measures for enabling the people, through a new constitutional convention, to obtain such a constitution as the majority may approve."

And the free-State officers elected (but who have not been, and will not be, declared elected) have sent to Congress their protest against admission under it, reciting how it was made, and concluding as follows:

"In view of these facts—that the Lecompton constitution was framed by a bare majority of a convention, elected by a small minority of the people of Kansas, and that the convention refused to submit the constitution thus framed to a fair vote of the people for their ratification or rejection, and that the Territorial Legislature did provide by law for its submission, under which law it was submitted and rejected by an overwhelming majority of the people; and for the sake of harmony and the integrity of the Union, we, the officers elected under said constitution, do most respectfully and earnestly pray your honorable bodies not to admit Kansas into the Union under said constitution, and thus force upon our people an organic law against their express will, and in violation of every principle of popular government.

"G. W. SMITH, Governor elect.

"W. M. ROBERTS, Lieutenant Governor elect.

"ANDREW J. MEADE, State Treasurer elect.

"J. K. GOODIN, Auditor of State elect."

These facts are stated by responsible men. They are true, and can be proved; and they are undisputed.

XIV.—SUBMISSION ON TWENTY-FIRST DECEMBER.

The pretended submission, on the 21st December, of the constitution, was a most shameless fraud. To submit a constitution to the people, allowing them to vote for it, but not to vote against it, was no submission. It was a confession that it ought to be submitted, but a refusal to submit it.

The President says the convention "did not think proper to submit the whole of this constitution to a popular vote, but they did submit the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State to the people." And he afterwards says that this election presented "a fair opportunity" to decide the question of slavery. It is true, the votes were to be labeled "constitution with slavery" and "constitution with no slavery;" but it is equally true, that the constitutions, in both cases established and perpetuated slavery; the one with no slavery being made unalterable and irrevocable, and in that respect even worse than the other, which did allow slaves to be emancipated upon certain terms. The President says that "Kansas is as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina;" and, therefore, that "slavery can never be prohibited in Kansas except by means of a constitutional provision." The constitution with no slavery declared "that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." If it is now a slave State, and the right of property in slaves and their increase cannot be interfered with, it must remain so. Instead of a prohibition of slavery, here is a constitutional sanction. It also declared, in relation to amendments, that "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

The other constitution was one undisguisedly establishing slavery and prohibiting its repeal, but allowing slaves, upon certain terms, to be emancipated. Here was a double fraud. First, the votes must be for the constitution, and could not be against it. Next, the votes must be for slavery, and could not be against it. If they voted for the "constitution with no slavery," that established slavery, and made it perpetual! What a "fair opportunity" was here presented! A fair opportunity to establish slavery! and to provide that it should never be abolished! and no opportunity to vote against it in any way. "Heads I win, tails you lose"—what a fair opportunity! The President regrets the people neglected to improve it. It was an insulting fraud, that a blackleg would have the grace to disown.

XV.—VOTE ON THE TWENTY-FIRST DECEMBER.

According to the official certificate of Governor Denver and the presiding officers of the Legislature, the whole vote was six thousand seven hundred and twelve for the constitution at this election. They were present at the canvass on the 14th of January. According to Calhoun, it is now six thousand seven hundred and ninety-five. When or how the eighty-three votes were added is not explained! This vote, as reported and counted, was to a great extent fraudulent.

The following is a comparison of the reported vote of four precincts, with the actual vote as proved by the judges and clerks of the elections, before the investigating committee of the Territorial Legislature:

	Reported.	Actual.
Oxford.....	1,226	42
Shawnee.....	753	115
Fort Scott.....	329	150
Kickapoo.....	1,017	385
Total.....	3,347	692

Here are frauds at four precincts of nearly three thousand of the six thousand votes returned. But this is denied and proof withheld.

The officers of the Legislature say:

"Taking into view other, but less important, frauds, we feel safe in saying, that of the whole vote polled, not over two thousand were legal votes polled by citizens of the Territory."

The real vote at this election was, in fact, about the same as at the election for delegates; that is, the actual strength of the factious pro-slavery minority, according to the best and most reliable evidence to be obtained—namely, about two thousand.

At the election on the 4th of January, when a fair vote either way was allowed, there was from ten to twelve thousand majority against this constitution. At the election on the 21st of December, the real vote was about two thousand in its favor. But at this election no one could vote against it!

XVI.—AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION.

The President insists that the majority, if they are for a free State, (as he seems to assume,) can amend this constitution at pleasure, after it is adopted; and says:

"The will of the majority is supreme and irresistible, when expressed in an orderly and lawful manner. They can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure. It would be absurd to say that they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove. If they could do this, they might tie their own hands for a hundred as well as for ten years."

His position is that the proceedings to make a constitution are irrevocable, and the question of its adoption cannot even be submitted to the people, but when once firmly fixed upon them, the will of the majority is supreme and irresistible. The very reverse is the fact. Before they are admitted under it, the will of the majority is fettered by no conditions, and should be supreme and irresistible. After it is adopted it can only be amended in a legal manner, according to its provisions, and slavery could never be prohibited.

Can a majority of the people, or even of the States, amend the Constitution of the United States in violation of its provisions? If so, the clause allowing a representation upon property to a small class of citizens against the equal rights of all other citizens might be amended, and in that way slavery might be disconnected from politics and from Congress, and from all questions as to the political power or the political ascendancy of a privileged class. It would then cease to be political, and like all other property interests, become a matter of pecuniary importance only. No longer an element of political power, it would cease to be a theme of discord and strife. That would place all the citizens of all the States upon a real and just equality, and establish an unbroken peace upon the subject of slavery. Can the provision allowing two Senators to each State, which is not amendable, be changed? If not, can slavery be abolished against the express terms of the Constitution?

The President promised the people of Kansas, through the Governor he appointed for them, that the constitution should be submitted to the people, for them to adopt or reject. That promise has been violated. Now he expresses an opinion that if the constitution establishing slavery is adopted, it can be easily amended and made a free-State constitution! The opinion is more worthless than the promise; for if in this instance he should maintain his integrity, he cannot decide this question—that will come before the pro-slavery judges of Kansas, subject to an appeal to the pro-slavery judges of the Supreme Court. The Kansas judges are the same who directed indictment against citizens of Kansas for their political opinions. The supreme judges are the same who recently, in an opinion—not a decision—(the Dred Scott case) usurped legislative powers beyond those admitted to belong to Congress, and by a kind of judicial usurpation, and judicial enactment, attempted to extend slavery beyond the limits of the States where it existed, into all the Territories of the United States. And this the President recognizes as law, when these judges had no more authority to extend slavery beyond the limits of the States where it was upheld by local law than so many other persons who never had been judges. Both courts are intensely pro-slavery, and, judging the future by the past, ready to do anything for slavery that party necessities may require. These courts would say the constitution, if once adopted, could only be amended in a legal way, and according to its provisions, and not at all as to slavery, which is made irrepealable. Nor could any act of Congress change this, as has been suggested. Congress can only admit or refuse to admit the State under the Constitution. The people of Kansas, up to this time, have been unable to get rid of the illegal legislation of 1855. And they never could change this pro-slavery constitution, if it should be adopted, short of revolution.

XVII.—EQUAL RIGHTS.

The rulers of this Government, the privileged political class, who represent slavery, say they must have equal rights in the Union or they will go out of it. It is just and right that the people of different States and different sections, of different occupations and pursuits, should have equal political rights, and, in proportion to their numbers, equal political power. We all agree in this great principle, upon which alone a representative government can rest. If those who complain are denied this, I will aid them to obtain it by a change of policy, or of the Constitution itself. Will they do the same? Will they consent to stand upon a real and true equality? If so, we have only to examine fairly what section, or class of States, or individuals, have had more than their equal share of political power, and correct it. This question of slavery has been made, and is, a question of political power. So says Senator Mason; so says the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] and I admit it. It is this that brings it here; it is this that gives to it its bitterness; and, as they say, endangers the Union. How stands the account? Who hold the power of this Government in their hands? Who have held it in their hands for the last sixty years? Is it the Representatives of all the people of all the States equal? Have the Representatives of the free States had it in their control? No man can say so truly. History records the fact that the owners of slave property, small in number, control this Government, and have, for the last sixty years. So said Mr. Meade in 1848; so said Mr. Clay in 1850; and so says Mr. Hammond in 1858; and the records of the Government prove it beyond dispute. It is as astonishing as it is undeniable. The free States (slave owners may well use that term in reproach and in derision) have only been free to do as their masters—the owners of slave property—directed.

The population of the free States is over thirteen millions; of the slave States, over six millions. There have been eighteen presidential elections; twelve Presidents were slaveholders, six were not, but northern men with southern sentiments. The slaveholders have held the Presidency for forty-eight years—more than two thirds of the entire period. No northern man has ever been reelected; five of the slave-owners have been. As far as the Presidency is concerned, the slave-owners have had more than their equal rights! There are over twenty millions of free people in the Union; the slave-owners numbered, in 1850, three hundred and forty-six thousand and forty-seven. According to numbers, they should have had the Presidency but a single year; they have had it over forty-eight!

Since 1809, the President pro tempore of the Senate has been a slaveholder, except Mr. Southard, of New Jersey, and Mr. Bright, of Indiana, for five or six years in all! And they were zealous adherents of the slave power! A single year was all they could claim upon the principle of equal rights!

Since 1820, for thirty-eight years closing with the present Congress, slave-owners have been Speakers of the House for thirty years; and free-State men for only eight years! The Speaker, by the appointment of committees, controls the legislation of the country more than any other officer of the Government, and the committees never were appointed in so unfair and partisan a manner as in the present Congress!

In the thirty-five Congresses, we have had twenty-two Speakers who were slave-owners, and twelve who were free-State men. What class of men have had more than their equal rights?

Since 1841, slave-owners have held the office of Secretary of the Navy, except two years, up to the organization of the present Cabinet; and since 1849, a slave-owner has always been Secretary of War. The free States furnish most of the shipping and seamen for the Navy, and most of the soldiers for the Army; but slave-owners command them. Who have had more, in this, than their equal rights?

Since 1789, up to the present Administration, the Secretary of State has been appointed fourteen times from slave-owners, and only eight times from free-State men. This is the first officer of the Cabinet, who has charge of the foreign relations of the country. What men have had more than their equal rights?

In the Supreme Court, five of the nine judges, including the Chief Justice, have always been slave-owners, and only four from the free States, and these must be sturdy adherents of the slave power. So that one department of the Government has been forever exclusively in the hands of slave-owners. Is this giving the other citizens their equal rights? Nearly one hundred to one of the people of this country are not slave-owners, and more than three fourths of the business of this court arises in the free States!

There is a class of the people having more political power, than any other class of citizens—namely, the slave-owners. There are three hundred and forty-six thousand and forty-seven of them, including men, women, and children. They admit and boast that they have controlled the Government for sixty years, and do now. They own three million two hundred and four thousand two hundred and eighty-seven slaves. Three fifths of them are counted; so that three hundred and forty-six thousand and forty-seven persons are counted as if they numbered in fact two million two hundred and sixty-eight thousand six hundred and nineteen in the scale of representation. These three hundred and forty-six thousand are counted nearly two million more than they are, because they own slaves. Instead of three Representatives in Congress, they have thirty, because they own slaves. But this is not all the political power they have. They control those States. The free whites in the slave States, not owning slaves, numbering five million eight hundred and thirty-eight thousand three hundred and fifty-seven, the great body of the people, do not seem practically to have any political power. Who ever heard of any of them being President, Vice President, a Cabinet officer, a Senator, or member of Congress, or a judge of the Supreme Court, or filling any other important office under this Government? The slave-owners, by their property and political privileges, are made the ruling class in those States. They control the press, and force submission to their will by a system of terrorism and constrained public sentiment. We must add to their power the nearly six million non-slaveholders in the slave States. These three hundred and forty-six thousand slave-owners, bound together by a single interest, have therefore in their hands practically the political power of about eight million people, bond and free. Do they claim more than that for their equal rights?

We find that three hundred and forty-six thousand slaveholders have had one department of the Government in their hands absolutely—the judiciary; the executive practically, and also the legislative—all; and yet they are going out of the Union if they cannot have their equal rights.

This is no over statement. More than twenty million free people are governed by some three hundred and forty-six thousand, and have been for sixty years; and they claim more, or will go out of the Union after equal rights. All I can say is, if they were fairly out of the Union we might, after their departure, have equal rights.

They talk of an equilibrium—that is the phrase. A greater absurdity could not be imagined. How can you arrest the natural increase of over twenty million free people, and the immense immigration here, to keep pace with three fifths of your increase of slaves? for, if one increases faster than the other, your equilibrium is overthrown. You cannot do this; and, therefore, you attempt to overthrow the principle of equal rights in representation. Every departure from this is a step towards despotism. Would it not be absurd for the shoemakers in the free States (and they are more numerous than the slaveholders) to demand an equilibrium, or say they would leave the Union? or for Rhode Island to say she would dash the Union into fragments unless her relative strength in the Government was kept exactly stationary, as it was when there were but thirteen States in the Union? We should answer to all these claims: "Keep cool; you are not wronged; you have your just and equal share in the Government in proportion to your numbers;" that is, republican and democratic. So have slaveholders; and more than that, just so much more as slave representation increases it. And this they have. Whether there should be one or more slave States, their equal rights can never be destroyed. Increasing free States or decreasing slave States could never deprive a single slave State of their equal rights. It might lessen—it could never remove—the inequality and injustice that now give them absolute power in the Government.

Fifteen slave States ".....	6,184,404

The fifteen free States have more than double the free white population that the fifteen slave States have.

Territory.

Fifteen slave States contain.....	928,894 square miles.
Fifteen free States ".....	454,344 " "
Difference.....	474,550

The fifteen slave States contain more than double the territory of the fifteen free States. In other words, the slave States now have about five times the extent of territory, according to population, that the free States have; including slaves and all, they have about three times the territory of the free States, according to population! Yet they would still encroach upon free territory; they still demand more for slavery.

Nine slave States have been added, containing.....	722,922 square miles.
Six free States have been added, containing.....	290,264 " "
Difference.....	432,658 " "

Maine and Vermont were formed by dividing old States, and not from added territory. While the free States have more than double the population, the slave States have gained more than double the territory, by the admission of new States. That is, the addition made (by the admission of new States) to the limits of slavery is about five times in extent to the addition made to the free States, in proportion to numbers.

The five purchased slave States of Florida, Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Missouri, contain five hundred and forty-three thousand three hundred and sixty-nine square miles.

The whole fifteen free States contain four hundred and fifty-four thousand three hundred and forty-four square miles.

The territory added to the slave States by purchase is larger than all the fifteen free States by eighty-nine thousand and twenty-five square miles.

This excess is a larger territory than is contained in seven of the free States. And this was all purchased to extend slavery; while the free States admitted have been formed out of territory belonging to the United States when the Government was established, and to which the ordinance of Jefferson, and of freedom, prohibiting slavery, was applied by the fathers of the republic.

When so much has been yielded to slavery, will southern Representatives object to admitting one free State out of all the purchased territory?

The fifteen free States have thirteen million of free white inhabitants; the fifteen slave States six million; yet each have thirty Senators. True, the small States are entitled to two Senators each, as well as the larger ones; but this number of slave States, extended over a large territory, with a small population, makes the disproportioned representation of the two sections in the Senate too palpably unjust. In Senators the slave States have, by this system, kept up a representation in the proportion of two to one as against the free States.

In the House, the slave States have ninety members, representing six million of population; the free States one hundred and forty-two members, representing thirteen million. Upon the same ratio with the slave States, the free States should have one hundred and ninety-five members—a loss to them of fifty-three—in the popular branch of the Government; that in which the popular voice is to be heard and the popular will expressed.

Vermont and New Hampshire, with a population of six hundred and thirty thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight have six Representatives.

South Carolina has six, also, with only two hundred and seventy-four thousand five hundred and fifty-three; less by three hundred and fifty-six thousand two hundred and ninety-five—not one half as much.

At the ratio of South Carolina representation, these free States should have fourteen Representatives, instead of six. Is there not a wide difference in the political rights of these States? My district has a population of over one hundred thousand; the ratio of South Carolina is about forty-five thousand; that would more than double the representation of every free State.

Three congressional districts in New York contain a larger free white population than the State of South Carolina. Yet this is the State that is going to force slavery into Kansas—the one that has so often complained of the hardships of remaining one of the United States, and threatened disunion!

With over one hundred and ten thousand more slaves than white inhabitants, to be held in subjection, what a formidable force South Carolina could command to destroy the Union! Only think, what a regiment she could muster! and think, too, what deep cause she has for revolution! More than twice the representation according to numbers! and, therefore, more than twice the political power in proportion, allowed to any free State in the Union! And this unequal representation South Carolina would retain, if twenty free States were admitted. Why, then, should she object? Florida has forty-five thousand two hundred and three white inhabitants; Delaware, seventy-one thousand one hundred and sixty-nine; both together have about the same population as the St. Lawrence and Herkimer congressional district in New York, formerly represented by Preston King; yet these two slave States have six electoral votes; this district but one. South Carolina has a less white population than a single congressional district in Iowa! yet it has eight electoral votes.

Politically, slavery is the greatest of all institutions—a foe to capital, energy, enterprise, and improvement. The very soil loses half its value, where slavery desecrates it. Yet slavery is the great political institution of this country. Politicians and office-seekers—from presidential aspirants, who promulgate their devotion from high places, down to the lowest menial in or about the public offices—are swift to do it reverence, eager rivals to be foremost in aiding its further extension and more permanent ascendancy. They vie with each other as to who shall be its most rampant and rabid advocate, and stoop the lowest to propitiate its favor. And this will continue, so long as devotion to slavery is the only passport to office. On this single ground stood all the rival candidates for the nomination at Cincinnati. Upon this, each relied for success. To them their subservience to slavery was more important than ability, honesty, or integrity. An avowed determination to extend slavery was the all-important qualification. All stood on this platform, but most prominently the nominees of the misnamed Democracy, now having but one policy, and one principle—the extension of human bondage.

The following statement, taken from the census of 1850, will show the number of slave owners in the slave States:

States.	Slaveholders in each.
Alabama.....	29,295
Arkansas.....	5,999
Delaware.....	809
Florida.....	3,520
Georgia.....	38,456
Kentucky.....	38,385
Louisiana.....	20,670
Maryland.....	16,040
Mississippi.....	23,116
Missouri.....	19,185
North Carolina.....	28,303
South Carolina.....	25,506
Tennessee.....	33,864
Texas.....	7,747
Virginia.....	53,063
Total.....	346,047

Thus it will be seen that the number of slave owners, including men, women, and children, is only about three hundred and forty-six thousand.

Slaveholders have political advantages denied to all other men; and politicians are their arrogant champions. There can be no end of slavery aggression and slavery agitation until you disconnect slavery and politics; until it is settled, and definitely settled, that slavery cannot be extended for political purposes.

Votes of eleven slaveholding States at the election in 1852, when Mr. Pierce was chosen, as contrasted with the vote of New York.

1. Arkansas.....	19,377	7. Texas.....	18,547
2. Delaware.....	12,673	8. Alabama.....	41,919
3. Florida.....	7,193	9. Louisiana.....	35,902
4. Georgia.....	51,365	10. Mississippi.....	44,424
5. Maryland.....	75,153	11. Virginia.....	129,545
6. North Carolina.....	78,861
Aggregate vote of eleven States.....	515,159
Vote of New York.....	522,294

Being 7,135 votes more than all the others.

These eleven States, (Virginia included,) that gave, in 1852, a less vote than New York for President, have twenty-two Senators; New York has only two!

They have seventy-nine electoral votes for President; New York only thirty-five—not half as many! They have fifty-seven Representatives in Congress; New York but thirty-three! difference, twenty-four!

XVIII.—KANSAS MESSAGE.

A strange delusion seems to pervade the mind of the President in relation to the state of parties in Kansas. This arises from the difficulty of inducing him to realize the fact that a great majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the policy of the Administration; are opposed to extending slavery into free territory and making Kansas a slave State. The President speaks of one of the political parties of Kansas as "enemies" of the Government, "revolutionary," and in a state of rebellion; and of the other, as "friends of the Government, loyal, and strictly regular" in all they have done! The free-State party is the illegal, and the pro-slavery party is the legal political party, according to the President. He makes no unkind allusion to the many outrages of his friends upon the people of Kansas. Against border-ruffian invasion and usurpation; against judicial corruption and oppression; against election frauds, illegal voting, and false returns; against the crimes of robbery, arson, and murder that his friends have been regularly committing for the last four years, he makes no complaint. He denounces one political party as rebels, and indorses the other as regular. This censure is as undeserved as the praise is unmerited.

He declares that the government of Kansas, (set up by border-ruffian invasion, as has been established by evidence,) which the people would otherwise have subverted, has been maintained with the troops of the United States. What an admission is here involuntarily made, that the people of Kansas have been and are now, kept in subjection to the slave power by force! Whoever before heard of the necessity of a military force to prevent the minority from taking the rule out of the hands of the majority? To force slavery into a free Territory, and upon an unwilling people, all the power of the past and present Administrations has been exerted. Every species of injustice and oppression has been connived at and encouraged; the most outrageous frauds have been sanctioned and adopted; criminal prosecutions for political opinions corruptly instituted; leading free-State men unlawfully arrested and imprisoned; crime left unpunished and criminals protected; and a standing army, in violation of law, has been and is now stationed in Kansas to force the people to submission. All this, and much more, has been done to make Kansas a slave State. And all in vain. It has only inspired an unyielding spirit of resistance in the people. It has only deepened and strengthened their love of liberty and hatred of oppression.

The issue between the President and the people of Kansas is simply this: he is determined to make Kansas a slave State in spite of the people; and they are determined it shall be a free State in spite of the President. By the law, the people of Kansas were to be left perfectly free to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way. They do not understand "non-intervention" to mean executive dictation! or "popular sovereignty" that the minority shall rule! And they never will understand it—they never will submit to it. Instead of regulating their own affairs, they are denied the right to be heard in regard to the constitution that is to be forced upon them. Their consent is not required. Their protest is not regarded. And after all these pledges and professions, slavery is to be forced upon them, against their recorded will and their earnest protestations, by the Congress of the United States and the power of the General Government!

XIX.—REBELLION.

The old charge of rebellion is made anew. In reviving this foolish and exploded false pretense the President reflects upon the Kansas judiciary. Their decision upon this question should be treated with as ready a respect, by the President at least, as an extra-judicial opinion of the Supreme Court. This question has been judicially settled. During the last Administration indictments were directed and pronounced against Governor Robinson and ninety-seven other leading free-State men, for treason and constructive treason, because they had taken steps for the admission of Kansas as a free State—this same rebellion of the people against the minority, that the President has repeated so often. The people had peaceably formed a free-State constitution, and elected officers under it, so as to put it into immediate operation, if admitted. The Lecomptonites have done the same, and a little more; for they have not only elected officers under their constitution, but have abolished the Governor and Legislature, and the officers of election—in fact, set aside the whole territorial government. As to rebellion, the President's "friends" are worse off than his enemies in Kansas. Minnesota has elected her officers: is Minnesota in rebellion? Is a Territory in rebellion by preparing for and asking admission as a State?

Indictments against the leading free-State men were directed and found, and they were arrested and imprisoned. The judges appointed by the last Administration were the willing tools in this act of tyranny and oppression—judges who issued process to destroy hotels and printing presses as nuisances, if owned by free-State men, and who discharged men arrested and indicted for murder if they belonged to the pro-slavery faction. No crime committed against a free-State man has ever been heard of as having been redressed or punished by them. I drew articles of impeachment to present in the last Congress against one of these corrupt judges, Leecompte; but the slave power is so strong in this Government that there is no place in it where he could be fairly tried and justly punished. It would have been as idle as the complaints that Governor Geary preferred against him; and for that reason alone I abandoned it.

After a long delay and imprisonment, these ninety-eight State prisoners and Administration rebels were brought to trial before these judges—the friends and officials of the past and present Administrations. And even Leecompte and Cato were forced to acknowledge they had done nothing criminal, and the indictments were dismissed. The intended purpose was answered: while these men were imprisoned, the Leecompton fraud had been planned and prepared. After all this, for the President to call these proceedings of the free-State party rebellious, is disrespectful to the pure judiciary of Kansas—men who would go as far for slavery as the most degraded of men dare go; whose judicial action even the President does not seem to respect.

XX.—GOVERNORS OF KANSAS.

Since October, 1854, counting the Secretaries who have acted as Governors, Kansas has had seven Governors—Reeder, Shannon, Woodson, Geary, Walker, Stanton, and Denver—all appointed by President Pierce or Buchanan, within a little over three years; and all removed by them, or forced to resign, but Denver, and it is said he is soon to be removed. Both Administrations were insanely bent upon forcing slavery into Kansas—the last being (like the last state of the man who took into his council seven other spirits more wicked than himself) “worse than the first.” All these men were the party friends of the Presidents appointing them—some of them southern men; some northern men with southern sentiments. Two of them voted in Congress to repeal the Missouri compromise and open Kansas to slavery; and all were bound by their party prejudices and party feelings, to carry out the wishes of their party in Kansas. Bound, too, by every motive of interest or ambition to carry out that policy—selected by the President and removable at his will; selected as the very man in each case best fitted to aid in the great purpose of making Kansas a slave State—each of these men went to Kansas bitterly prejudiced against the free-State party, just as the President is now. Some of them were men of great ability and rare and ripe experience, who were as well qualified by their high standing and position to command respect and inspire confidence as any that could have been selected. Yet all these men have learned to respect the rights of the people of Kansas when they came to know them, however strongly prejudiced against them before. All these men have been forced to bear unwilling testimony in their favor. And when the cry of oppression has been heard from that far-off Territory, and these men have been called upon to explain why there was disturbance, and why there was complaint, they have been compelled to say the disturbances were the work of the pro-slavery party and their allies, and that the free-State men had been wronged and trampled upon. Reeder said so, and he opposed, as well as he could, Missouri invasion and dictation, and he was removed! Shannon, partisan as he was, and reckless as he was, under whose rule almost every spot in Kansas was witness to some great crime—so that it furnishes to this day its legend of horror written in blood—even he, at last, was forced to confess the same. The light of truth shone too brightly around him to be resisted, and then he was removed!

Geary appears to have desired to do justice to the people of Kansas. He said the disturbances were made by the pro-slavery party, and the free-State party had been greatly wronged. He even attempted to punish crime; he stood by and heard the dying declaration of Buffum, murdered by Hayes; and he promised to see that the murderer was punished. He caused him to be arrested, and he was indicted by a pro-slavery grand jury. Judge Leecompte discharged him. Again he was arrested and again discharged. The Governor appealed to the President to remove Judge Leecompte. It was said that he would be removed; he was not removed, but Governor Geary was!

Governor Walker went there believing in rebellion and proclaiming rebellion, until he learned it was only a paper rebellion made by the Executive to cover its own proceedings. He found the people orderly and peaceable; he found that all they asked was the rights of American freemen, to have a voice in making the government and the constitution under which they were to live. He promised this to them, for himself and for the President and the Cabinet; he pledged his honor to see that this was allowed to them; but when it was found the people would not consent to make Kansas a slave State, he was required to violate his promises and his pledge of honor; this he would not do, and he was forced to resign.

Governor Stanton had again and again pledged the Administration (and he had authority to do so) that the constitution should be submitted to a fair vote; and when the convention—that has since become a fugitive from justice—refused to do this, he called together the Legislature, who passed a law requiring its submission; and it was submitted. The election under this law established the great fact that the free-State party were, in truth, the people of Kansas. For this act of honesty and independence, Stanton was removed!

It may be said to the credit of these men, that not one of them—no man of character enough to hold the place—has ever yet been found who would do the work required at their hands. They all give their testimony against the insane folly of attempting to force slavery upon the people of Kansas. If any man will not believe their united testimony, he would not believe though a witness should rise from the dead. But if no Governor would do all the dirty work required, the man has at last been found that will. Calhoun, once president of a convention—as high an office as the president of a last year's caucus—has all the power of the Territory placed in his hands. He is as irresponsible, and his power is as irrevocable as that of the Leecompton convention—with this Administration. He hesitates at nothing. Governors are no longer needed.

It is said he dare not return to Kansas. And Stringfellow, Atchison, Buford, and their desperate compeers, have left Kansas in despair; and dream no longer that slavery can be forced upon her people. But this Administration, more desperate than they, is still insanely and pertinaciously laboring to accomplish it.

XXI.—PEACE IN KANSAS.

It is urged that admitting Kansas under the Leecompton constitution would secure “peace.” No greater mistake could be made. Instead of peace, it would be a declaration of civil war. The people of Kansas never will submit, and never should submit to such an act of oppression. “There is a point beyond which a free people cannot be driven.” Congress would then indeed force them into rebellion in defense of the inalienable right of self-government, in defense of their right to a republican government, not in name only, but in fact. Any attempt to enforce that rejected and detested constitution upon the people of Kansas would be unavailing. They would not stand alone in that struggle. Public opinion is stronger than this Administration and slavery combined. The rash attempt might plunge the country into a civil war, and deluge Kansas in blood, but it would be unsuccessful.

Congress never had a question before it fraught with more fearful consequences—one more certain to endanger the peace of the country, if it is not settled wisely and rightly. Peace cannot be secured by consummating this great wrong upon the rights of a free people. Justice to the people of Kansas can alone secure peace and tranquillity, for justice and peace go hand in hand.

Is it an evidence of peace that the House of Representatives in Kansas, by nearly a unanimous vote, passed an act making it felony, punishable with death, to attempt to put that constitution in force in Kansas, or to accept any office under it? Is it an evidence of peace, that public meetings assemble in Kansas, and resolve, without a dissenting voice, that in case Congress adopts the Leecompton constitution, the people of Kansas will put the Topeka constitution into operation, and stand by it at every hazard? Is it an evidence of peace that all reliable intelligence from Kansas represents the people as fixed in their purpose of resistance, if the Leecompton constitution is attempted to be forced upon them? They say:

“If it is rebellion for us to insist on our right to live under our own government—a government born of the popular will, baptized in the blood of our martyrs, and indorsed by the people's votes, then we are ready for it.”

The newspapers of Kansas express the same determination:

“We know that, let come what may, no pro-slavery Legislature or officer will ever be allowed to assume the reins of power. Cost what it may, we stand to this, and will support it while a free voice is left to encourage action, or a free arm left to strike a blow!”—Leavenworth Times.

“There is no mistaking it—no evading it. There can be no compromise. It is either submit and be slaves, or resist and be freemen!”—Lawrence Republican.

An extract from a letter of L. A. Frather, Esq., will serve to indicate the state of feeling in Kansas:

“I am a Democrat, and that in the broadest sense of the term. I am also a southerner from the bosom of old Virginia, and yet so much am I opposed to the Leecompton constitution that, if Congress undertakes to force it upon us, I will fight—yes, sir, I will suffer death, rather than submit to the damnable thing; I swear, by the great Eternal, that I will resist it as long as I live; and if it is not destroyed during my life, I will disinherit my children if they will not promise to struggle against it after I am gone.”

Thus speaks one of the men nominated on the same ticket with Calhoun as a delegate to the Leecompton convention, and whose name, without his authority, was placed to the pledge signed by Calhoun and others, to submit the constitution to the people for their adoption or rejection. He did not attend the convention. Only a bare majority of the delegates elected did attend.

The following is a copy of the last resolution passed by the Kansas Legislature before its adjournment:

“Resolved by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, the Council concurring, That we do hereby, for the last time, solemnly protest against the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Leecompton constitution; that we hurl back with scorn the libelous charges contained in the message of the President accompanying the Leecompton constitution, to the effect that the freemen of Kansas are a lawless people; that, relying upon the justice of our cause, we do hereby, in behalf of the people we represent, solemnly pledge ourselves to each other, to our friends in Congress, and in the States, “our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor,” to resist the Leecompton constitution and government by force of arms, if necessary; that in this perilous hour of our history we appeal to the civilized world for the rectitude of our position, and call upon the friends of freedom everywhere to array themselves against this last act of oppression in the Kansas drama.”

“Resolved, That the Governor be requested to immediately transmit certified copies of these resolutions to the President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate of the Congress of the United States, and a copy be transmitted to our Delegate in Congress, and to both branches of Congress.”

They declared their fixed purpose to resist this rejected minority constitution by force of arms if attempted to be forced upon them. Does this look like peace, if Congress adopts the Leecompton fraud? If that is done, and attempted to be enforced, not peace but war will be the necessary and certain consequence.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES WILSON, OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 29, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. WILSON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This debate is about to close. I therefore wish to present the reasons which have determined me, under all circumstances, to oppose the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Leecompton constitution. I also wish to present what I conceive to be the true cause of all the difficulties in that Territory, from its organization to the present period. For I do not conceive that it is contained in the mere refusal to submit to the people this constitution, to be approved, or disapproved, by a direct vote. That was a great wrong, but still not the true cause; neither do I concede that the charge of rebellion made by the President in his special message is the true cause. That charge is simply untrue. But, sir, the true cause lies far back of the Leecompton constitution—far back of the charge of rebellion. It is contained in the bill organizing the Territory—the organic act which gave it its existence. Here it is; and I ask that it may be read.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Wilson.

"That the Constitution and all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory of Kansas as elsewhere within the United States, except the eighth section of the act preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which, being inconsistent with the principle of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories, as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people perfectly free to form their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Here, sir, is the cause from whence has sprung all our woes. Here, the error—deep, radical, and fundamental. In what? In the repeal of the Missouri compromise; in the deliberate declaration that the previous legislation of this Government in regard to its Territories was unjust, oppressive, and unconstitutional. I did not agree to that repeal then—do not now. I did not assent to that declaration then—do not now. I thought I saw arms bristling all around the bill—I have seen it realized.

The sovereignty of Congress over the Territories—the only true and legitimate sovereignty—was discarded, and for what? For the Kansas-Nebraska bill; for the principles of that bill which has organized sectional parties, convulsed the Territory of Kansas, deceived her people, and is now here embodied in the Lecompton constitution. Sir, this principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,”

—“sent before its time

what is it?—I have a right to ask. For its distinguished author and the Administration which came into power upon its assumed principle differ widely as to its meaning and force. I have a right to ask; for to-day, in a distant Territory, forty thousand American citizens, our own blood, and race, and lineage, are fearfully awaiting our decision of its meaning. Does it mean that thirty-one States, have groped their way into this Union, in utter ignorance of the great principles of this Government—that as Territory after Territory has been organized into States, their people had no conception of their duties and rights? Does it mean that Kansas, by special favor, has had a right conferred on her, and her people never before exercised or enjoyed? Then I ask for the evidence. Is it contained in her history? Is it in the vote of McGee? Is that self-government? Is it in the returns from Johnson? Is that non-intervention? Is it in the Oxford fraud? Is that popular sovereignty? Sir, I feel “perfectly free” to say that Kansas affords no interpretation of its meaning. We must look elsewhere.

“Long wandering, in wild mazes lost,”

What, then, is the principle contained in the Kansas-Nebraska bill? Sir, it is “Janus” faced. The advocates of the bill gave it two constructions: one for the North, and one for the South; both of which, I shall show, have been overthrown and discarded by the Democratic party and the Federal judiciary. What is the first? It is territorial sovereignty. That is the right of the people of the Territory, acting through their Territorial Legislature, to establish or reject slavery. This was the position of Mr. DOUGLAS. That there may be no mistake, I shall read from his speech on the 3d of March, 1854:

“I will begin with the compromises of 1850. Any Senator who will take the trouble to examine our Journals will find that on the 25th of March of that year I reported, from the Committee on Territories, two bills, including the following measures: the admission of California; a territorial government for Utah; a territorial government for New Mexico; and the adjustment of the Texas boundary. These bills proposed to leave the people of Utah and New Mexico free to decide the slavery question for themselves, in the precise language of the Nebraska bill, now under discussion. A few weeks afterwards the committee of thirteen took these two bills, and put a waiver between them, and reported them back to the Senate as one bill, with some slight amendments. One of these amendments was that the TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURES SHOULD NOT LEGISLATE ON THE SUBJECT OF SLAVERY. I objected to that provision, on the ground that it SUBVERTED THE GREAT PRINCIPLE OF SELF-GOVERNMENT, upon which the bill had been originally framed by the Territorial Committee. On the first trial the Senate refused to strike it out; but subsequently did so, after full debate, in order to establish that principle as the rule of action in territorial organization.”

Such, sir, was the opinion of Mr. DOUGLAS in 1854, and may be now; and not only his, but of the Senate of the United States. Not only was the right conceded upon full debate, on the Nebraska bill, to the Territorial Legislature to legislate upon the subject of slavery, but even the attempt to deny the right was declared subversive of the principle of self-government. Now, sir, I am no advocate for territorial sovereignty. I never believed in the doctrine, and do not now. States are sovereign—not Territories. But I insist that the Democratic party shall not disown and repudiate its acknowledged principle; and, more especially, when to do so subverts the principles of self-government.

But, sir what do we find? What, but the complete abandonment of the principle of territorial sovereignty, discarded, overthrown—and by whom? By the Supreme Court of the United States, and its action indorsed by the Democratic party. So that here, as well as in Kansas, a blow was struck against the principles of self-government. Territorial sovereignty with that blow ceased to exist. Let its body pass from our sight.

But to the second—the real tangible principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, universally recognized by the Democratic party as the only principle contained in the bill. It is this:

1. That Congress has no power to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories.

2. That the people of the Territories, acting through their Territorial Legislatures, have no power to legislate upon the subject of slavery.

3. That the Constitution establishes and protects slavery in all the Territories of the United States; and that the people can only decide upon the question of slavery when they form their constitution, and even this last right has been rendered impossible by the Federal judiciary, and virtually denied, upon this floor, by the Democratic party.

What is the effect of this policy? It is simply this: that every foot of soil belonging to the United States—that all the Territories—Kansas, Utah, New Mexico, Washington, Dakota, all, every inch, no matter where, North or South, is slave soil. That the Constitution, which you and I have been taught to believe was ordained to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, has yet another object and end, and that is to build up States of slavery and empires of oppression. Such is the doctrine of the day. I discard it; I repudiate it! Nor am I alone in the rejection and repudiation of the doctrine. The North, whose great heart has ever beat true to the Union, repudiates the doctrine; the dead and the living testify against the doctrine. Daniel Webster, sir, Daniel Webster, the defender of the Constitution, has left his opinion on this subject on record, to be read of all men. I have it here:

“Let me say, that in this general sense, there is no such thing as extending the Constitution. The Constitution is extended over the United States, and nothing else. It cannot be extended over anything except the old States and the new States that shall come in hereafter, when they do come in. There is a want of accuracy of ideas in this respect, that is quite remarkable among eminent gentlemen, and especially professional and judicial men. It seems to be taken for granted that the right of trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and every principle designed to protect personal liberty, is extended by force of the Constitution itself, over every new Territory. That proposition cannot be maintained at all. How do you arrive at it by any reasoning or deduction? It can only be arrived at by the loosest of all possible constructions. It is said that this must be so, else the right of habeas corpus would be lost. Undoubtedly these rights must be conferred by law before they can be enjoyed in a Territory.”

To the same effect, Mr. Cass, in 1854, said:

“But you cannot put your finger on the power thereby ceded to carry slaves into our new Territories. Does the Constitution give authority to interfere? No. The word slave is not to be found in that instrument.”

Again, Mr. Benton says:

“We have had some slave Territories—Missouri, Arkansas, Florida, into which that property was carried. Was it done under the Constitution? No; but under the territorial law; sanctioned, not by the Constitution, but by Congress, and governed after it got there by the territorial law. No one carried the State law with him. He left that behind, and took what he found in the Territory.”

And not only Mr. Webster, Mr. Cass, and Mr. Benton; but I hold in my hand a similar declaration, made in the Senate of the United States by one who, living, I admired above all men—dead, I still preserve and cherish as a sacred heritage to his memory—I mean Henry Clay. I read from his speech on the compromise bill:

“I take it for granted that what I have said will satisfy the Senate of that first truth, that slavery does not exist there (Utah and New Mexico) by law, unless slavery was carried there the moment the treaty was ratified by the two parties to the treaty, under the operation of the Constitution of the United States. Now, really I must say, that the idea ‘eo instanti’ upon the consummation of the treaty the Constitution of the United States spread itself over the acquired territory, and carried along with it the institution of slavery, is so irreconcilable with every comprehension or any reason which I possess, that I hardly know how to meet it.”

So spoke those distinguished statesmen; and I prefer to err, if error it be, in such company, than approve and indorse the opinion of the Federal court, which is alike repulsive to every principle of humanity and subversive of all ideas of justice.

But, let us look more closely at this doctrine. Not only does it establish slavery in all the Territories, but it goes still further: it overthrows and subverts the last vestige of popular sovereignty. Has not this been illustrated in Kansas—the schedule and the Lecompton constitution? For, if slavery goes with the Constitution into the Territories, will it not gradually, but certainly, become a part and portion of the social and political systems of the Territories? Is it not so with Kansas to-day? And if so, how can the people be free to adopt or reject slavery when they form their constitution? In no sense can the people be “perfectly free,” or free in any manner. They are called upon to decide as to an institution already established—established by the Constitution of the United States; and when they decide, what does it amount to? That slavery shall no longer exist? No! simply, that no more slaves shall be introduced into the State so to be organized. But, what of the slaves already there—carried there, as is alleged, by the Constitution of the United States? How can the decision of the people affect them? Are the slaves of the Territory still to remain slaves in the State? Is the slavery, alleged to be established by the Constitution of the United States, still to continue in the State? “Certainly!” responds the President. What say the slaveholders of the South, and those interested in its perpetuation? “Certainly! it is a vested right.” If so, it is not only absurd, but emphatically untrue, to say that the people are free to form their constitution, at any time, upon the question of slavery.

But this policy now governs and controls the country. Will it continue, and become the fixed policy? If so, then the last FREE STATE is now added to the Union.

I now come immediately to Kansas. When that Territory was organized, her people, not only by the Kansas-Nebraska bill, but by every principle of our Government and its whole system, were entitled, first, to suffrage; second, the right of representation; third, the right of legislation; and fourth, the right to frame her constitution in her own way.

I now declare that each and every one of these rights have been denied—wrested from the people of Kansas from the day of her organization to the presentation of the Lecompton constitution in this House, and up to the present hour.

Let me again state these rights: suffrage, representation, legislation, and the right to form their own constitution. These were the rights of the people of Kansas. Now for the proof that these rights have been denied.

It is an admitted fact, that with us the people are the source of all political power. How is this power to be exercised and delegated? By suffrage! Then, beyond all doubt, the highest expression of the power of a free people is in the elective franchise. It is the true, “popular sovereignty.”

Sir, in Athens, her citizens stoned to death the intruder upon the councils of her people. Deny this right, no matter how, by force or fraud, and you enslave a people. Apply this, then, to Kansas, and what is the result?

I ask, when, where, how, and at what time, and in what manner, have her people ever exercised the right of suffrage? Did they in the election for Delegate? Did they in the first election for a Territorial Legislature? Did they, in the election for members of the constitutional convention? No, sir; at neither. At the first election one thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine illegal votes were cast; at the second, four thousand nine hundred and eight; at the third, one half, nay, more than half of the Territory was disfranchised. So, then, the highest right of an American citizen has been denied to the people of Kansas; the right of suffrage, without which there cannot be a free government; and this, too, in a manner and by means which have dishonored the American name.

The second right, that of representation. I deny that the people of that Territory ever had, prior to 1857, delegates of their own choice and selection, the result of their own free will. Look at the delegates of the Legislature of 1855. How came they there? By the voice of the people of Kansas? By no means. I am safe when I say that their election was the result of an almost universal overthrow of the rights of actual citizens in the Territory. Sir, scarcely a member of that body held his seat except by certificates obtained by fraud. There were eighteen districts in which the people of Kansas were to elect their first Legislature. If ever there was a time when they should have been left "perfectly free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," it was then; but were they? Far otherwise. Armed men!—why armed? what men?—entered the Territory, and usurped the rights of the actual citizens, and by their own votes elected the members of that Legislative Assembly. Point to me, if you can, another such outrage. Look at all the other Territories, from the day of their organization to their admission into the Union, running back half a century, and there is no parallel. Thus, this right, dear to every American citizen, was violated, and the people of Kansas denied a representation.

And now I appeal to Virginia, true and loyal to liberty in the days of the Revolution; true and loyal, I trust, to the Union now—I appeal to Virginia, if such an invader should stand in such a manner upon her soil to strike down her rights and dictate her laws, if every true son would not arise, perish, or, repel from her borders her invaders?

I appeal to South Carolina, so quick and impatient of wrong, real or imagined, would she have quietly submitted to have her ancient privileges seized, and her sovereignty trampled under foot? Would she have tamely borne such a wrong? No, never! while the memories of the Revolution still linger with her people. But Kansas was weak and defenseless; her citizens few and wide apart; the shadow of Executive interference fell but to wither and prostrate her power, and to-day that power seeks to force upon her people a constitution to which a clear and undisputed majority is uncompromisingly opposed.

But the third right of an American citizen—the right of legislation, to enact, through their legally elected representatives, their own laws: have the people of Kansas had this right? No, sir! How could they, when suffrage was denied? How, when they had no choice as to the delegates? Let us look to the record. Laws, to be obeyed, must always reflect the wishes and feelings of those to be governed by them. What was the character of the laws of this Territory, passed by the usurping Legislature? I do not speak of the great body, but particularly of those in regard to slavery: what were they, and what their character? Were they just and humane? No, sir; no! It was felony to write, felony to speak, felony to publish, felony to print, and felony to circulate, anything against the institution of slavery; and not only that, but test oaths of the most repulsive character were imposed. Would you ask obedience to such laws? Would you ask a majority to submit to such enactments? Would you ask submission from the people of Kansas, when you well knew that a majority of her people were opposed to that institution? If so, you very much mistake them, for they did refuse obedience. They refused, and I rejoice that they did. They resist still, and you may go and tell your President that they will continue to resist. Ay, sir, go tell him that he may place armed soldiers in the doorways of every dwelling in Kansas; he may trample down beneath the feet of his dragoons her unoffending citizens; he may force through this House a constitution they abhor, and have rejected by ten thousand majority; he may do all this, but when he has accomplished his work, he still has not conquered nor crushed her people, nor compelled their obedience to unjust laws and a fraudulent constitution. Something, sir, must be pardoned to the spirit of liberty.

Having thus, Representatives, shown that popular sovereignty and territorial sovereignty have been completely subverted by the Federal judiciary, and having shown in Kansas that practically the same principle of self-government and popular sovereignty has been overthrown—first, in the election of a Delegate not their own choice; second, in the election of members of the Legislature by armed men not citizens of the Territory; third, in a code of laws repulsive and not sanctioned by the popular voice, I ask your consideration of the last act of usurpation—the result of three years of mal-administration and fraud—the Lecompton constitution. What is a constitution? It is a system of fundamental rules, principles, and ordinances for the government of a State. In the State, it is the supreme law. Whence does it receive its vitality? From the source of all power—the people. Hence, the great question for us to decide is, is this the constitution of the people of Kansas? Is this their embodied supreme law? If it is, admit Kansas; if not, reject this constitution. How shall this be determined? How shall we arrive at correct conclusions? By restricting ourselves to the Lecompton convention, and its acts alone? By inquiring simply whether the assumed principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill have been violated? By no means; but by wider investigations, if need be, embracing the whole history of the Territory. Nothing should be overlooked which would throw light upon this question. I repeat, then, is this the constitution of the people of Kansas? No! it is not of the people, nor from the people. If so, why the indignant protest of the 4th of January? Why the strange phenomenon of the people of a whole Territory rising up and uniting themselves in opposition to this measure? No, sir; the constitution is a fraud. It is the work of a minority, and a fraudulent minority at that; the offspring of force, violence, bloodshed, invasion, usurping Legislatures, illegal acts of those Legislatures, and, above all, executive oppression. Is the proof demanded? Sir, it is strewn along the pathway of Kansas.

"*Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
In Vallombrosa.*"

It is a part of her public history. That history is not "a hid in a corner." Its pages are open to all; and he is willfully blind who will not see for himself. If, then, this is not the constitution which her people wish, shall it receive the indorsement of Congress? This is the main question. Here it must be met, and here answered. This is the last tribunal. For myself, I answer, reject this constitution. Why? For the reason, first, that the Lecompton convention was an unauthorized, illegal, and irresponsible body. What was its foundation? The act of the Legislature of 1856. Here is the source. And what is it worth? What respect are the acts of that Legislature entitled to? None whatever. It was an illegal Legislature; it began, as I have already shown, in the overthrow of free suffrage, and ended in fraud. How, then, can validity be given to its acts? The recognition of the President cannot; the recognition of Governor Geary cannot; nor yet can that of Governor Walker; no recognition can give validity to fraud. It vitiates everything it touches, and therefore vitiates the Legislature of 1856. If the Legislature was illegal, then was also the convention. The one supports the other; the constitution rests upon the Legislature, and the Legislature upon fraud. A beautiful foundation, indeed, whereon to build the glorious fabric of a State! Indorse this constitution, and what then? You indorse the legality of the Legislature, and declare that the people of Kansas have been perfectly free to govern themselves "in their own way." I shall give no such indorsement—utter no such declaration. To me the one would be a disgrace, the other a falsehood. I prefer to speak of it with truth; and, so speaking, say that the Legislature of 1856 and the Legislature of 1855 both had their existence in the violated rights of the people of Kansas; that their laws have no validity, and are not entitled to the respect of this House or the people of that Territory. But, if the Legislature was even legal, what then? What authority had it to authorize and establish a government? Certainly not in the Kansas-Nebraska bill; that simply was the organic act of the Territory; and to assert that the authority is derived from the organic act is to assert that the Legislature can set aside, subvert, and overthrow the very act from which it derives its existence. What called into existence the Legislature of Kansas? The organic act. What powers of legislation are granted to the Legislature? Such as are conferred by the organic act, and none other; and nowhere has it conferred the power to create a new government. All the government that Kansas had or could have was the Kansas-Nebraska bill. This was the charter of her rights. No Legislature could go beyond it; neither could the people of Kansas, except by permission of Congress.

It is clear, then, that the law authorizing the constitutional convention was beyond the power of the Legislature of Kansas, and the convention itself that assembled at Lecompton was unauthorized, and the constitution amounts to nothing more than a petition—a petition for the redress of grievances. Sir, if the petitions of the people of Kansas had been respected years ago, we should not now be compelled to redress this sorest of all grievances—the Lecompton constitution. But I deny that it even amounts to a petition. Who are the petitioners? Are they the people of Kansas? Are they even the agents of the people of Kansas? No, sir; the people repudiated both the Legislature and the convention. Representatives, will you do less? But, sir, the people of Kansas did petition—petitioned through the Topeka constitution. Oppressed and broken down—disheartened and discouraged, crushed with unjust laws—within sight of their burning houses, and surrounded by a paid hireling soldiery, they met and petitioned; they sent it here, and it was rejected. I only ask the same fate for this Lecompton constitution, and I shall be content.

But I object to this constitution for another cause—that is, slavery. And what of slavery in the Lecompton constitution? Why, sir, it comes to us in its most detestable form; not bold and defiant, as if right, but shielding itself behind the forms of law, and skulking behind fraud and forgery for its protection. What further? At the very outset it announces a proposition, so untrue, and utterly at variance with justice and humanity, that had it not been preceded by the opinion of the Supreme Court, I should have come to the conclusion that all human fanaticism and refined indifference to the rights of man had found an appropriate refuge in the Lecompton convention. What is the proposition? The inviolability of property in human beings; and you and I, and all of us, have so to declare, or reject this constitution. And not only is property in a slave, and his increase forever, inviolable, but before and higher than any constitutional sanction. Approve this proposition, and what follows? Universal slavery. State lines will be no protection; State constitutions will be no shield; State rights no guard: slaves as property will be as secure in the sixteen free States as in the fifteen slave States; for it assumes that slave property is not, and cannot be made, an exception or governed by different rules than any other property I dissent wholly.

Why, sir, if slavery and the right to hold slaves are before and higher than any constitutional sanction, why not make the issue? Why evade it by claiming, wherever it can be done, "constitutional sanction?" Come, we accept the challenge. Erase from this Lecompton constitution the "constitutional sanction" of slavery, and you will disarm, to a great extent, opposition to its reception. Erase from the constitution of Arkansas, South Carolina, and other slaveholding States, the "constitutional sanction" of slavery, and you will offer a tribute to humanity. Erase from the Constitution of the United States, the "constitutional sanction" of the recapture of fugitives from service, and, sir, the conscience and the duty of the North will no longer conflict. Ah! gentlemen of the South, I advise you to cling to "constitutional sanctions," and not trust yourselves and your property upon the uncertain tenure of inviolability. Now, I hold this to be true: that slavery is merely a local institution, and that slaves are held and governed by the laws of the several States that recognize its existence. With them I and we have nothing to do. It is conceded that slavery in the States is beyond the interference of the Federal Government, or the States, or the people of the States which do not recognize its existence. It is conceded that they are property in those States—made so by legislation. But, sir, this State legislation cannot make them property everywhere. It is restricted; it is limited. It cannot go beyond State lines. Beyond those limits, the slave is a man, and no longer property. Such I understand to be our laws, our judicial decisions, and the rule of action in the free States, and of the civilized world; and, sir, it is too late to attempt to promulgate any other and a different doctrine. It cannot be done. The inviolability of slave property is against the universal laws of right, humanity, and justice, and cannot prevail. But slavery is in Kansas—established by this constitution; and, as far as this constitution is concerned, as firmly established as in any slave State in this Union; and now, what is demanded? Why, sir, that Kansas, under this Lecompton constitution, shall be admitted into this Union—admitted, too, against the will of her people, with slavery perpetuated in her limits, and the inviolability of slave property written in her constitution. Shall it be done? Representatives of the American people, will you tamely yield to the executive demand? Justice forbids; the people forbid: let their voice be respected. I ask, you, sir, [addressing Mr. GILMER, of North Carolina,] southern man as you are—honorable and high-minded as I know you to be—shall it be done? Does southern honor demand it? No! Do southern rights demand it? No! Then why, for even a single hour, impose upon a people, an American people, a constitution they abhor?

But, sir, there is another objection to the Lecompton constitution—the refusal of the convention to submit that instrument to the popular judgment, and more especially when it is known that a large majority of the citizens of Kansas are inflexibly opposed to it. The right of the people to form their own constitution in their own way is no new thing, and, sir, it is a right that has never been until now denied, and, what is remarkable, denied by the peculiar and exclusive friends of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Now, sir, I for one, do not claim the right under that bill; I am no advocate of it; I deplored its passage; it destroyed the peace and harmony of the country. But I claim the right on the higher ground of the SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE, a principle as old as the Constitution and the Union; and, sir, its grand proportions cannot be dwarfed to the narrow compass of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. I repeat, I claim it on the higher ground of the sovereignty of the people—that principle which has built up this, the freest and happiest Government on earth; until we now, as was said upon a memorable occasion, have realized the description of the edging of the buckler of Achilles:

"Now the broad shield complete the artist crowned
With his last hand, and poured the ocean round;
In living silver seemed the waves to roll,
And beat the buckler's verge, and bound the whole."

This right has never before been a debatable question. It always has been admitted. I do not mean, sir, that in every instance it has been exercised—not at all; for we have now States in the Union, republican States, admitted without their constitution having been submitted to the people. But in all these cases there was no conflict between the convention and the people. Their constitutions clearly embodied their will; hence no wrong was done by waiving the right to vote thereon. But, sir, when the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed, and when the policy of that bill became the policy of the country, nothing is more clear than the fact that by its whole intent every constitution thereafter framed should be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection. It was the great element of the bill. And so far as Kansas is concerned, pledge after pledge has been made to that effect. The President and the Cabinet pledged themselves to a full and fair submission. Governor Walker, in his inaugural address, did the same; he went further, and declared:

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

So, also, did Calhoun—John Calhoun, the dictator—to the people of Douglas county, when a candidate for delegate to the constitutional convention. But when the Lecompton convention met, and framed the instrument now presented here, then, for the first time, it claimed to be sovereign, and, as such, independent of the people, and not responsible to their action. Let us look at this sovereignty claimed by the convention. Whence its origin? How was it derived? From a Territorial Legislature! Did that Legislature represent a sovereignty? If so, what? If not, then how could the convention claim in itself a power greater than the Legislature which called it into existence?

But again, of what was this convention composed? Delegates. Delegates to do what? To frame a constitution, not to ordain one; not to set a new government into operation, but to distribute the different powers—the legislative, the judicial, and the executive, and then unite the whole in one constitution, and refer their work to the people to approve or reject. This I conceive to be the true character of a constitutional convention.

But, sir, these delegates—how came they at Lecompton? Did they represent the sovereignty of Kansas? Let us see. I know that the President has said in his message that a large proportion of the citizens of Kansas did not think proper to register their names. I know he has said they neglected to vote at the election for delegates. I know he has said that an opportunity to do so was fairly afforded. I know he has said their refusal to avail themselves of this right could not affect the legality of the convention. This is extraordinary language; but is it true? No, sir. Now for the evidence. There were thirty-four counties from which to elect delegates to the convention. The act of the Legislature required that in each of these counties a census should be taken and the votes registered. Was it done? In nineteen counties the census was never taken. In fifteen counties there was no registry of voters. And why this failure? Was it from any act of the people? No; it was the act of partisans—partisan pro-slavery judges, partisan pro-slavery sheriffs; and therefore it was that the voters in nineteen counties—a majority of all the voters in Kansas—were disfranchised, did not cast one single vote for any delegate to the convention that framed the Lecompton constitution. Is it denied? I produce the evidence of Governor Walker:

"In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. The result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty, by law, of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last."

But it is contended that the constitution—the slavery clause—was submitted to the people. How submitted? How indorsed? Sir, the submission itself was a conspiracy against the people of Kansas; and the indorsement was worthy of the conspirators. Look at it: the constitution with slavery, the constitution without slavery. Here is a duplicity that would have delighted even Machiavelli. Vote for or vote against, and still it is the Lecompton constitution, and still it is slavery! And the voters—who were they? Oxford responded with twelve hundred and sixty-six; Shawnee with seven hundred and twenty-nine; Kickapoo—loyal, devoted, and prolific Kickapoo—with one thousand and seventeen: all fraudulent!

Sir, is not this a humiliating record? Yet upon this record and this submission, with the great fact full in his view, that, on the 4th day of January, ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six votes, one after another, were cast against the Lecompton constitution, the President urges and demands the admission of Kansas in the Union as a State.

In view of all these facts, I conceive that it was the clear duty of the convention to submit the constitution to the full and direct vote of the people. True, it would have been rejected, overwhelmingly rejected; but what of that? The people of Kansas had the right to reject it. This right is denied them; I therefore ask its rejection here—in this House! Let Congress reassert again its sovereignty over the Territory. Pass an enabling act, just, wise, and equitable, in all of its provisions. Secure to each citizen the full and free exercise of the right of suffrage; guard all from fraud, or ascertain in any other manner the clear wish of the people; adopt, if you please, the bill of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, and the day will not be far distant when Kansas will ask for admission into the Union, not chained and manacled, but as a free, sovereign, and independent State, with a constitution bearing the impress of the will of her own people.

Representatives of the slaveholding States, do you desire such a result? Do you wish to bring back peace and harmony, not only to Kansas, but to the whole Union? If so, no better occasion ever offered than now. If you force this constitution through the House, what advantage will you gain? Will it be slavery in Kansas? It cannot exist there! Slavery cannot be perpetuated over an unwilling people. It will be overborne, scattered to the winds, by the first free expression of the popular will. Will it be greater security of slavery in the States? Establish once this law of violence; disregard the earnest and solemn appeal of Kansas; and the day may come when the same law of violence may strike you down, disregard your rights, and even peril your homes. Will it localize this distracting question? Fatal delusion! Three years ago, to localize it you divested Congress of its sovereignty. You asserted that the people of the Territory should decide their domestic institutions for themselves. Will you now divest the people of this right, and attempt to localize slavery in the State? Do so; but you will not succeed. Slavery in Kansas cannot be localized, nor peace secured, by any such subterfuge.

Representatives of the free States, Kansas demands justice: shall it be denied? She demands that her voice may be heard, and privileges respected: shall they be refused? She demands the right to form her own constitution in her own way, and by her own people: shall it be withheld? Will you crush her to gratify the Executive? When you have done so, see to it that you are not yourselves ground to dust between the upper and nether millstone of popular condemnation!

Representatives of the North and South, of every section of this broad Confederacy, upon your decision rest the hopes and fears of an oppressed people. Let it be made. If against Kansas, I feel assured—I know—she will right her wrongs at the sacrifice of treasure, of blood, and of life! If for Kansas, then justice will be done. But, in any event, I call upon the House, each member of the House, if you would maintain the Constitution and the Union—if you would preserve and perpetuate the blessings of liberty—if you would advance the honor, the greatness, and the peace, of our common country—nay, more, if you would avert civil war—I ask, I implore, I demand, that you REJECT THIS CONSTITUTION!

LET JUSTICE BE DONE!

SPEECH OF HON. J. M. SANDIDGE,
OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. SANDIDGE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I believe I may say, sir, that if there is one question more than any other upon which my constituents have been distrustful of their Representative, it has been for his great devotion to the Union. Hopeful in all things, I have ever relied upon the great heart of our people for that measure of justice and mutual forbearance necessary to preserve, in one nation, the priceless blessings bestowed upon us. Scanning the future of my country, in no political horoscope would I see an early dismemberment of these States. In this feeling, sir, the mass of my own constituents, and, I believe, the constituencies of other gentlemen from the South, have participated; and if I shall now give utterance to thoughts expressive of lessened hopes for the future, they will come from impressions painfully received, but irresistibly forced upon the mind, and are too distinct to be withheld from those who have made me the guardian of their rights. Like smoke from some great burning, we have seen the warning evidences of growing passions on a particular subject, which, unchecked, threaten to be as destructive and quenchless as volcanic fires. It is because I do believe there is danger in the consuming course of this sentiment that I shall speak to-day; but with no vain expectation of saying aught to influence the action of this House. The danger lies not here, Mr. Chairman, but in the deep recesses of the public mind—the great fountain of power in our form of government. It is to that I would, in some sort, address myself. It has been iterated and reiterated; until thousands of honest people believe that our system of domestic servitude in the South is destructive of morals, religion, and good government, and inconsistent with the great economic principles giving prosperity to the nation. This has been assigned here by gentlemen to be a sufficient reason for opposing the admission of Kansas, or any other new State, with a pro-slavery constitution.

Now, sir, I cannot, of course, in the time allowed under our rules, discuss, if it were desirable, these questions fully; and should not have attempted to do so at all, did I not regard them to be the foundation of the whole Free-Soil Republican movement. They enter as a chief staple into nearly all the arguments we have had from the other side of the House, in opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. That no injustice may be done, I will read from a number of speeches delivered on this floor recently, as fair samples of all others from the same side on the points given. I will first refer to the speech of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BURROUGHS,] delivered on the 23d of February, the tone and temper of whose remarks indicated honest convictions. He says:

"I need not make an argument to prove that slave labor, being cheaper, crowds out the laborer who has social and domestic wants to supply, which cannot be attained at the cost of negro slave labor."

"Our northern men will not settle in a country where slavery exists. I need not make an argument to prove this. On the other hand, gentlemen cannot prove to us that southern men will not go into free territory."

Well, Mr. Chairman, many speeches have been delivered in our Federal councils, to show that slave labor was the dearest labor ever used; and I shall offer some evidence, published by the Government, which does not at all accord with the gentleman's theory of native emigration.

The member from New York, [Mr. MORSE,] on the 20th instant, delivered a very elaborate argument against the propriety of allowing southern men to go into any more of the Territories with their slaves. He says:

"The men of the South, in blood, lineage, and endowment, like the men of the North, are foremost in the files of time; they, with us, are the inheritors of the ages; and, of course, under any circumstances, however adverse, must collect around them much that is valuable and elevating."

I suppose we are in duty bound to be thankful for small favors—and, after the more than equivocal compliment, he says:

"But the most superficial observation shows, and statistics prove, that, though they have as fertile a soil, a more genial climate, and are under the same political institutions, yet, in their progress and prosperity, they halt far behind their sister States."

And with other disparaging remarks, adds:

"The North is at this moment the most prosperous and progressive nation in Christendom; in every element that gives the highest dignity to man, it is the most hopeful and advanced; the South, deceived and betrayed by the other principle, so malign and hostile to everything good, presents an anomaly in the history of our Anglo-American race; its soil is neglected; from its people little is added to the intellectual wealth of the world; and how distorted are some of their spiritual perceptions may be seen from the fact, that quotations are made from the Bible, on this floor, to prove that slavery accords with the law of eternal justice!"

I shall bring in some facts presently, that may serve to correct the gentleman's erroneous impressions about our being so much in the wake of northern prosperity.

As to the intellectual wealth of the country, it being rather an imponderable, impalpable substance, I am willing, if there should be any of it left, in either section, unconsumed by the present generation, that it shall be weighed in a balance by those who are to come after us.

Uncontrolled by the intellectual finesse so predominant among the gentleman's friends, I dare say we of the South are not sufficiently spiritual in our "perceptions" to understand that poor old

Abraham's three hundred and eighteen "trained servants, born in his house," whom he armed with the view of rescuing Lot from captivity, were mere "men in buckram;" that the angel's command to the runaway servant, Hagar, to return to her mistress, and submit herself under her hands, is a pure romance, on a par with what they must hold as another fable—the Almighty's holding converse with a man who held slaves "born in his house," "bought with money," and "received by gift;" who, because of obedience, received the promise that "in his seed all the nations of the earth should be blessed." Truly, sir, does it seem that our more spiritual friends of the North have discovered either that the principles and truths of the moral law are changeable, or that it is a lie of the Bible to say, as it does in many places, that man may be sold for money, transmitted by inheritance, or by gift. Holding slaves myself, through all these agencies, as did my fathers before me, it is not to be presumed, according to the gentleman's theory, that I am qualified to decide which is right, he or the Bible. So I shall say no more on that subject.

Wishing to preserve good temper in what I shall say, Mr. Chairman, I will pass over the reference of the member from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] on the 22d instant, to the efficacy of the southern hemp for disunion, by assuring him that he will probably, on occasion, know how to use it, when to use it, and on whom to use it. He says:

"But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a few facts, bearing upon the question of the relative merits of freedom and slavery, and in answer to the statements and assumptions of the gentleman which I have alluded to. I take it that if slavery is better than freedom, if slave society is better than free society, its comparative excellence will be manifest in the growth, progress, and prosperity of the slave States, and the intelligence and education of the people where slavery exists. Now, let us see what the statistics show upon this subject. Take, for example, the States of Virginia and New York."

Demolishing the old "Mother of States," as he supposes, on one tack, he takes another, and says:

"Again, sir, in 1850, there was invested in church property in New York $21,134,207, and in Virginia the sum of only $2,856,076. At the same time there were published in New York 428 newspapers, with an aggregate circulation of 115,353,473; while in Virginia there were but 87, with a circulation of 9,223,06. New York expends $2,500,000 yearly for educational purposes, while Virginia expends about $700,000."

"The natural resources of the slave States of this Union are immeasurable; and, without slavery, they would have untold wealth and greatness; but now so it is, this accursed system has shut out enterprise, has shut out the free laborer, and has spread itself like a pall over the land, with its enervating and baneful influence, like blight and mildew, wherever it falls."

"I oppose the admission of Kansas as a slave State, also, for the reason that slavery is a curse to any country, and to any people; it corrupts the morals and the manners of the people wherever it exists; it promotes poverty and ignorance; it degrades labor, and consequently banishes the free laborer from the land. You might as well prohibit, by an act of Congress, the emigration of the free laboring man of the North to that State, as to permit slavery to exist there. Slavery cramps and clogs the energies and progress of a State; retards improvements; wears out, and depreciates the value of the soil; in fine, sir, it is, in almost every conceivable light, a curse!"

Now, Mr. Chairman, I also have prepared a table to which I shall request my friends on the other side, as well as on this side of the House, to give their attention. It contains facts—not isolated and selected cases—but general facts, which will place the whole South and her institutions in a far different and better position than the assertions by our northern brothers, of her "clogged energies" and worn-out soil, and the thousand and one other disadvantages attributable by them to our institutions, would assign to her.

Before I enter upon an examination of the table to which I have alluded, I would say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, who attempted to prove the superiority of a non-slaveholding over a slaveholding State; and they will apply as well to all similar contrasts attempted by members on his side of the House. The gentleman named Virginia and New York. The selection of these two States gives good evidence of his astuteness, but I cannot say as much for his fairness. He has selected New York, because she has increased in population more rapidly than any northern State, and taken Virginia, because she has increased in population less rapidly than any southern State. In all such calculations, fairness requires that the average should be taken, and not the opposite extremes. To show how such counts may be made to work, let us take two States, one North and one South, each standing in the same relation to the other States of its own section. New York has increased more rapidly than any northern State from 1790 to 1850, and Tennessee more rapidly than any southern State during the same period. In 1790, New York stood fifth on the list in population, and in 1850 she stood first, having advanced four steps. Tennessee, in 1790, stood sixteenth on the list, but in 1850 she had advanced to the fifth place, thus having advanced eleven steps. And if we should reverse the selection, by taking the two States standing at the foot of each division in 1790, and compare their rank in 1850, it would be seen that the northern State had fallen back fourteen steps, while the southern State advanced eleven steps.

If the gentleman had shown entire fairness, he would have told this committee and the country that, since 1790, the eight southern States, then in existence, had, in the aggregate, fallen back twenty-three points; whereas the eight northern States then in existence had receded sixty points up to 1850.

I do not pretend to say that the numbers of the people of the South have increased in as great a ratio as those of the North; but I do say that the increase of the native population of the South has been in quite as great a ratio as that of the North.

The population of the two sections was about equal in 1790. Now, that of the North exceeds that of the South by three million nine hundred and sixty-two thousand six hundred and sixty-four.

It is a well-known fact, which satisfactorily accounts for this increase over the South, that the foreign immigration to New York alone, has averaged about two hundred thousand a year for the past ten years. And it is also known that not more than one tenth of these immigrants settle in a southern State. And if, after the great noise made a short while ago, by northern Know Nothings, (now merged into Republicans,) against this class of their population, which alone has given them this preponderance, they shall now change the tune, in order to glorify over us of the South, why, sir, I have not the slightest objection.

I will make another remark in reference to the reason of this northern growth.

Under the old Missouri compromise, the North obtained for its special own use one million nine hundred and seventy thousand and seventy-seven square miles, but the South was confined to nine hundred and sixty-six thousand and eighty-nine square miles. There then was room for expansion at the North, which was denied to us at the South.

The gentleman from Illinois—in keeping with much more of the same kind from his side of the House—also cited, as an evidence of the greater extent of piety and of religious education, and of its intensity, and the greater number of pious people, the fact, that in New York $21,000,000 were invested in church property, whereas poor Virginia had less than three million dollars similarly invested. Now, if the gentleman is of opinion that the extent of piety, or its intensity, or the number of pious people, is to be estimated according to the money expended in building magnificent church edifices, with stained-glass windows and velvet cushions, where hymns of praise to God are sung by proxy, then I grant his table proves that the intensity and extent of piety and religion in New York are ten times greater than in Virginia.

But one word more, in order to do justice to New York city. According to the mode by which the gentleman from Illinois estimates intensity and extent of piety, her fervor and religious devotion ought to be just ten times greater than all the South, and five times greater than the rest of the North, for she expends ten times as much money for church accommodations as the former, and five times as much as the latter. Her two hundred and nineteen thousand seats for her five hundred and fifteen thousand inhabitants cost $9,000,000, being an average of $41.53 to each person. I have heard it said, that in the city of New York they had two ways of going to heaven—one way for the rich man, and another for the poor man. Every one who has visited New York within a few years past has stood and admired the graceful outline, delicate sculpture, lofty spire, and gorgeous stained glass of that bijou of a church situated at the head of Broadway. There is a little anecdote connected with that church, that I recollect having read in some New York paper, not many years since. It seems that, a few years ago, there was a venerable old church, whose antiquity lent a religious awe to the devout who frequented its hallowed precincts, situated on Broadway, below Wall street. Its devotees and attendants were mostly of the poorer class of people. The more wealthy of Grace church parish—for that was the name of this venerable edifice—had moved to the more fashionable and aristocratic part of the city. But these pious, but poor people, were not left long to enjoy the Sunday instruction of their pastor. The land became valuable, and mammon wanted, and mammon got it. The edifice was sold, and the proceeds invested in the beautiful structure I have referred to. When it was completed, however, it was so beautiful that it soon became the fashionable resort, and all its seats were secured at fabulous prices by the wealthy. Its magnificent front and marble columns spoke more legibly than blazing capitals, "No poor man can enter here," and the poor of Grace church were excluded from its doors.

Let Justice be Done—Mr. Sandidge.

HO. OF REPS.

The trustees of this temple then decided to build a modest chapel at the side of this splendid edifice, for the exclusive use of the poor of the congregation. Now, by poor is not meant the paupers, but only the less wealthy—the tradespeople. Well, no sooner did this building for the poor begin to raise its head above the ground than its purpose was announced in the New York papers under the head of "Two roads to heaven—one for the rich, another for the poor." The rich were expected to go through the high portals of Grace church, and the poor by the little door of the side chapel. The satire was too severe, and the trustees converted the chapel for the poor into a parsonage. This conversion called for a newspaper remark, that Grace church trustees had closed even the side windows of heaven to the poor. Now, if the effect of magnificent churches be the same elsewhere as it seems to have been in New York, I am inclined to think every one will agree with me, that the fewer magnificent, expensive, luxurious churches we have, the better. In the South, "the poor have the Gospel preached to them."

I hold—and I think the gentleman from Illinois will agree with me—that the value of church property is not to be the evidence of the intensity and extent of religious feeling; but that the facilities afforded by church accommodation are only the evidences of the efforts of a State to spread the benign influences of religious instruction.

On pages 136 and 137, census 1850, it appears that the total church accommodations in the United States were 14,270,139. In the slaveholding States 5,606,995—leaving 4,057,661 persons, of all classes, without church accommodation, or rather, without a seat in church. In the North, there were 8,663,144 seats, leaving 4,868,076 persons without seats, being 806,415 more persons at the North than at the South without church seats.

Again, at the South, the value of church accommodation was only about twenty-two million dollars, being just four dollars a seat; whereas at the North, the church accommodations cost $67,000,000—near eight dollars a seat. The fact then stands, that we have more church accommodations at the South than you have at the North, and at just half the expense for each seat; and if there is anything to our discredit in this, we are willing to bear it.

On the next day after this speech by the gentleman from Illinois—the 23d—the member from New York [Mr. POTTER] comes in with an echo of the same retarding influences of negro servitude. He says:

"These effects are no longer matter of doubt or speculation. Gentlemen may talk about the value of their annual product of cotton and sugar. What do such facts weigh against the comparison of States side by side—in wealth, in population, in schools, in general intelligence, in all the comforts and blessings of life? Weigh Virginia against Pennsylvania, Kentucky against Ohio, and the slave States which have been admitted since the formation of the Government against the free States admitted within the same time, and answer the question for yourselves. There is no chance for mistake here: for, in soil, in climate, in everything, you had the advantage; and yet, with all these, how far you have fallen behind!"

The member from Wisconsin, [Mr. POTTER,]

following suit, on the same day, says, after a sweeping charge of general corruption:

"Such are the demoralizing influences of slavery, which seeks to establish and extend its power throughout the length and breadth of this continent—a power which exhausts the life and vigor of commonwealths; destroys the prosperity of nations; corrupts the principles of parties; debases and brutalizes its victims; and drags down to its own level of barbarism all that yield to its embrace."

On the next day, the 24th—for we have been dosed with it nearly every day—the member from Indiana, [Mr. KILGORE,] to show that he was as safe on the "nigger question" as any of them, tells us:

"I was born and reared in a slave State, and I am proud of the State of my nativity, for it is one of the noblest of the old slave States of this Union. She has furnished heroes to the field, and statesmen to the council of the nation. It is the land of the lamented Clay. But, as I said, I now represent here a free interest. The State of my adoption is surrounded with everything that is calculated to endear me to free institutions. When I contrast the state of things there with what I learn of the condition of the extreme southern States, I am proud of my position. How do we stand? We have our free schools; we have our churches; we have our academies; we have our charitable institutions for the benefit of the deaf and dumb, the blind, and the insane. We have our thousands of miles of railroads, our fields teeming with abundance, our thriving towns, our flourishing cities—everything to endear us to our home. Can those gentlemen who have denounced us on this floor as Abolitionists, say as much for themselves?"

And then came the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUFFINGTON, I believe,] on the same day, declaring of this African servitude, that "It is a curse upon any State where it exists; it affects all the relations of a community, internal and external; it is a blight upon moral and social progress; it affects all the material interests; it depresses the value of lands; it discourages and debases free labor; and gives the political control and social predominance to a few aristocratic proprietors of slaves; it retards and prevents the development of all the resources of a State, and is a withering blight upon its prosperity."

To cap the climax, the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COVODE,] on the 26th instant, thus delivers himself. Hear him:

"The friends of slavery are in the habit of pointing to the large exports of the South—they can no longer point to its large imports—as evidence of the superior wealth of that section. They export everything valuable which they produce, and import, either from Europe or from the North, everything except necessities which they consume; and this, sir, is the ground of their boasted wealth, independence, and civilization! I am amazed, sir, that a moment's reflection has not taught them the contrary. It is not clear that a country which produces only the raw materials of commerce, which only cultivates the ground, is in a condition of colonial dependence? Such sir, is the condition of the South. She produces the bulk of our exports, and yet she has never, at any period of her history, exported them. Even when a majority of the exports was made from southern ports, the trade was carried on by northern or European ships and seamen. But for some years past the South has fallen behind the North in the amount of exports. The imports have always been in northern hands. The North sends its ships to New Orleans and Charleston, transports their cotton, tobacco, sugar, and rice to Europe, and brings back return cargoes of merchandise to New York, Boston, and Philadelphia; and from these points the South is supplied with foreign or northern manufactures. Sir, the condition of the South is strictly one of colonial dependence. She produces the very staples of commerce; she has fine harbors, fine timber for ship-building; in a word, every material element of commerce; but they are of no avail. The ignorance and barbarism of slavery have doomed her to an inferior and dependent condition."

Now, Mr. Chairman, all these gentlemen have declared themselves our sincere friends, and good lovers of the Union; but not being able to divine or appreciate the reasons impelling to such strange ways of exhibiting regard and love, I shall not follow their example, but content myself with the old-fashioned notion that the best way of making and preserving friends, and accomplishing our purposes, is to speak in all kindness to and of each other, and be always ready to perform such friendly offices as circumstances may enable us to render.

It is said that "figures will not lie;" and I will now proceed with my principal purpose in seeking the floor to-day. But, sir, I shall contrast no one State with another, the least prosperous of one section against the most prosperous of the other section. That will do well enough for clapping on the stump, to arouse sectional animosity or party feeling. I shall put the whole North against the entire South, and then let him strike the balance who can to our disparagement. I invite my friends on both sides of the House to follow me in my statements, and to correct any errors I may make.

I have taken as authorities, the census of 1850, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1857, on commerce and navigation. I state as an undeniable fact, that the agricultural productions of the southern States for the year 1850, show that each inhabitant, of all classes, produced $13 30 more than each individual at the North. I state that the average agricultural productions at the South was $58 to each person, when at the North it was only $44 70. From the table that I have prepared, showing the products of different kinds in all the States, I read that the total agricultural productions for 1850, amounted to $1,164,457,783—say $1,164,000,000. And of this sum, the North produced, in round numbers, $604,000,000, and the South $560,000,000.

I will now continue the tables on the agricultural productions.

Total value agricultural products,	$1,164,457,783
Total value agricultural products
North.....	$603,775,018
Total value of agricultural products
South.....	$560,682,765
Population of the United States
23,191,876, for 1850, will give for average production by each person.....	$50 20
Population North, 13,527,220—
each person.....	$44 70
Population South, 9,664,756—
each person.....	$58 00
Now, if we deduct from all our agricultural products the amount exported, to wit:.....	$118,750,118

Which shows that each person consumed $45 08.
The North consumed $609,880,612; the South consumed $435,827,053. Hence, it appears that the North had a deficiency in 1850, of agricultural products, to the value of $6,105,594; whereas, the South had a surplus of $124,855,712; or each person at the North consumed thirty-eight cents worth more than he produced; whereas, at the South, each person produced $12 90 more, than he consumed.

We will now examine the table of the products of manufactures, mines, and mechanic arts.

On page 179, Census, we find the value of all these products of the United States, deducting the value of the raw material, to be $458,681,425.

The North produced.....	$378,305,175
The South produced.....	80,376,250

$458,681,425

Let us deduct the manufactures exported in 1850, which amounted to	18,196,797
--	------------

And we have left for domestic consumption.....	$440,484,628

Being at the rate of $19 to each person. Now, the North consumed at that rate, $257,017,180, and the South consumed $183,467,448.

Thus it appears that the South had to purchase from the North $103,091,198 of manufactures to make up her deficiencies; which she paid for out of her surplus of agricultural products, which was $124,855,712, and then there was left to the South a surplus of $21,764,514, for the year 1850.

I now propose to show that at the South we cultivate more land to each person, and that the cost of the land at the South is very little more than half the cost of the land at the North, and yet at the South, the produce is only nineteen cents to the acre less, in value, than at the North. (Page 169, Census.) Total, improved acres, $113,032,614; in the southern States, $54,986,594; in the northern States and Territories, $54,046,020. So that at the South there are 5.68 improved acres to each inhabitant; and at the North, 4.29 each. The total value of farms, $3,271,575,496; value in southern States, $1,119,380,109; value in northern States and Territories, $2,152,195,317. So that at the South, the acre costs $20 37; but at the North, $37 07.

Now, the agricultural products at the North were, as we have seen, $603,775,018, being $10 39 to each acre, and at the South $10 20 to each acre; and at the South, there are 5.68 acres to each person; in the North, 4.29 acres to each person. Hence, at the South, it is evident that each person working land, costing $115 82, produces $58; but in the North, each person working land costing $159, produces but $44 70. Or, in other words, the agriculturist at the South can produce

Let Justice be Done—Mr. Sandridge.

HO. OF REPS.

$13 30 more than an agriculturist at the North, out of his land, though the land of the latter costs $43 more.

I state another fact: the value of the farming utensils in the South averages more to each inhabitant than in the North. (Page 169, Census.) In the South, the value is, $65,385,845; in the North, $86,201,793; which is $6 76 to each person in the South, and $6 37 to each person in the North.

I state another fact: the value of live stock at the South averages more to each inhabitant, than in the North to each person. (Pages 171-174.) Total value of live stock, United States, $544,180,516. Live stock South, $253,795,330; live stock North, $290,385,186. So there are $26 26 to each person in the South, and $21 46 to each person in the North.

I state another fact: the value of slaughtered animals in the South is one fourth more to each person than the value of the same product in the North to each person. (Pages 171-174.) The total value of slaughtered animals was $111,706,925. In the South, $54,399,298; in the North, $57,307,627. So that, to each person in the South, there were $5 62; to each in the North, $4 23.

I state another fact, which I trust gentlemen will not forget. The value of the real and personal estate in the South gives a greater average to each person, slaves included, than the same kind of property in the North does to each person; the average being one fourth more in the South than in the North. (Page 190, Census.) Total value in United States, $6,024,666,909. In the South, $2,828,665,954. In the North, $3,196,000,955. Showing, to each person South $292, and to each person North $237. But if the value of the slaves be added thereto, at a very low estimate, $1,500,000,000 more would be given to the South; and then, her average would show $447 to each person, including the slaves; but leaving them out, the average would give $700 to each white person—or nearly three times as much as to each person in the North.

I now come to some statistics, which may surprise those who are accustomed to speak of the ignorance of the South, and its destitution of common school advantages. I find that in the support of schools, colleges, and academies, to each white inhabitant between the ages of five and twenty years, the southern States expend sixty cents more than the northern States on each of the persons between the same ages. The total number of whites in the South between the ages of five and twenty is 2,350,104; and the amount expended is $6,819,808; being $2 90 for each person. In the North the number is 4,784,869; and the amount expended is $11,004,523; being $2 30 for each person. (Page 143, Census.)

I do not pretend to say, education derived from books is as generally diffused amongst our people as at the North; the North has greatly the advantage in this respect, originating in the difference between the density of the principal populations in the two sections. At the North, children, crowded in cities, towns, and thickly-settled communities, can be sent to schools within reach. This is not the case with us; ours are an agricultural people, always seeking the greatest amount of "elbow room."

But if our northern friends shall think the crime and pauperism of their section, originating in the very circumstance which enables them to school their children, will more than counterbalance, in their favor, this sort of education of our people, I shall not complain. But as true intelligence does not depend altogether upon a knowledge of books, our people, though somewhat behind in this regard, for want of equal facilities, nevertheless are not inferior in knowledge or information to the northern people, because this advantage is more than compensated by that free intercourse peculiar to southern people, where social equality among the whites produces a community of ideas. To make my table complete, I feel obliged to refer to the statistics of crime and pauperism; and while I lament, with my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. Bishop,] that these statistics have too often been made a reproach to the North, yet I cannot adopt his very pleasant mode of explaining away the one and the other. The North has been credited with all the good of her crowded thoroughfares, and must be debited with the evil. The number of native paupers South, was 16,411; paupers of foreign birth, 4,849; native paupers in the North, 50,023; paupers of foreign birth, 63,689.

The ratio of native paupers to the population at the North is double that at the South, and the very argument used by my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. Bishop,] that the decrepit and sick slaves were cared for at home by their masters, and therefore not included in the ratio of comparison, is one of the highest tributes of praise that the philanthropist can pay to this peculiar institution at the South. It has no poor. Yes; slavery has no poor! The aged and infirm, and the young who are stricken down by disease, suffer not the wants of poverty. They are not thrust out from their homes, taken away to the poor-house, to die among strangers. This one blessing alone, that slavery knows no poverty, should forever save us of the South from the uncharitable attacks of northern gentlemen.

I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that slavery knew no crime; and I believe that, were it not for the few desperate fanatic teachers, who preach murder and arson to the deluded slave, I might truthfully say, that slavery knew no crime.

What do the statistics show on page 165 of the Census? Only 1,917 native criminals in the South, and 10,939 in the North, being one in 5,041, in the South, and one in 1,236, in the North. For this great preponderance of crime at the North, I am quite willing to find an excuse in the great temptations of city life, and the desperate struggles of poverty in crowded communities. At the same time that I would throw a veil over the faults of our brothers at the North, I cannot admit the plausible apology of my friend from Connecticut, for the violation of those moral laws of which he spoke. Misdemeanors are not entered in the list of criminal convictions, as reported in the census.

In Massachusetts there is 1 criminal to 137 of her entire population; in New York, 1 to 301; in Virginia, 1 to 13,286; in Louisiana, 1 to 1,743. But I will dismiss this subject, with the reiterated assurance to gentlemen of the North that I alluded to these statistics in no feeling of reproach to them, but felt called upon in my general tables to embrace all that is given in the census. I would to God, sir, that all the hard sayings of gentlemen in one section against the other could be blotted out and remembered no more forever. And if we would but make half the effort to conciliate, and imbue the minds of the people with that generous confidence and forbearance which seeks no advantage, which is now expended in trying to establish irreconcilable and antagonistic doctrines of division, we could look forward to a period when time itself, hoary with prolonged ages, should yet witness the happiness and prosperity of a united people in the land of our fathers.

I believe there remains but one more table to examine, and that can be found on page — of the Census, showing the number of families occupying each dwelling-house. In the New England States there are 115½ families to each 100 houses; in the middle States there are 112½ families to each 100 houses; in the southern States there are 100½ families to each 100 houses. So that fewer families are placed in one dwelling in the South than in the North. I think I have conclusively shown that, under all the heads, except that of newspapers, (which I did not examine,) and the more general diffusion of letters at the North, the South stands foremost. Her soil is not impoverished; for, we have shown that working less hands to the acre, on land costing a little more than half what it does at the North, the South produces, to each person, $13 30 more than the land in the North does.

I now ask, wherein does slavery cramp and clog the energies and progress of States? and impoverish its soil? Is it proved by the greater relative value, to her population, of her agricultural products, of her farming utensils, of her live stock, of her slaughtered animals, of the greater value of her real and personal estate?

Does slavery retard the growth, progress, and prosperity of a State, and demoralize its people? If it does, I ask, if greater church accommodations, if larger sums of money devoted to educational purposes, fewer paupers and fewer criminals and more dwellings, according to the population, are evidences of such effects of slavery?

A few more of similar effects of slavery, and I have done. I will now take up "Commerce and Navigation for 1857," and call attention to table seven, page 324, where it appears that the total value of exports from the United States were $278,906,713; from northern ports, $114,008,660; from southern ports, $164,898,053. So that the value of exports from southern ports was nearly one half more than from the northern ports. The gold exported is not included, for the reason that its exportation is not considered in favor of the United States, but rather injurious.

Such, Mr. Chairman, is a true picture of southern industry and southern prosperity, and I hope we shall hear no more the oft-repeated tales, told for effect, to disparage us for unhallowed purposes.

I have been amused with certain remarks about the great hay crop of the North, and that it was worth more than all the crops of the South. I have in my hand a table carefully prepared, exhibiting the value of each crop in the North and in the South; and I find that the most valuable crop in the United States is the corn crop, which, for 1850, was worth $296,000,000, of which the South produced $174,000,000, and the North $122,000,000. The next most valuable was wheat, value, $100,000,000; the North produced $73,000,000, and the South $27,000,000. Then the cotton crop, $98,000,000 by the South; then the hay crop, $96,000,000; of which, $88,000,000 was produced by the North, $8,000,000 South. And like our "fodder crop," which with us takes the place of hay to a great extent, and is, perhaps, as valuable, though not reckoned specifically in the census, this hay crop was all consumed by our own people—not a ton being exported. I have been very anxious to see in print the speech delivered in the other wing of this Capitol some ten days ago, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] His extraordinary statements about the products of the country, North and South, its commerce, &c., deserved particular attention; but I have looked in vain for its appearance in the official proceedings of the Senate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, ready to implore our northern friends to unite with all of us everywhere, who desire peace and harmony in the land, I have sought to show the fallacy of the reasons assigned by all the Opposition to the claims of southern men. And I would ask, are gentlemen of the North so distrustful of themselves as not to be satisfied with having in their own hands the power to control the Government, so as to prevent our abuse of it, if intended? Must it, indeed, be made to conform in its legislative, judicial, and executive action, to the creed of a section? Gentlemen may tell me, and they do, that the North never will consent to take another slaveholding State into this Union. Be it so; let that doctrine be announced as the fixed policy of the Government, and all the armies of the world could not compel a union between northern and southern States. Far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, to threaten disunion. Disunion! sir, it is something painful to contemplate; but, at this time, apprehensions of such a catastrophe come unbidden to the mind. If I rightly understand the temper of the northern mind—and I am sure I do not misjudge that of the South—such an event is not at all improbable within a very few years. I say to our northern friends that however unanimous the people in that section may become in sustaining this Free-Soil Republican movement, there will be equal unanimity at the South in opposition. A representative of the conservatism of the South, I would not hesitate a moment to advise an immediate abandonment of the Government, should its policy be so shaped for our destruction. Let us no more be told that your people at the North will not go into countries where the negro is enslaved; and, therefore, that you are against Kansas and the Lecompton constitution; for it will be in keeping with many other declarations which I have disproved. The census book tells us that seven hundred and twenty-six thousand of the citizens living in the southern States were natives of northern States. In the free States, there were two hundred and thirty-two thousand natives of southern States.

I will now make a brief reference to Kansas. The people of that Territory were asked, through their proper functionaries, if they would have a convention to form a constitution, and they responded yea. And we all said, it is their right. Not even the Republicans of this House could say otherwise. And when, by proper action, the people were called upon to be registered, for protection against intruders, it was right. But some of the people in Kansas objected. We will not be registered, said they, because you who propose it are a set of swindlers. We will sanction nothing you do. And so said their friends outside of Kansas. They were urged by Government officials and ambulatory statesmen to take part in this policy of self-protection; but they still refused—"it shall not be done." So seven tenths only were numbered. The people of Kansas, whose names had been registered, were invited under a most just law to go to the polls and elect members to this convention. This was right, too. But a portion of the people of that Territory said, we will not vote. And again were they intreated and warned that those who stayed away must abide the action of those who should participate in the election. But many of them turned a deaf ear to this warning, and went not to the polls. The convention assembled, and proceeded to form a constitution. In harmony with our theory of government, a constitution by a convention is the embodied will of the people.

Up to this period, all Democrats were agreed. But when a constitution had been formed, and the convention acting as all similar conventions had done before, in its discretion, only chose to submit one portion of it to a vote of the people, there was for the first time a difference of opinion in our ranks. Some of those who had strenuously advocated the principles of non-intervention, were not willing for the people of Kansas to regulate their affairs in their own way. But still, there was not much complaint, as the whole people of Kansas, registered and unregistered, were invited to vote upon the only question that had disturbed the public mind, which was, whether they would have their State to be pro-slavery or free-soil; and again were the whole people urged to go to the polls and vote upon this matter. About half of them did vote—the balance stayed away; and with that vote closed all legal action of Kansas or its people upon the constitution. The duty of Congress to interfere for the compulsory submission of a constitution to the people, formed by their own agents, is too ridiculous for serious discussion. Not more so, however, than would be the assumption that this House, with its adjuncts in legislation, could compel the people to vote. Suppose, acting upon such a fanciful idea, Congress should remand the Leecompton constitution to the people of Kansas, and require everybody to vote; or (as has been done in some of the States) that a majority of all those entitled to vote should sanction or reject it, and the Topeka men do as they have done heretofore, refuse to vote, and those who voted heretofore, decline for that reason to do it again, (a not improbable occurrence); what, then, would Congress do? Or suppose a few hundred voted for, and a few hundred against that constitution: what should we do?

Sir, when the Territorial Legislature of Kansas passed, by a two-third vote, the bill prescribing the mode of election for members to the constitutional convention, which had been vetoed by Governor Geary because there was nothing in the law requiring the convention to submit its work to the vote of the people, the best possible evidence was given as to what was believed to be the power of that convention, its members being responsible only to the people. If the Territorial Legislature could control the action of the convention in one thing, it could in another; and might just as well have said that the people shall not vote, as that they should vote. The attempt, after all this, to excuse the people for not registering and not voting for members to the convention, because they understood, or believed, or were assured by Governor Walker that they would have a chance to vote down the constitution when formed, if they chose to do so, is too transparent even for humbuggery. What right had Governor Walker to speak for that convention? If he had but attended to the proper duties of his place, there would not now have been so much trouble in the land. And I trust Congress will not seek to follow an example of interference which has already been so fruitful of bitterness and contention.

This is not the first time in our history, sir, that efforts have been made to shape things, in the organization of a new State government, so as to conform to the supposed preferences of a majority of Congress, and thus to avoid difficulties in the effort of admission into the Union. We have grown tired of tricks of that sort, and when begging has failed, are not now willing quietly to see coercion applied to effect such a purpose. During the pendency of this constitutional movement in Kansas, I have no doubt that the President had, and the people of every State in the Union had, their hopes and their preferences as to what should be done in that Territory. But this gave no right of interference, in any way whatever. When I and my constituents heard that the people of Kansas had determined to call such a convention, we rejoiced, hoping that without interference from any quarter, their affairs would be settled. We denounced, with just indignation, the assumed dictatorship of Robert J. Walker; not because he was for or against any particular policy, but because he should presume to interfere at all, in a matter having no connection with his duties as Governor. I had supposed the convention would submit the constitution to the registered voters. But whether to them, or to all the free white male inhabitants of the proper age, or to none at all, being a matter of their own, in which they had ample discretionary power, it would have been acquiesced in by me and by those I represent. This was our position in the beginning, and all the time. I was much surprised at the submission of any part of the constitution on the 21st of December last, to a vote of "all the white male inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas in the said Territory upon that day, and over the age of twenty-one years, for rejection or ratification." I did believe, and believe now, that if the whole constitution had been submitted to such a vote, the President, nor his Governor, nor all the troops, with artillery and bayonets at their disposal, could have preserved the peace in Kansas on that day. It would have been an invitation to all the North and all the South to come there and make them a constitution. An "inhabitant" may be of a day's residence.

And, sir, thousands of men would have gone there from the North, and perhaps as many more from the South; and when they should have met at the polls under such circumstances, having gone for a purpose, few men would say they were for the kind of "popular sovereignty" which would have been then vindicated. We know well what would have occurred, and in anticipation of it the convention certainly acted most wisely in circumscribing the temptations within such narrow limits.

A word more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. I should be most reluctant to believe, nor do I believe, that the northern Democrats who may vote against the admission of Kansas into the Union, under the Senate bill—now on your table—will so vote because of the pro-slavery character of her constitution. To believe otherwise would be to abandon all hope of the existence of any party in this country sufficiently catholic and national in its principles to preserve the union of the States. The ties of Louisiana to her sister States are strong—peculiarly so to those in the great basin of the Mississippi. When it has been proposed to carry through measures whereby new States formed out of the old Louisiana purchase were expected to come into the Confederacy with domestic relations dissimilar to those of my State, I have voted for them. This I did without regard to any home institutions which might be established in the formation of State governments, because it was just and right to do it. And no stress of circumstances, so long as I retain the right to be heard in this Hall, shall deter me from voting to admit new States, rightfully applying, formed out of the Louisiana, or other more recently acquired territory, be their constitutions pro-slavery or free-soil. To be governed by any other rule of action would be subversive of all the sound and fair principles of common justice and equality recognized by the founders of our Government, destructive of all friendly relations between the people of different sections, and would jeopard the Union itself.

Satisfied with their position in the Union, and the rights enjoyed, the people of my State have never, through any Representative here, shown a misappreciation of what was due to themselves or to others, by joining in discordant threats, or notes of sectional strife. Shall we, then, be now suspected of any sinister purpose if we talk of danger? Ready always to make common cause with the people of other States in the defense of common rights, and satisfied with their and our ability to protect such rights, under all circumstances, outside of Congress, the people of Louisiana will not make haste to believe that a Union which they have ever cherished with so much devotion is to be made to conform in its policy to sectional views and opinions. Will the Republicans of the North turn this love into hatred? We shall see.

As I have now but a moment of time left, Mr. Chairman, I will state that I shall append to my remarks a table of the total agricultural products of the United States, according to the census of 1850, and of the northern and southern States; also, a table of the foreign commerce of the United States, and of the nine principal ports, and their relative positions; and a comparative table of northern and southern foreign trade; upon the facts of which, with more time, I might have drawn some arguments to sustain the general views already expressed.

The waters from the Rocky Mountains and the Alleghanies, Mr. Chairman, pouring their tributary streams into the great Mississippi, have, from the sea, built up for us in Louisiana a country of surpassing richness and beauty, whose every particle of fructifying alluvion claims kindred soil upon each hill-top and valley in that great region. And it is our constant prayer to Him who has kept us in the hollow of His hand, that, as our country with the waters, so may the hearts of all people in the nation, be flooded with a Christian charity, which shall make a delta, by the accretions of brotherly love, forbearance, and good-will, to enrich their descendants to the end of time.

NOTE.—On page 176 of the Census, there is an error in the amount of slaughtered animals.—See correct amount on pages 173 and 174.

I have left out in table A, value of the agricultural products of the United States, 1850, the large item of $173,000,000 for "live stock over one year old," estimated as the annual product. The total value of all the stock is rendered in my argument. The item of $13,746,822, of home-made manufactures, given as belonging in agriculture, is also left out. To have included it, would have been to increase the excess of the South, as, on page 173 of the Census, for home manufactures, the South is credited with $18,635,290, and the North with but $9,858,454.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Walbridge.

Ho. OF REPS.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. D. S. WALBRIDGE, OF MICHIGAN,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. WALBRIDGE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not my purpose, on this occasion, to enter into a discussion of the Kansas question generally. So much has been said upon the admission of Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution, and so varied have been the views expressed in relation to it, according to the several standpoints from which observations have been taken, that I cannot hope to interest or enlighten either this committee or the country by anything I may say; and it seems to me, sir, that the discussion of this subject, important as all concede it to be, must already pall upon the public mind, surfeited as it is with the highly seasoned intellectual food which has emanated from this Capitol during the present session.

There are, however, some incidental questions connected with the subject which, it seems to me, have not received the attention they deserve; and while on one side we arraign the border ruffians, and on the other the rebellious Abolitionists of Kansas, it may well become us to see to it that our own duty is discharged to Kansas and the country. Things have transpired here, sir, in this very Hall, and under our own observation, which, in my judgment, are quite as reprehensible as anything which has been done in Kansas, either by border ruffians or anybody else; and it is to these things that I propose, for a few moments, to call the attention of the committee. I refer to the action taken by this House on the message of the President on Kansas affairs, the organization and action of the special committee of fifteen ordered by the House, and to which that message was referred. And I desire to say here that, in whatever I may say in relation to the action of the House, its presiding officer, or the committee, I impugn the motives of no man. I must of necessity speak, and I propose to speak plainly, of the course of gentlemen in this connection; but it is not to my taste, nor in the line of my duty to talk of motives of action. I have nothing to do with motives, but it is acts, official acts, I propose to consider, and which, in my judgment, strike directly at the prerogatives and privileges of this House; and while blunders are often productive of worse consequences than actual crime, they are sometimes more excusable.

For a proper understanding of this subject, (although I doubt not that every member of this House is familiar with its history) it may be proper for me, on this occasion, to allude briefly to the action of the House upon the organization of the committee, and to the purposes for which the committee was raised.

It will be recollected, Mr. Chairman, that on the 2d day of February last, the President of the United States transmitted a message to this House. I do not propose now to discuss that message. I will only say that, in my judgment, it contains more misrepresentations of fact, and withholds more knowledge which ought to be in the possession of the President, and which ought to have been communicated to this House, and is, on the whole, a greater perversion of argument and facts than any other executive document ever communicated from the head of this nation to either House of Congress. The message in question recommends the admission of Kansas into the Union under a constitution framed for it at Lecompton. On the reading of that message in the House, the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] moved its reference to the Committee on Territories. It is well known that that is the legitimate reference of all such papers; that the subject belonged properly to that committee unless some good reasons were shown why a different course should be taken with it. But the House had evidently come to the conclusion, previously, to take some other course, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] was fortunate enough to get the floor, although many other members sought it at the time; and thereupon he moved that the message be referred to a select committee of thirteen. I quote his resolution:

"Resolved, That the message of the President be referred to a select committee of thirteen, to report on the propriety and expediency of the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee and country to the wording of these propositions. The proposition of the gentleman from Georgia was simply a reference of the message to the Committee on Territories. The proposition of the gentleman from Indiana was a reference to a select committee, which was to report on the expediency of the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State.

Although the gentleman from Indiana had been so fortunate as to attract the attention of the Chair, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] sought the floor at the same time, and subsequently asked the gentleman from Indiana to allow him to submit another resolution. The latter gentleman did not yield, but thereupon made a speech of an hour; after which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] obtained the floor, and permitted the gentleman from Illinois to offer the following proposition:

"Resolved, That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Lecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a convention of delegates thereof, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of thirteen to be appointed by the Speaker.

"That said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution, and the laws, if any, under which the same was originated, and whether such laws have been complied with and followed.

"Whether said constitution provides for a republican form of government, and whether there are included within the proposed boundaries of Kansas sufficient population to be entitled to a Representative in the House upon the basis now fixed by law, and whether said constitution is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas.

"Also, the number of votes cast, if any, and when, in favor of a convention to form a constitution as aforesaid, and the places where they were cast, and the number cast at each place of voting and in each county in the Territory.

"The apportionment of delegates to said convention among the different counties and election districts of said Territory, and the census or registration under which the same was made, and whether the same was made in compliance with law.

"The names of the delegates to said convention, and the number of votes cast for each candidate for delegate, and the places where cast; and whether said constitution received the votes of a majority of the delegates to said convention.

"The number of votes cast in said Territory on the 21st December last for and against said constitution, and for and against any parts or features thereof, and the number so cast at each place for voting in said Territory.

"The number of votes cast in said Territory on the 4th day of January last for and against said constitution, and for and against any parts or features thereof, and the number so cast at each place of voting in said Territory.

"The number of votes cast in said Territory on the day last named for any State and legislative officers thereof, and the number so cast for each candidate for such offices, and the places where cast.

"That said committee also ascertain, as nearly as possible, what portion, if any, of the votes so cast at any of the times and places aforesaid, were fraudulent or illegal.

"Whether any portion, and, if so, what portion of the people of Kansas are in open rebellion against the laws of the country.

"And that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Whereupon the House adjourned.

On the 5th day of February the subject again came up for consideration. You, Mr. Chairman, will be slow to forget the scenes of that day's session. The gentleman from Indiana had moved to strike out from his proposition everything but the simple one of reference, so that it read as follows:

"That the message of the President be referred to a select committee of thirteen."

The gentleman from Illinois had modified his proposition as follows:

"That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Lecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a convention of delegates thereof, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of fifteen, to be appointed by the Speaker; that said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution and the laws under which the same was originated, and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of said constitution, having relation to the question of the propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution, and whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Here, then, were three propositions distinctly before the House; one to refer to the Committee on Territories unconditionally, one to refer to a select committee of thirteen unconditionally, and one to refer to a select committee of fifteen with instructions. I wish to impress upon the committee and upon the country, that the instructions were, that they should inquire into all the facts, into everything connected with the formation of the Lecompton constitution, and into all the action of the people of the Territory in relation to it as well before as after its formation.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Walbridge.

HO. OF REPS.

Well, sir, after an exciting session of eighteen hours, the House adjourned until the 8th, with the understanding that the votes were then to be taken upon those propositions. Upon the meeting of the House upon the 8th, the first question to be taken was upon the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] to refer the message to the Committee on Territories. Now, sir, I have no sort of doubt that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] acted in perfect good faith in offering his resolution for a select committee of thirteen; but I must be permitted to say that he had a very strange way of demonstrating it, because, on the very first vote, he voted against his own motion, and in favor of the reference proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia failed. The House refused to adopt it. The question then recurred upon substituting the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] for that of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HUGHES.] The House adopted the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois. It decided the question then and there by that vote, that it would have an investigation. That was the question voted upon, and the only difference, in fact, between the propositions. It did not vote upon the question of the reference of the President's message only, as has been stated in this House from the chair. It voted to have an investigation of Kansas affairs. If it did not want an investigation, why did it not refer the matter to the ordinary committee—the Committee on Territories? It referred it to a select committee because it knew that the Committee on Territories would not make the investigation it wanted. It was for the purpose (and for no other purpose under heaven) of getting an investigation that the special committee was ordered. And I may say here, Mr. Chairman, that after all the discussion and the struggle that had taken place upon this question in the House, after the House had adjourned for two days and every member understood, when he came to vote, what the propositions were upon which he was called to vote, the opinion of this House, expressed by the largest vote ever cast upon this floor, ought to have been respected. The resolution of the gentleman from Illinois was finally adopted. The committee was ordered, with the instructions which I have read to the House. Well, sir, a committee of fifteen members of this House was appointed by the Speaker, of which I happened to be one.

Now, I have a word or two to say upon the construction of that committee. I have said heretofore, and I repeat now, that I make no imputation upon the motives of anybody; but I do say here, that, in my opinion, the construction of that committee, under all the circumstances, looking to the antecedents of the men composing it, looking to their action on the adoption of the resolution ordering it, looking to their whole action upon the question, was in violation of all parliamentary rule and usage. The parliamentary law, as I understand it, requires that, in the appointment of every select committee upon any question, a majority of the committee shall be friendly to the bill or proposition referred. To refer a proposition to a committee who are utterly and totally opposed to it, is simply to strangle the whole thing. That, sir, is not the object of legislation. The object should be to investigate propositions that may be brought before the House, and see what merit there may be in them. I wish to call the attention of the committee to a single paragraph from the Manual relating to this question:

"Those who take exceptions to some particulars in the bill are to be of the committee, but none who speak directly against the body of the bill; for he that would totally destroy will not amend it, or, as it is said, the child is not to be put to a nurse that cares nothing for it."

Now, my own opinion is, that this child was not put to a nurse that cared nothing for it; but that it was put to a nurse who had determined beforehand to strangle it.

"It is therefore a constant rule that no man is to be employed in any matter who has declared himself against it."

On this very committee were appointed a majority of men who had, from the beginning to the end, from first to last, voted and spoke and acted here and everywhere against this proposition—men who had not only voted against this identical proposition of investigation, but who had voted on all occasions, in the last Congress and in this Congress, against any investigation by this House into Kansas affairs. Is that in accordance with parliamentary usage, as laid down in the Manual? And further:

"And when any member who is against a bill hears himself named of its committee, he ought to ask to be excused."

That was the opinion of Mr. Jefferson, that no gentleman ought to take a position on a committee of investigation, to the whole of which he was opposed. Did either of these eight gentlemen ask to be excused from serving on that committee? I think if they had, the House would have excused them.

Mr. Speaker Hunter, in his valedictory address at the close of the Twenty-Sixth Congress, uses this language on this subject:

"In the committees connected with the executive department it would seem that the friends of the Administration should have the majority to propose the measures which emanate originally from their party, and for which they are mainly accountable. In committees of investigation, it is equally clear, that the Opposition, who hold the affirmative, should have the majority, and the power."

In this view, I submit, that if the assertion of the Chair be true, "that it was the President's message which was referred to the select committee," it does not help the Speaker from his dilemma, or relieve him from the imputation of partisanship in the appointment of the committee. The proposition for the select committee came from the gentleman from Illinois; and a majority of it should, under Mr. Hunter's rule, have been named from those who agree with the mover, and so says all parliamentary law; so that whether the committee were ordered to consider the message and accompanying papers, or to investigate Kansas affairs, or on any other subject, whatever it might be, it is equally true that the majority should have been named of those who favored the select committee.

Mr. Chairman, I have said all that I desire to say in reference to the formation of that committee. I have put my opinion on the subject on record; and time will not permit me to dilate on the subject. The committee was appointed with eight, out of the fifteen members, who had opposed the whole thing from the beginning to the end, and who had opposed the action of the House in ordering the committee.

Mr. Chairman, having been a member of that committee, I feel it incumbent on me to say something of its action, that the responsibilities of its failure to execute the order of the House may rest where it belongs. I, sir, wash my hands of the whole thing. And here, sir, I may be permitted to say, that in my opinion, the fact that the majority of the committee were opposed to any investigations, was no excuse or reason why they should treat the order of the House with contempt and refuse to execute it. The order of the House was imperative that the committee inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of the Lecompton constitution, not the "essential" facts nor the "material" facts, but all the facts. The House did not ask the committee to give an opinion upon the propriety of the admission of Kansas. It wanted no such opinion; it simply wanted facts on which to form its own opinion, and I hold, sir, that the committee could not discharge its duty to the House without making a full and fair investigation into all the facts as contemplated by the resolution of the House. Was such investigation made? Was any investigation made? I unhesitatingly answer none, literally none; and propose to examine the journal of the committee to see if that will not bear me out in the assertion. The resolution of the House required the committee to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of the Lecompton constitution, and the laws under which the same was organized, which, in my opinion, made it the duty of the committee to inquire into the validity of the Legislature itself, which passed the law providing for the convention. For if the Legislature had no legal existence, how could it make any valid or binding law. In pursuance of this idea, I offered in committee the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this committee will inquire into the law providing for a constitutional convention in the Territory of Kansas, and under which members of the convention were elected."

Under this resolution, if it had been adopted, it would have been competent to investigate all the facts connected with the election of members of the first Legislature; whether, as has often been alleged, that election was carried by fraud and violence, or whether it was a fair election and expression of the will of the people. That surely was an important inquiry to enable the House to come to a correct conclusion in the premises. If, on inquiry, the Legislature was found to be a valid one, duly elected, and competent to legislate for the Territory, had it any right to pass any such law as would provide for a government superseding and annihilating itself? This question was fully discussed in the Senate of the United States in the Michigan case, in 1835-6; on which occasion, Mr. Buchanan, then a Senator from Pennsylvania, said:

"No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislature had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

The same question arose on the application of Arkansas for admission, when General Jackson, with the concurrence of his Cabinet, and on the written opinion of the then Attorney General, decided that no such power existed in a Territorial Legislature; and I give you here, sir, the opinion of Attorney General Butler, as expressed on that occasion. He says:

"To suppose that the legislative powers granted to the General Assembly include the authority to abrogate, alter, or modify the territorial government established by the act of Congress, and of which the Assembly is a constituent part, would be manifestly absurd. The act of Congress, so far as is consistent with the Constitution of the United States and with the treaty by which the Territory, as a part of Louisiana, was ceded to the United States, is the supreme law of the Territory; it is paramount to the power of the Territorial Legislature, and can only be revoked or altered by the authority from which it emanated. The General Assembly and the people of the Territory are as much bound by its provisions, and as incapable of abrogating them, as the Legislatures and people of the American States are bound by, and incapable of abrogating, the Constitution of the United States. It is also a maxim of universal law, that when a particular thing is prohibited by law, all means, attempts, or contrivances to effect such thing are also prohibited. Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to a convention to form a constitution and State government, nor to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void; if passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

But, sir, if we admit, or if on full inquiry by the committee it had been shown, that the Legislature was a legitimate one, that it had a right to pass such a law, did it do so? and if so, was the law executed and its provisions complied with?

By the act of the Territorial Legislature of the 19th February, 1857, providing for the election of delegates to a convention to form a constitution, it is, among other things, provided, that a census of the inhabitants and a registration of the voters shall be made in each and all of the thirty-four organized counties in the Territory, naming the counties, and designating the territorial officers charged with the duty, and on the completion of which the number of delegates to the convention, sixty, were to be apportioned among the different counties in proportion to the number of voters in each. It was asserted by many persons and through various channels of communication, and finally by Governor Walker himself, in his letter to the Secretary of State, of December 13, 1857, that this condition of the law had not been complied with; that in fifteen of the thirty-four organized counties no registry of votes was made, and consequently, no apportionment of delegates could be made to those counties, neither could the voters thereof vote in any other counties for delegates. Was it not contemplated by the House, in ordering this committee, that this matter should be inquired into? Acting under my official oath and under the order of the House, I had no doubt upon the subject, and hence the resolution in committee. Without discussion or consideration, the resolution was laid on the table by the following vote:

"YEAS—Messrs. Stephens, Letcher, Winslow, White, Anderson, Quitman, Stevenson, and Russell—8.
"NAYS—Messrs. Harris, Morrill, Bennett, Wade, Walbridge, Adair, and Buffinton—7."

I know, Mr. Chairman, it is said, and that in high places, that there were but few voters in those disfranchised counties; and what if it were so? Is even a small minority of the people to be disfranchised by an overbearing and unscrupulous majority, and receive the approbation and justification of this House in the act? I trust not. But the assertion is denied on authority quite as good as that on which the statement is made. It was asserted before the committee, by a member, that he could and would show, if permitted by the majority to do so, that more than one third of the legal voters of Kansas were disfranchised by that census and registry, and not permitted to participate in the election of delegates to the convention. It seems to me this was a very important fact connected with the formation of the Leecompton constitution, and one into which the committee were directed to inquire.

Mr. Chairman, did that nurse care aught for the child but to strangle it?

Sir, other propositions of inquiry were made to the committee—one in the following words, as found in the printed journal of the committee:

"Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution:
"Resolved, That in order to comply with the order of the House under which this committee was organized, which required that we should inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said Leecompton constitution, and the laws under which the same was originated; and also whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas, the chairman be authorized to have summoned to appear before the committee the following named persons, viz: Governor R. J. Walker, General John Calhoun, the Hon. F. P. Stanton, and John D. Henderson, to testify to all such facts as they have knowledge of, and to produce all such documents, papers, votes, and returns as have any relation to the election of delegates to the Leecompton constitutional convention, or to any election subsequently held in the Territory of Kansas."

"After discussion, the further consideration of the resolution was, on motion of Mr. STEPHENS, postponed until the next meeting by yeas and nays, as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Stephens, Letcher, Winslow, White, Anderson, Quitman, Stevenson, and Russell—8.
"NAYS—Messrs. Harris, Morrill, Wade, Bennett, Walbridge, Adair, and Buffinton—7."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there were four men in the Territory of Kansas, or anywhere else, who were familiar with the transactions of that people in reference to the formation of their constitution, these were the men; and as they all happened to be in or near this city at the time, there seemed to be great propriety in calling them to testify before the committee.

Governor Walker was sent to Kansas as Governor because he was supposed to be, as he really was, the especial friend of the Administration, and a pro-slavery Democrat of the first water. Secretary Stanton was made such for similar reasons. Calhoun was the president of the convention, and charged by that body with the duty of ordering the elections under it, receiving and counting the votes, and declaring the results; and Jack Henderson was the most noted border ruffian of them all. This proposition was voted down, as will have been seen, by the same inexorable majority, and not a particle of testimony in relation to the organization of the convention was permitted to be taken. It was proposed to show—

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a point of order. It is, that it is not in order to discuss the proceedings of a committee, nor to refer to newspaper publications of their proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from Indiana that it is in order to refer to any report of a committee published in a newspaper.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to state what the gentleman proposed to do before that committee?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will not take up my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that there is no rule which prohibits a member from referring to anything which appears in the newspapers. A publication has been made in the newspapers purporting to be a report of the committee, giving an account of the proceedings of the committee. The Chair holds that it is in order to refer to it.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order for a member of a committee to refer to what took place in the committee? The gentleman was stating what he proposed to show to the committee, if he could do so.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order to refer to anything which took place in a committee which has not been made public.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Certainly; and everything of which I have been speaking, and of which I propose to speak, is here published in this newspaper, and I read it from the paper.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to do that.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I suppose so.

I was saying that, according to the public prints, as the thing appears in the newspapers of the day, in what appears to be a journal of the action of that committee, in what is signed by the chairman of that committee as its chairman, certifying it to be the journal of its proceedings, and which I have the best reason in the world to believe is a perfect and full journal of its proceedings, it appears that a member offered that resolution; that he desired to have the privilege of summoning the witnesses named, in order to show that more than one third of the people of that Territory have been disfranchised; disfranchised by the action of the Administration of this Government in that Territory; disfranchised by the action of the Administration officers there; and that the people had no right nor no power to participate in the election of the members of that convention.

Now, I submit whether this is not a fact properly connected with the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State? whether it is not one of the things which the committee was directed to inquire into? whether it is not one of the things which this House desired to ascertain when they ordered the committee to be raised?

Now, sir, I might go on to enumerate other positions taken before that committee, but for want of time I will allude to but one; and here I resort to my newspaper again. Various resolutions, according to this newspaper, were introduced before that committee—I think some dozen or fifteen—all looking (as I would be glad to show to the country if I had time) directly to the investigation of some important question connected with the admission of Kansas into the Union; but every single one of them was voted down by the same majority of the committee, and that majority utterly refused all investigation and examination, except such as emanated from the Government officials of that Territory. They refused to take the testimony of any man. When it was proposed to summon John Calhoun, and let him testify and swear whatever he pleased, whether true or false, the proposition was voted down. When it was proposed to summon Governor Walker, Jack Henderson, and Secretary Stanton, the majority voted down the proposition every time.

Mr. LETCHER. Will the gentleman allow me to put a question just at that point?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Yes; right there.

Mr. LETCHER. When it was proposed to summon John Calhoun, will the gentleman say whether he did not say that he would not believe him, under oath or not under oath?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Whether I said so, or not, it is so. I would not believe him.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, what would be the use in summoning a witness, if it is said in advance that the other side would not believe one word of his evidence?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I took it for granted that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] might believe him, and that the testimony might be of some service to him, and possibly some truth might be extracted from him on a cross-examination.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to ask the gentleman from Michigan if he was a member of the caucus of Republican members of this House which met at an early part of the session—

Mr. WALBRIDGE. Oh! it takes the gentleman from Indiana too long to get out the question.

Mr. HUGHES. And if he was not pledged by a resolution passed by that caucus to advocate the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution, in advance of the presentation of the Leecompton constitution to this House?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I cannot answer all these questions—it takes too much time. I have one word more to say in regard to this matter of the credibility of John Calhoun. I said that the minority of the committee asked the privilege of calling John Calhoun before them, and putting him under oath to testify, and the gentleman from Virginia suggests that I said in the committee that I would not believe him under oath. I do not know whether I said so, but it is the truth. But further than that, I say that, under a subsequent resolution, a written statement of John Calhoun was brought before the committee, and it was ruled out by the majority of the committee, because they would not believe him. It was voted that it was not testimony before the committee at all. Now I hold that any man who will make a written statement anywhere of what purports to be facts, that is not to be believed, is not to be believed under oath, I care not who he is. Nevertheless, if we had got that man before the committee, we might have got something useful out of him. But whether we could or not, we could not get him there, nor could we get Henderson, or Governor Walker, or Secretary Stanton there, though it was notorious that they were in the city at the time. We wanted to prove the existence of all these frauds in the election of members to this convention—the very thing which had been referred to us to inquire into.

Now, sir, I said a few moments ago that I wanted to call the attention of the committee to another proposition which was made to that committee. It was in these words:

"Whereas, the Territorial Legislature of Kansas appointed a commission to investigate certain frauds said to have been perpetrated in the election held in said Territory on the 21st of October and the 4th of January last, and in the returns of said elections; and whereas, said commission are understood to have made such investigation, and to have examined many returns in relation thereto: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the chairman of this committee be, and he is hereby, instructed to procure an authenticated and duly certified copy of all the testimony taken before said commission in relation to such frauds."

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, here was a proposition which tested thoroughly, if any further tests had been required, the determination of the majority of the committee to resist all inquiries. I will here state some of the circumstances connected with these elections, and the returns of them, as they were supposed to exist at the time, and as they have since been proved to exist, and that by the very testimony which was tendered to the committee by the resolution under consideration.

The constitutional convention had appointed the 21st of December on which to hold an election at which the people of the Territory were to vote on the question of the adoption of the "constitution with slavery," or the "constitution with no slavery." It was for the constitution either way; and, in point of fact, it was the constitution with slavery either way, with only this difference: that those who should vote for the "constitution with no slavery," voted for slavery in a worse form than those who should vote for the "constitution with slavery." But that is not the question I am now discussing; and suffice it to say, that an election was ordered by John Calhoun, the president of the convention, among other places, at the precincts of Kickapoo, Delaware City, Oxford, and Shawnee. An election had also been ordered by the convention to be held on the 4th day of January, 1858, for the election of State officers and members of a State Legislature, which was also to be conducted under the auspices of the same John Calhoun. At the latter election polls were opened at the before-mentioned places, and also at a place called "Delaware Crossing," or "Delaware Agency." The commissioners appointed by the Territorial Legislature took much testimony in relation to the votes returned as cast at these places, (the very testimony, sir, called for by the resolution proposed to the committee,) and I propose to give the conclusions to which that board of commissioners came, in their own words. They say:

"From the evidence taken before them, the board state that the returns from the Delaware Agency precinct were honestly made out by the officers of the election; and subsequently three hundred and thirty-six names were forged upon them, by or with the knowledge of John D. Henderson; and that John Calhoun was particeps criminis after the fact.

"The board report that of the votes returned of the election of the 21st December, 1857, on the slavery clause of the constitution framed at Leecompton, held at the precincts of Kickapoo, Delaware, Oxford, and Shawnee, about the following numbers were illegal and fraudulent:

"At Kickapoo.....	700
Delaware City.....	145
Oxford.....	1,200
Shawnee.....	675

Total.....2,720

"And of the votes returned of the election of the 4th of January, 1858, for officers under the constitution framed at Leecompton, held at the precincts of Kickapoo, Delaware City, Delaware Agency, Oxford, and Shawnee, about the following numbers were illegal and fraudulent:

"At Kickapoo.....	600
Delaware City.....	5
Delaware Agency.....	336
Oxford.....	696
Shawnee.....	621

Total.....2,458"

Mr. Chairman, I ask, in all sincerity, can any man tell me for what purpose this committee was appointed, if not to inquire into such naked, palpable, barefaced frauds as these? Did the House mean anything when it ordered us to "inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of the Leecompton constitution," "and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of the said constitution, or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution," or did it mean nothing? Surely, if it meant anything, it intended what is so plainly stated in the resolution of our appointment.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another branch of inquiry embraced in the resolution of the House ordering this committee, to which I desire to call the attention of the House for a few moments. The committee were instructed to inquire whether the Leecompton constitution "was acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas." Was that duty discharged by the committee? I unhesitatingly answer, no! Did the committee refuse to discharge it? I as unhesitatingly answer, yes! I know the majority of the committee take the vote of December 21, and call it the expression of the voice of the people of Kansas as in favor of the constitution. In spite of the frauds proved to have been committed at that election; in spite of the positive impossibility of voting against the constitution at that election; in spite of the stubborn fact that less than three thousand legal votes were cast at that election, still the majority cling to it as the free expression of the voice of the people of Kansas.

The election of the 4th of January, ordered by the Territorial Legislature, at which the legal voters of Kansas were permitted to vote for or against the constitution—for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution with no slavery—is ignored by the committee; and although at that election the constitution was voted down by a majority of more than ten thousand votes, is not thought by the majority as worthy of even a consideration. The solemn protest of the Territorial Legislature—the immediate and then recently elected representatives of the people of that Territory—is treated with scorn and contempt, and as unworthy of the slightest attention.

Mr. Chairman, was not this child sent to a very bad nurse?

But, sir, I cannot spend any further time in discussing these propositions made to the committee. I desire to refer briefly to the report of the majority of the committee. I find that report in the public newspapers, and take it for granted that it is the authorized report. The committee say, in the beginning of that report, that they have investigated all the essential facts connected with the formation of the Kansas constitution. Now, sir, I want to ask that committee who made them the judges of what is essential in this inquiry? Had they any authority from this House to say what was and what was not essential? Did the House ask them for their judgment or opinion on that point? Did not the House direct them to investigate and report all the facts?

Mr. QUITMAN. Does the gentleman pretend to say that the committee was bound, by the instructions of the House, to take testimony as to every little incident that occurred in the Territory of Kansas, no matter how utterly unnecessary, useless, and immaterial, such testimony might be considered by the committee?

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I again repeat the question, who made the majority of the committee the judge of what was essential? Where did they get the power to judge of it? Under the resolution of the House, every fact connected with the election and the formation of that constitution was to be investigated by that committee, and it was their duty to make that investigation. If they failed to do so, they are responsible to this House; and to that responsibility I now hold them. If the House is satisfied that its order has been executed, and that that committee has discharged its duty, and not treated with contempt the order of the House, then I have nothing more to say. It is not a question that interests me more than others, but it is a question that involves the dignity, the prerogatives, and the privileges of this House. If the time has come when committees of the House are to be appointed to stifle such great and important inquiries as this, then the power of the House is a mockery. It is the business of organizations of the House to execute its will in every form, and in every place, whether it be the will of the individual executing it or not. And with all due respect to the Speaker, I would say that it was the duty of the Chair to appoint a committee from members of the House who favored the investigation, not from those who were opposed to it. But the Speaker not having done so, but having appointed a committee opposed to investigation, it was the business and duty of the committee to investigate just to the extent that the House ordered it. Sir, this child was put to a nurse, in my judgment, predisposed and pre-determined to strangle it; and I trust this House and the country will hold that nurse to a just responsibility for the deed.

Mr. Chairman, there are many reasons why I cannot vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Leecompton constitution, but I have barely time to call the attention of the committee at this time to one; but that one, sir, is sufficient for my justification, if I had no other. In 1820, when this country was convulsed to its very center by this slavery question; when slavery was stronger numerically and in proportion to free-State power than now, and when you desired the addition of another slave State, (Missouri,) our fathers bargained with your fathers on this basis: Your fathers said, give us Missouri now, and we will give you all the balance of the Louisiana purchase north of 36° 30'. Our fathers took the bait, trusting to southern honor to keep their faith; and they did keep it; but how long? Why, sir, while our territory was a wilderness, and worthless to freedom; but when the time came in which we wanted to occupy it, you found a flaw in the bond, a legal and technical flaw. Your fathers had no right to make the bargain, and you repudiated it. You plowed with our heifers, you used our dough-faces, and robbed us of our inheritance. On the day you did that deed you inflicted a wound upon southern honor which will rankle and fester until you or your children will curse the day you did the deed; and on that same day hundreds of thousands of true northern hearts, of all political parties and affinities, more in sorrow than in anger, struck hands in a solemn oath, by the graves of their fathers, that you should not with their consent enjoy the inheritance of which you had robbed them; and that oath they will keep to the bitter end, if need be. I have no word of complaint to make of the men who made that bargain. I know they made it for wise and what seemed to them good reasons, and, I cannot doubt, from patriotic motives. They believed it would restore peace to the country, and settle the slavery question as between the North and the South forever. And it did restore peace to the country, and union and harmony among the people for more than thirty years, until, in an evil hour, you repudiated the contract, denied the right and power of the parties to make it; and now you ask us to sanction the unholy and faithless act.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the day of compromises on this subject is past; and I firmly believe that, on the part of the people of the North, it is so; that this great question of whether the labor of this great nation shall be performed by freemen or slaves, must now be settled, and settled for all time. It is, in my judgment, the most important and momentous question which has ever agitated the civilized world. Let it be well considered, and wisely settled.

I have no compromises to offer, or to make; and if I shall ever find it necessary, or see it proper, to vote for any measure in relation to Kansas under which, if adopted, it can by possibility be made a slave State, I shall do so, choosing the lesser and contingent, to avoid the greater and positive, evil—entering my most solemn protest against the right of any body to make Kansas a slave State; protesting against the right or power of this Government to abdicate the governments of all, or any, of the Territories, and protesting against the newly-discovered doctrine that the Constitution carries slavery into, and protects it, in all or any of the Territories of this nation.

Mr. LEIDY obtained the floor.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LEIDY. I will.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Chairman, I put a question to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WALBRIDGE] who has just taken his seat, the object of which was to show that, at the caucus of the Republican members of this House at the commencement of this session, that party unanimously pledged itself to the Philadelphia platform, which advocated the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. Is the gentleman from Indiana in order? I thought the floor was awarded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The floor was accorded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the gentleman from Indiana appealed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield it, and he did so.

Mr. GROW. He can only yield for personal explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. He cannot yield the floor if objection be made.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Well, I object.

Mr. HUGHES. I merely wish to settle a question of fact with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER,] by having the resolution of the Philadelphia convention read.

Mr. POTTER. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana has a right to make a personal explanation with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. If he desires to make a personal explanation, he has a right to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is exactly what he wants to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that it is a personal explanation, as the gentleman's remarks related to what was done in the Republican caucus. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. PAUL LEIDY, OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. LEIDY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire, sir, to avail myself of this opportunity to offer some remarks upon the subject which has occupied so much of our attention during the present session, and it is hardly necessary for me to say, that I feel the disadvantages under which I labor, in attempting to speak upon this question, after so much has been said and written, both in this House and out of it, that we have all become weary of the theme. But inasmuch as it may be expected by those whom I have the honor to represent here, and who by reason of that relation have a right to know my views on this, as well as on every other subject in which they have and feel an interest; and regarding it as a duty which I owe to them as well as to myself, to give some of the reasons which shall influence my vote upon this question, I shall endeavor, in the discharge of that duty, to give my views as briefly and as plainly as I can.

Before proceeding to the discussion of the question under consideration, permit me to remark that, although much of the argument here, on the one side and the other, has been confined to the slavery question, I have not yet been able to understand how the merits of that question are, in any sense, involved in this issue. By the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, I take it, Congress shut out from our consideration the question of domestic slavery as connected with the admission of Kansas as a State. Congress, by the passage of that act, declared that she should be entirely free to form and regulate her own domestic institutions in her own way; and when, in due time, she should be prepared, that she should be received as a State with or without slavery, as her constitution might at the time determine. However, as other gentlemen have thought proper to discuss this subject in connection with the Kansas question, I feel that I shall not be regarded as out of order if I devote a few moments to its consideration.

I am free to confess, Mr. Chairman, that all my feelings, prejudices, and principles are alike averse to the institution of domestic slavery; and when I see its advocates and defenders driven to the necessity of searching the Holy Scriptures to find a basis on which to rest the claims of this "peculiar institution," it only serves to strengthen my convictions of the correctness of these feelings and the soundness of these principles; for it is an evidence to my mind that the old foundations on which they were wont to rest this institution are giving way; and that the common arguments which the men of earlier days were accustomed to regard as sufficient and complete justification of domestic slavery have lost their power, and fail now to produce, even in the minds of those who use them, a clear conviction of their soundness; and hence they must resort to the "higher law," and endeavor to find in that a sanction of this system.

It is undoubtedly true that in the Jewish nation they had their servants, their bondmen and their bondwomen, their men-servants and their maid-servants, their servants born to them in their own house, and those taken from among the strangers that were round about them; and this system of servitude is nowhere, that I know of, condemned. But it is fair, is it honest, for those who have renounced Judaism, and who refuse to acknowledge the obligations imposed by its laws, its rites, and its ceremonies, to claim, under that system, the benefits, the rights and the privileges granted only to those who constituted that peculiar people? And if the cases of Abraham and Isaac are to be regarded as conclusive of the moral or religious character of the institution of African slavery, with equal propriety may the cases of Jacob, of David, and of Solomon be adduced to sustain the peculiar institution of Mormonism—polygamy.

Entertaining these feelings of aversion to slavery, I am, of course, opposed to its extension over new States and Territories; and would earnestly desire that in every new State, especially in the latitudes adapted to free labor, the people should, by a constitutional prohibition, exclude it from the number of their domestic institutions. I have no doubt that the interests and the prosperity, not only of the new States themselves, but of the whole country, would be thereby promoted. But, at the same time, I claim no right, as a citizen of a free State, or as a Representative, to interfere with that institution where it exists, nor to prevent the people inhabiting any other State or Territory from introducing this as one of their institutions if they desire it. I believe, sir, in the great principle that the people of every State and Territory should be left entirely free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, and when, as a Representative, I am called upon to vote on the question of the admission of any new State, I shall do so without any inquiry, as a preliminary to my voting, whether the constitution excludes or tolerates slavery; and I trust that I shall at all times, as well here as elsewhere, be found as ready and willing, by my voice, my vote, or in any other legitimate way, to defend the rights, privileges, and institutions of the South against aggression coming from any quarter, as I would those of my own State. And I know, sir, that, on this subject, I express the sentiments of the Democracy of Pennsylvania; but gentlemen must not ask of us too much. They must be content with our willingness to sustain them in the protection of their legal and constitutional rights and privileges; they must not insist that we shall believe that slavery is right, or even beneficial; for we, as Democrats, and citizens of a free State, repudiate the doctrine that slavery is an essential element of freedom, of progress, of civilization, of refinement. We deny that this institution has any sanction in our holy religion, or that any denomination of the Christian Church has, in any age, thrown over it its sacred mantle; and being on the defensive, we content ourselves with the mere denial, until evidence shall be adduced which can challenge a reply. But while we thus differ, and honestly differ, from our southern brethren in the views upon this subject, each believing that we are right, why shall we continually strive and wrangle over this difference? Why shall we, as the Representatives of the people, spend our time in useless discussion of a question which we can never settle? Why spend our energies in contending with each other for victory, when a victory for either would be the ruin of both? Rather let us lay aside our weapons, and seek to promote peace and harmony.

Having said thus much in reference to the institution of slavery, I shall now address myself to the Kansas question. In approaching the argument of this question, I aver at the outset that I shall contend for the admission of Kansas as a State, and that upon the principle of popular sovereignty. The territorial government of Kansas was organized upon that principle. It was made the corner-stone of her political edifice when she was first raised to the dignity of a Territory, and upon those principles alone can she ask for admission to the rank of a State. If her application cannot be sustained on these principles, she ought, she must be rejected. Our first inquiry then naturally is, what are we to understand by this term popular sovereignty? I understand it to be the will of the whole people, in all matters relating to the formation and regulation of the government and laws of the State, expressed through the prescribed forms of law. In more common phraseology, it signifies the right of the people to govern themselves according to law. You will observe that this definition contemplates a law or government of some kind preëxistent to the exercise of this popular sovereignty. And hence, if it were to be applied to a state of society anterior to any governmental organization whatever, it would require some modification; but as applicable to our condition, whether territorial or State, it is sufficiently accurate, and it is unnecessary for us to take up the abstract idea, and ascertain whether or not sovereignty is alienable, divisible, capable of being delegated, and other similar questions which have been raised in the course of this discussion. We are not required because we use this term, popular sovereignty, to search after and ascertain its original or essential meaning, and then test the modus operandi of our Government by these principles. Our Government is established. The mode of its operation is established, and we use the term as applicable to that form of government, and that mode of operations. Whether this term is the most precise and exact which could have been selected to express the idea, is of no moment. Its meaning, I take it, is well settled and clearly understood.

How is this sovereignty expressed, or how is it exercised under our form of government? In the election of public officers by the people, popular sovereignty is exercised by the people directly through the ballot-box. This is according to the prescribed forms of law in the matter of electing public officers. Popular sovereignty, as a law-making power, is expressed through representatives chosen by the people to act for them, and in their stead. Law-making is an act of sovereign power. Law is defined as "a rule of civil conduct prescribed by the supreme power of the State," &c. This expression of popular sovereignty, or of the will of the whole people, is also in accordance with prescribed forms of law. In theory, under our form of government, this sovereign, or law-making power, is vested in the people, but it can only be exercised through representatives chosen by them, and these representatives for the time being, hold the reins of sovereignty, and all their acts within the scope of legislative authority are binding upon the whole people, even if every man, woman, and child in the State are opposed to them.

Popular sovereignty in making constitutions has, by common consent and long established usage, been exercised through delegates elected by the people. These delegates derive their power directly from the people, and are amenable only to them for its proper and faithful exercise. In the matter of electing officers, voting being voluntary, and no specific number being necessary to constitute a quorum, it follows that those who vote are in law regarded as the whole, and the will of the legal majority of those who vote, whatever that may be, is to all intents the legal will of the whole people.

I have been thus particular, because I wish to show, as I proceed, that in the matter of the formation of the Lecompton constitution, all the requirements of law have been complied with, and every principle of popular sovereignty fully carried out.

We will commence with the act providing for the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, assuming, on the authority of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, leaving out all higher authority, that the Territorial Legislature was a legally-constituted body. The first question that arises here is, had this Legislature legal power to authorize this election? I understand the Kansas-Nebraska bill as conferring upon this Legislature all the ordinary powers of legislation. If so, then, by the usage in almost every State in the Union, they did possess this power; for there is not a State the constitution of which has been made or altered through a convention, which did not initiate the proceedings by an act of the Legislature, authorizing the election of delegates to form a convention. But as I design in this matter to permit our enemies themselves to be our judges, I shall here cite Secretary and acting Governor Stanton, in his first address to the people of Kansas, in which he says:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act, which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution," &c.

Governor Walker also, in his inaugural address, speaking of this act, says that the Territorial Legislature was clothed by the act of Congress,

"In the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress."

Again, in the same address:

"But it is said that the convention is not legally called." "The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose, by the Congress of the United States; and in opposing it you resist the authority of the Federal Government."

Here we have Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, both officially averring the legality of this act; and this I deem sufficient to establish this point.

The next point to be settled is, was this territorial act of the Legislature fair and just in its provisions, and did it make the necessary provisions for obtaining an expression of the will of the whole people?

A reference to the act itself, a brief synopsis of which I here incorporate in and make a part of my remarks, will best and most satisfactorily answer this question. This act provides that a census and registration of all the white male persons in said Territory over the age of twenty-one years, citizens of the United States, shall be taken within a specified time. This duty is to be performed by the sheriffs of the counties. If the sheriff's office becomes vacant, inspectors are to be appointed by the judges, and in case of a vacancy in both offices, the Governor must appoint some person to perform these duties. The registration being made, lists are to be put up in the most public places in the precinct or election district, and one list furnished to the probate judge. The probate judge of each county is to hold court daily for twenty days, for the purpose of correcting these returns, during which time every voter is privileged to have his name entered upon the list if not thereon, by making application, and any other error in the registration to be corrected. When the lists are thus corrected, they are to be sent to the Governor, who is to apportion the delegates, giving to the whole Territory sixty delegates, to be equally apportioned among the several counties. Every bona fide inhabitant of the Territory over twenty-one years of age, who is a citizen of the United States, within the county for three months next preceding, shall be entitled to vote at this election; provided, however, that none shall vote whose names do not appear upon the lists; and severe penalties are imposed for illegal voting or hindering others from voting; also, for any fraud or illegality on the part of the officers. The State is then divided by the act into nineteen districts.

Now, sir, is not this act full and fair in all its provisions, in all its requirements? Does it not make ample provision for the exercise of the sovereign will of the people of Kansas in the selection of their delegates? Is any one who should have a right to participate in this election excluded by the law? I hold here the act itself; and if any gentleman can find in it one unjust provision, or any that will hinder a full and free expression of the will of the people, I shall be obliged to him if he will now and here point it out to me.

But here, again, sir, we have the benefit of the judgment of our opponents: Secretary Stanton, in his address before referred to, says:

"That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention; and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light, the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people."

Governor Walker, in his inaugural address, says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to form a constitution and State government. The law [meaning this law] has performed its entire appropriate functions when it extends to the people the right of suffrage; but it cannot compel the performance of that duty."

Again, in the same address:

"I see in this act calling a convention no improper or unconstitutional restrictions on the right of suffrage. I see in it no test oaths, or other similar provisions, objected to in relation to previous laws."

Here, then, we are fully sustained by both Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton in affirming the justness and fairness of this law; and I do not conceive it necessary to add anything in support of their opinion, either by way of argument or authority.

Having thus, I think, fully established the validity and the fairness of the act, we next come to the registration and enumeration of the voters. We find in the act thirty-four counties named, (it is said there were thirty-eight, but I suppose the four were omitted because there were no inhabitants,) and formed into districts. A census was taken, a registration was made, and returned to the acting Governor. This registration was made by the proper officers designated by the act to perform their duties. And we are bound to presume, in the absence of all proof, or even allegation to the contrary, that the lists were duly returned to the probate judges; that they held their courts during the twenty days allowed for the correction of returns; and that the lists had been put up in public places in the several election districts, as required by law. This is a presumption of law, by which we are bound. One thing is certain as a fact, a matter of record: that in nineteen of these counties a registration was made, as appears by the returns which were made to Governor Stanton, and which he accepted and made the basis of his apportionment of delegates to the convention. These returns show in these nineteen counties nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one registered voters. You will observe here that these are the official returns corrected by the probate judges, and by them presented to acting Governor Stanton. These returns, after being examined by Mr. Stanton, and found to be in compliance with the requirements of law, were made the basis of his apportionment of the delegates to the convention. He made this apportionment, giving to the counties which had sent in returns, the whole number of delegates which the law authorized, and disregarding the several counties from which no returns had been received. So far, I think, we have the proceedings strictly legal. I have said nothing about frauds, because up to this time no frauds had been alleged. I shall notice these frauds, however, in their proper place.

The next step is the election of delegates to the constitutional convention. This took place on the third Monday of June. Prior to this election, the Topekaites, and the free-State men generally, had resolved not to participate in the election. They had hitherto refrained from taking any part in the administration of the government, except to resist its authority, and they were determined to carry out their plans. This was a matter of public notoriety. In their newspapers, at their public meetings, in private, and in public, they expressed this determination. And much of the efforts of both Stanton and Walker were directed to this point, to prevail upon the people to attend the election and vote for delegates. The day of election came, and the delegates were elected. Only twenty-two hundred votes were polled. We are told that this election was carried by fraud. But I appeal to gentlemen to know if there is any pretense that the delegates who composed the convention did not receive a majority of the legal votes cast at that election? Did any one pretend so then? Does any one pretend now that these men were elected by illegal votes? Has it ever been asserted, here or elsewhere, that the Topeka party at that election polled more legal votes than their opponents? No such thing. They refused to attend the election. They refused to vote. They refused to participate in this exercise of popular sovereignty. And why was it? Was it because they were not registered? There were nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one voters registered in the nineteen counties, and only two thousand two hundred votes polled at that election. Where were the other seven thousand? Were they kept away from the polls through fear of violence? Where is the evidence of any offer, of any attempt, at violence? Where is the evidence that any free-State man presented himself at the polls that day whose vote was rejected for any cause, or whose right to vote was challenged? Will any gentleman here assert that these seven thousand voters were prevented from voting at that election by the other party? If there is no such evidence, if there is no such allegation, then we are again bound to presume that they did not vote because they were determined not to vote. And the facts are as I have before stated, and as was notorious at the time, that these men, by a general understanding and agreement among themselves, absented themselves from the polls, and thus refused to have any voice in the formation of their State constitution. And this, again, is fully corroborated by Governor Stanton in his last message to the Legislature at the extra session, on the 8th of December, 1857. He there says:

"That the refusal of the majority to go into the election for delegates was unfortunate is now too apparent to be denied. It [this refusal] has produced all the evils and dangers of the present critical hour. It has enabled a body of men, not actually representing the opinions of the people, though regularly and legitimately [mark the language] clothed with their authority, to prepare for them a form of government."

Upon whom does Governor Stanton charge this result? Does he, when speaking officially—when putting his language upon the record—does he then charge it upon the Leocomptonites? Does he then tell the free-State men that they were wronged, that they were fraudulently prevented from voting, that they were kept from the polls by violence? No, sir. He says to them, you, constituting the majority of the people, refused to vote at that election; you, by this refusal, have brought upon yourselves, upon the Territory of Kansas, upon your country, all the evils and dangers of this critical hour; and, in the same message, he also says:

"It thus appears that in the election of 15th June last for delegates to the convention, the great mass of the people purposely refrained from voting, and left the whole proceeding with its important consequences, to the active minority."

Now, sir, in the face of all this we shall require some strong testimony to satisfy us that the election was not legally conducted. We shall want something besides allegations. We shall want facts, well-authenticated facts, to satisfy us that the free-State men refrained from voting at that election because they were not permitted to vote. We will not, upon mere rumor or hearsay, convict Governor Stanton of falsehood when he states that it was their own fault, their own perverseness. And if these men, the majority, did "purposely refrain from voting;" did "refuse to go into election;" did "leave the whole proceeding, with all its important consequences, to the active minority;" then, I ask, was there anything improper, was there anything illegal, was there anything fraudulent, in the fact that this active minority, who attended to their duties, carried this election? It is surprising that, with such testimony before us, we should find honorable gentlemen upon this floor coolly charging the results of this election to the frauds and the violence of the successful party; but it is still more surprising that Governor Stanton himself, after having thus put himself on the record, written down his testimony and signed it with his own hand, that he should turn around and join in this cry of frauds.

But it is alleged that the free-State men were not registered, that in a number of the counties no registry was made, and that even in those in which it was made, the free-State voters were purposely omitted. Now, the first answer to this is that the law provided the means for the correction of this wrong, so far as relates to the counties in which returns were made. There the persons not registered, or their friends, had a right to go before the probate judge and have the returns corrected, by adding such names as had been omitted, and erasing such as were fraudulent. The lists of voters were put up in the district, that every man might see whether his name and the name of his neighbor were upon it, and if not, might, within the time prescribed by law, have it placed there. He could also see if names of persons not residents of the district had been placed thereon, and by making proof of the fact require the judge to erase them. And I hold that it was his duty to do this; that it was every man's duty to know that his name was upon the proper list. I believe that it is the duty of every man to vote. The price of liberty is eternal vigilance, and the man who will negligently or perversely disfranchise himself, or allow himself to be disfranchised by others, wrongs himself, wrongs his children, wrongs his country.

Mr. Chairman, if it were even true that this inaccuracy in the registration of voters existed to the extent claimed, and that the inaccuracy was occasioned by the fraudulent intent of the officers taking the census, in order to keep these men from voting, it could not invalidate the election. And especially would this be so in this case, where ample provision was made by law for the persons thus disfranchised to protect themselves, by having the lists corrected, as I before stated. But I do not wish to rest this case upon mere legal technicalities. I wish to show that law and justice in this case go hand in hand. I want to show here that the reason why a portion of the free-State men in these counties were not registered was because they were unwilling to be so registered. And though this might be fairly presumed from the fact that they made no exertions to have it done, yet we will strengthen this presumption, and establish the fact by the testimony of Governor Stanton. In his last message, before referred to, he says:

"In consequence of this embittered feeling, and the mutual distrust naturally thereby engendered, one of the parties, constituting a large majority of the people, refrained almost entirely from any participation in the proceedings instituted under the law aforesaid. The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory."

"An unwilling people." Here is the answer to the charge of fraud. Here is the explanation of the cause of these imperfections in the census returns. The free-State men (for it will not be pretended that the Governor refers to the other party) were unwilling to be registered, and those of them who were placed upon the list were placed there against their will. This is further sustained and corroborated by the fact that those who were registered refrained from voting. I think I have now fairly disposed of the counties in which a registration was had, and will now proceed to remark upon the other counties. And first, let us

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Leidy.

Ho. OF REPS.

throw out four counties which, up to this time, have no population. Then how shall we account for the failure to register the voters in the other counties? We will call Governor Stanton again to the witness stand. In his last message he says:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory; while in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances, people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act, and in some there was but a small population, and no efficient organization enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention."

Now, taking Governor Stanton's statement as fact, which it no doubt is, what have we? First, say four counties were without inhabitants, and a number of the others with a very sparse population. Then we have some counties in which "the people and officers were alike averse to the proceeding;" (and these, we all know, from the current history of events, at the time were the most populous of these counties;) and of course, in these counties the officers, with the consent and approbation of the people, refused to comply with the law. The people in these counties could not complain because they were not registered. Then we have "other counties"—how many is not stated, with what population not stated—in which "the officers neglected or refused to act." In these counties there was a wrong; but what was the extent of this wrong, and to whom attributable, we are not informed; and this wrong cannot invalidate the election any more than an irregularity in some of the counties in Pennsylvania at the last election, by which those counties would have been thrown out, would have invalidated the election there for Governor and other State officers. If this irregularity existed to any great extent, sufficient to have changed the result of the election, and was really the fault of the officers and not of the people, it would present a case that would claim our consideration; for, although the legality of the election would not be affected by it, yet the justice of the demand on the part of these disfranchised persons would give them a claim. But, in the absence of all evidence to show the extent of this disfranchisement, we cannot say that the result of the election could thereby have been affected. And, taken in connection with the other facts, that this party, wherever found, were unwilling to be registered, and in some counties refused to be, and forbid the officers attempting it, I think we can reasonably conclude that the result of the election in this case was not affected by this omission; and that, in point of fact, the people therein would not have voted had they been registered. The result of the election in these counties on the 4th day of January sustains both these positions. I would here also refer to the affidavit of George Wilson, to show that in the counties of Anderson, Allen, and Franklin, where the officers were willing to do their duty, the people would not permit it to be done. In these three counties, at the election of the 4th of January, six hundred and seventy-two votes were polled against the constitution, one for the constitution with slavery, and four for the constitution without slavery; showing that these three were also free-State counties, and among the more populous.

I wish here to call attention to one particular fact connected with this part of the case. The official returns of the census and registration of voters having been made to acting Governor Stanton, he, on the 20th of May, with these returns before him, showing that only nineteen counties had been registered, makes his apportionment of delegates, giving all the delegates to these counties. One week after this, on the 27th of May, Governor Walker, in his inaugural address, says:

"The people of Kansas are invited by the highest authority known to the law to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates."

"I see in this act no improper or unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of suffrage," &c.

Now, the Governor then knew, just as well as he now knows, that fifteen of the counties of that Territory could not vote at that election, and would not be represented in that convention; and yet, speaking to all the people of Kansas, he says you are invited to participate "freely and fairly in that election." Why does he not then even allude to the fact that a portion of the people were, by the operation of the law and the conduct of the officers, excluded from participating? Because he then knew that these people were disfranchised by their own act and consent; because he knew, as Governor Stanton afterwards said, "they were unwilling to be registered."

We proceed now to the convention; but as it is not pretended that there was any irregularity or illegality in the action of that body that would invalidate their proceedings, I shall take it for granted that these proceedings were valid and regular. The constitution was formed by the convention, and is, leaving out of view the slavery article, as unobjectionable as such instruments are usually found to be. There are some things in it that I do not approve of, and so there are in the constitution of my own State.

I think I have now shown that the whole proceeding, thus far, has been characterized by a careful regard to the rights of the people, and a strict adherence to the requirement of law; and that in the only instance in which any cause of complaint could arise, the circumstances, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, are against the complainants.

Having now traced this constitution from its origin to its end, I ask if it has not the sanction of law? I think I have shown that the act under which the convention was elected, was valid; that it was fair and just in its provisions; that the delegates were elected by a majority of the legal votes polled; and that the defects in the registration, so far as we have any evidence, were not such as could invalidate the proceedings of the convention, and were in fact occasioned by the perverseness of the people who complain; and it is admitted that there was no irregularity in the proceedings of the convention, which could affect their legality. Have these proceedings also been conducted in accordance with the principles of popular sovereignty—the will of the whole people expressed through the prescribed forms of law? First, the act was passed by a legal Legislature. This was in accordance with the principle. The delegates were elected by a majority of the legal votes cast. This was in accordance with the principle. Those who did not vote refrained therefrom voluntarily; those who were not registered were unwilling to be registered, or to take any part in these proceedings. The action or proceedings of the convention were regular. Now, I cannot see but that in every step a due regard has been had to the means for obtaining the popular will; and, as Governor Walker remarks, "voting being voluntary, and not compulsory, those who vote can alone be considered, while those who refrain from voting must be considered as acquiescing with the majority of those who do vote."

But it is objected that the convention did not submit the constitution to a vote of the people, and, therefore, the popular will could not be expressed in accepting or rejecting it. By what law or what precedent was this convention bound to submit the constitution to a vote of the people? Was it by the organic law? It is silent upon the subject. Was it by the territorial law? It is silent upon the subject. Was it by the precedents established in the proceedings in other States? Some of these submitted their constitutions to a vote, and others did not; and there is not sufficient preponderance either way to establish a precedent. If, then, there is neither law nor established precedent, whence arises the obligation? It is said that Governor Walker, with the approbation of the national Administration, assured the people that this should be done; and hence the obligation. Now I assert that the allegation here is not true, and, that, if it were true, it could not bind the convention. But it is not true. Governor Walker never pledged himself to the people of Kansas that the constitution should be submitted to a vote of the people. He recommended it; he expressed his desire for it, his confidence that it would be so submitted; but, in every instance, accompanied with the assurance that it rested entirely with the convention. Let us see what he says upon this subject.

In his inaugural address, after urging the people, by various powerful considerations, to attend the election and vote for delegates, he says:

"Do not console yourselves with the reflection that you may by a subsequent vote defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of this great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate its proceedings."

Again, in his address of the 10th September, 1857, he says, speaking of the defective registration:

"The only remedy rests with the convention itself, by admitting, if they deem best, the constitution for ratification or rejection to a vote of the people, under such just and reasonable qualifications as they may prescribe."

Again, in the same address, he says:

"I repeat, however, the opinion always heretofore expressed, that this is a matter which belongs exclusively to the convention, over which I have no power," &c.

In other places, both he and Secretary Stanton express the same idea. Is there here the recognition of any obligation upon the convention to submit the constitution to a vote of the people? Does Governor Walker pledge himself that it shall be so submitted? So far from it, he seems exceedingly cautious lest the people should rest upon such an opinion. Hence, he says to them, do not console yourselves with this idea. It is not a safe reliance. The convention have the control of this subject. I have not. If they deem it best to submit it, they can do so; but if not, I cannot compel them to do it. I desire they shall do it. I think they ought to do it, and I believe they will; but I warn you not to trust to such an uncertainty; for, if they do not submit it to your vote, then you will be without remedy. Now, I appeal to gentlemen here to say, if this language of Governor Walker's can, by any possibility, be tortured into a pledge that the constitution should be submitted to a vote? It is alleged that the President, in his instructions to the Governor, had so declared. How did Governor Walker, then, understand these instructions? Do not the foregoing extracts show that he understood the language of his instructions on this point to be merely advisory; or rather, expressive of what the President then supposed the convention would do, without making any suggestions as to what they must do? Most clearly they do. And will gentlemen say that these are garbled extracts; that we must take the whole of his addresses together? I defy any gentleman here to find, in any of those addresses to the people of Kansas, one line, word, or syllable, that will, in the least, conflict with what I have quoted. But I will show you who takes garbled extracts, and thus gives a different meaning to the language. Governor Walker, in his letter of resignation addressed to General Cass, says, speaking of his inaugural address:

"In that inaugural I proceed further to say that the people 'may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the ratification of the constitution.'"

Here he states that he had asserted to the people that they had, or would have, this privilege; meaning, evidently, to convey the idea that he had assured them that the constitution would be submitted to them. Now, let us see what he did really say on that occasion. This is his language:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may, by a subsequent vote, defeat the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant, and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

How different the idea! Instead of a positive assertion that they should have such an opportunity, he cautions them against trusting to any such hope; that it is by no means certain that they can have that opportunity. And for that very reason they should be sure to attend the election, and secure such delegates as would express their will. I hope we shall hear no more of garbled extracts after this exhibition of garbling.

I have said nothing about the submission of the slavery article to a vote of the people. I do not deem it of any particular importance to notice the objections to the form or manner in which this article was submitted; for the reason that I do not believe the convention was bound, in law or by precedent, to submit any part of the constitution to the vote of the people; and, if they chose to submit the same, or any part of it, to a vote, it was for them to say what part, and in what manner. But, in passing, I will remark that I cannot see the force of the objections raised by my honorable colleague [Mr. MONTGOMERY] to this submission. First, he objects, because, in voting on the slavery article, either for or against, he says the people were compelled to vote for the constitution. Now, sir, I deny this. I aver that the constitution was not submitted to a vote; that no privilege was given to the people to vote for or against the constitution. That instrument, all except the seventh article, was withheld from the people; and the vote could not, by any possibility, be construed as a vote in favor of the constitution. True, whichever way the people voted on the seventh article, the constitution would be adopted, except that seventh article; but not by virtue of that vote, but by the action of the convention.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Leidy.

HO. OF REPS.

Now, I do not wish to be understood here as asserting that the convention acted properly in withholding the whole constitution from a vote of the people. I think they should have submitted it. I believe with the President, that these instruments should in all cases be submitted to this test; but I do not agree that there was any binding obligation upon that body to submit it, or any part of it, to such a test, and no greater obligation to submit the slavery clause than any other, except that which grew out of the state of feeling which existed in the Territory on this subject. But the honorable gentleman says the people were subjected to a test oath; they were required to swear to support the constitution, if adopted. Well, suppose they were? Is it not the duty of every citizen to support the constitution of his State? and is not this duty binding, whether he be required to take an oath to do so or not? If adopted, would not all the people of Kansas be bound to support it, and every part of it? What objection, then, to taking an oath to do that which is right and obligatory, even without an oath? But he says, in swearing to support the constitution, they were required to swear to the truth of all the averments contained therein; in other words, that every man who swears to support the constitution of his State, or of the United States, swears that all that is contained therein is true and right, and also swears that it shall not be altered, except in the manner therein provided for. This is certainly a novel doctrine, a monstrous doctrine. What! Will the honorable gentleman say here, that every man who swears to support the constitution of his State perjures himself unless he believes that all the averments contained in that instrument are true, and all the principles embodied therein are sound? Will he tell us that, because the constitution of the State of Missouri contains an averment precisely like that contained in the constitution of Kansas, declaring the right to hold property in slaves, therefore the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] on the other side of this House, who is a Republican, and who, I take it, is honestly opposed to slavery because he believes it wrong, that he cannot hold an office in his own State, because he would be required to swear to support that constitution? Will he tell us that all those upon this floor who do not believe that the section in the Constitution of the United States which requires the rendition of fugitive slaves to their proper masters, or that section which gives to slaveholding States a representation on this floor for three fifths of their slaves, is not just, not correct in principle, perjured themselves when they took the oath here to support the Constitution of the United States? Or that every man who sits in a convention for the amendment or alteration of his State constitution, is perjured if he ever previously took an oath to support the constitution, unless the mode of alteration was prescribed in the constitution, and strictly adhered to in all the steps taken for its amendment. What is this oath to support the constitution? It is an oath to support and obey it as a fundamental law, not to believe it as a fundamental truth. It is an oath to support it as and while it continues to be the constitution of the State, not perpetually, nor after it has ceased to be such.

But the honorable gentleman says further that the constitution of Kansas repeals the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Is this true? How? Why, says the gentleman, this constitution declares that all laws now in force in the Territory of Kansas, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall continue and be of force, until altered, amended, or repealed, by a Legislature assembled under this constitution; and that thereby this convention nullified the right of legislation secured to the Territory by the Kansas-Nebraska act, after the 7th day of November, 1857; and that if Kansas is admitted with this constitution, all the laws passed by the Territorial Legislature, at the extra session, are thereby repealed. Let us examine this a moment. To what point of time does this adverb "now," used in this clause of the constitution, refer? Does it refer to the day that clause was approved in convention? Does it refer to the day when the instrument as a whole was adopted in the convention? Does it refer to the time when the people were to vote upon the slavery question? or to the time when Kansas shall be admitted by Congress, and thereby become a State? There is in this instrument itself a clause which fixes the time when the constitution shall go into effect, namely, when ratified by the vote of the people upon the slavery question as therein provided. And hence the word "now" cannot possibly mean any point of time anterior to that; and if the gentleman will refer to the dates, he will find that this event occurred on the 21st of December, after the extra session of the Territorial Legislature had adjourned; and that consequently all laws passed by that body were not only not repealed by the convention, but, according to his construction, were rendered entirely irrepealable until after the State should be organized. But I am inclined to the opinion that the construction which should be put upon this clause would fix the point of time indicated by this word "now," as the time when Kansas should be admitted and thereby become a State. I think this construction the fair one, and one that would preserve intact all the legitimate powers of the Territory while it remained a Territory, and at the same time effect the object evidently had in view by the convention, namely, the perpetuation of the territorial laws under the State organization until these laws should be altered by State authority.

Having now disposed, as I think satisfactorily, of these objections, I will next consider the vote of the 4th of January, 1858, under the act of the Territorial Legislature, for and against the constitution. At this election it is admitted, at least I admit it, that a large majority of the voters of the Territory voted against the constitution. And the question is, what is the effect of that vote? I do not, sir, deny the validity of that act authorizing the vote of the 4th of January. I admit that it was within the scope of legislative authority—that it rests upon the same authority as the act passed by the same Legislature, to determine whether a convention should be called to form a constitution. But the question here is as to its effect; and I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the act itself. You will observe, by a reference to this act, that it does not pretend to give any legal efficacy to this vote. It authorizes a vote to be taken, but it does not go on to say, "and if, upon the summing up of all the votes cast, it shall appear that a majority of the votes cast at that election were against the constitution, then, and from thenceforth, as well the said constitution as all acts and proceedings theretofore had under the same, shall be null and void." If the Legislature had intended that this vote should have the effect of a veto upon the action of the Lecompton convention, they would undoubtedly have so expressed it in some such language as the foregoing. But they did not assume such power. They knew full well that they did not possess the power; and acting Governor Stanton, in his message, had just given it as his opinion that the convention, having acted under the previous law, it was incompetent for the Legislature to repeal the law. And if the Legislature could not do this directly, they could not authorize a vote of the people, the effect of which would be to repeal it. I have not the time to discuss this point at length; but the point to which I wish to call attention, and which I think is decisive of the question, has been sufficiently indicated—namely, the want of legislative jurisdiction over the action of the convention.

I do not wish here to be understood as, in any sense, denying the power of the people to review the actions of the convention; but what I contend for is, that it must be done in accordance with the prescribed forms of law. And those forms would have required an act of the Legislature authorizing the election of delegates to a second convention, for the purpose of revising, altering, or amending this constitution. In this way the people can, I take it, at all times control and regulate their constitutions, as well before they have been presented to and admitted by Congress, as after; but I know of no other way prescribed by law to do it. And if now, under the present law in Kansas, (if they really have a law to that effect, about which there seems to be some dispute between the Legislature and Governor Denver;) if, under this law, the convention elected should assemble and remodel the Lecompton constitution, or make an entire new one before Kansas is admitted, and present that here in due form, either with or without having first submitted it to a vote of the people, I hold we should be bound to receive it; and if it was found to have been made in conformity with the requirements of law, giving all a full and fair opportunity to participate in the proceedings, I think we would be bound to accept it as the last expression of the sovereign will of the people; for I hold that the power of the people is not exhausted by being once exercised. Upon this point, however, I do not hereby design to commit myself. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

I do not agree with some honorable gentlemen on this side of the House, that the vote for State and legislative officers under this constitution, on the 4th of January, by the free-State men, is an estoppel, and closes their mouths against a denial of the legality of the constitution. Under strict rules of law, I admit, it might have such effect. But I cannot admit that these rigid rules apply to this high court in such a case. I am of opinion they had a right to guard against a contingency by electing officers under the constitution, and at the same time protest that the constitution was void; so that, if it should be afterwards decided against them in this court, they would have the advantage of their election. I think they had a right, a legal and constitutional right, on that day, peaceably, at the polls, first to vote for the State and other officers under the constitution, and then immediately vote, under the provisions of the territorial law, against the constitution; and in this view I think I am sustained by the instructions of the President to Governor Denver, to see that the people were protected in their right to vote at that election. They had also a right to send the result of that vote here, just as they would have presented a petition making known their views and wishes; and then the result is with us. If we find, upon examination, that they come here with clean hands; if the grievances of which they complain are real, and are such as we can redress, it is our duty to redress them. I extend to them in this case every right and privilege which equity can claim; and if they have a case in which equity can entitle them to relief, then, in the name of all that is sacred, just, and right, give them relief. But if, upon investigation, we find that these grievances are the result of their own negligence and inaction, their own folly and crime; if we find that the law afforded them ample means of protecting themselves against these wrongs, or of redressing the wrongs after they were committed; if we find, as we do in this case, that the wrongs of which they complain are the consequence of their own willful and obstinate resistance of the law and violation of its requirements, combined with a stubborn refusal to avail themselves of its provisions; then, sir, there is no principle of equity or of justice that they can invoke. They may invoke our sympathy; they may ask for favor; but justice and equity they cannot demand.

I propose next to consider briefly the right of the people to amend the constitution. In a case growing out of the Dorr rebellion, the Supreme Court use the following language:

"No one, we believe, has ever doubted the proposition that, according to the institutions of this country, the sovereignty in every State resides in the people of the State, and that they may alter and change their form of government at their own pleasure."

Following out the idea herein expressed, the constitution of Kansas, in the bill of rights, declares:

"2. All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

Here we have it first laid down by the Supreme Court as a settled, unquestioned proposition, that the sovereignty of the State resides in the people of the State; and that, as a consequence resulting from the foregoing, this people, being sovereign, may alter and change their form of government at their own pleasure. Then we have, in the constitution of Kansas itself, the truth of this proposition reaffirmed and still more emphatically set forth, declaring that the people of Kansas have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, &c., their government in such manner as they may think proper—not at such times and in such manner as is prescribed in the constitution, the fundamental law of the government, but at all times, and in any manner. And this right is "inalienable and indefeasible;" the parties possessing it cannot part with it themselves; cannot alien it; nor can they be deprived of it by others.

Now, if this is a right inherent in the people, inalienable and indefeasible, existing at all times, then I take it that no provision whatever in the constitution could possibly affect it, or restrain its exercise. But in the constitution of Kansas no attempt is made to restrain this right; but on the contrary, it is expressly reserved, and acknowledged. The natural, or political rights of an individual or community, cannot be diverted but by express, positive law; but here seems to be a right which is above laws and constitutions; the owners cannot part with it; constitutions and laws cannot defeat it. There is, however, no attempt in this constitution to interfere with this right. It is true, there is in this instrument an article, or section, regulating amendments after the year 1864; but not amendments by the people, but by the Legislature. Will it be asked why this section relating to amendments was introduced, if not to prevent amendments in any other manner than therein expressed? I answer, the Legislature has not, except by a constitutional grant, any power over the constitution, either to make, alter, amend, or abolish; and this section was inserted for the purpose of giving to that body this power. But the grant, regulations, and restrictions contained in this section apply exclusively to the Legislature, and do not in any manner affect, limit, or restrain the rights of the people. Under this grant the Legislature may, after 1864, alter and amend the constitution as therein provided. Prior to this time no such power can be exercised by that body; for even if the power to alter and amend did not depend upon the constitutional grant, still the fixing of a day after which this power may be exercised, would, by implication, preclude the exercise of the power prior to that day. And surely, during this period which must elapse between the time of State organization and the year 1864, no exercise of the power of the people in the way of making amendments, or alterations, can conflict with any legislative powers, for no such powers exist. How is it after 1864? I do not see any difficulty even after that date. Suppose the Legislature, after 1864, refuse to amend the constitution in the manner therein prescribed, which requires a two-thirds vote; and suppose by a majority of that body a law is passed providing for the election of delegates to a convention to amend, and in this manner the constitution should be amended: would this act of the people conflict in any way with the legislative right? The Legislature refuse to act in the premises in the manner prescribed by law, and then the people, in the exercise of their original inherent power, act for themselves. I see no inconsistency, no conflict of authority.

Mr. Chairman, there are a number of other matters connected with this subject which I desired to notice, but time will not permit. The subject of frauds, on which so much stress has been placed in the discussion of this question, might properly claim a little more consideration than I have been able to give it. I can, however, merely allude to it again. I do not pretend that there were no frauds perpetrated by the successful party in Kansas. On the contrary, I have no doubt there were frauds, gross frauds, and wrongs, perpetrated there by individuals of both parties—such frauds as must forever disgrace the parties who participated in them, and forever render them unworthy of the confidence and respect of honest men. That these frauds were not confined to either party, cannot now be denied; that a few lawless men in Kansas, aided and encouraged by men equally lawless outside of that Territory, have not only disgraced themselves, and disturbed the peace and retarded the prosperity of her people, but have agitated the whole nation, will not be controverted; and that the great mass of the people there really desire a cessation of these evils, and will gladly accept of the opportunity which a State organization will afford them, of ridding themselves of the power and influence of these "pestilent fellows," is, I believe, equally true.

Mr. Chairman, I have now presented all that time will permit, in defense of the immediate admission of Kansas as a State, under the constitution which she has presented to us. I might add many other considerations which have their influence upon my mind; but I will here briefly say, I shall vote for the admission of Kansas, because I believe that the people of that Territory, of all parties, really desire to have a State organization, as has been sufficiently indicated, not only by the direct vote upon that question, but by their applications made here for admission; because I believe that she has the requisite population, that the interests of Kansas and of the nation require it. I shall vote for its admission under the Lecompton constitution, because it is the only instrument presented here with her present application; because I believe that the proceedings, so far as we can judge, under which that constitution has been prepared and adopted, have been conducted in conformity with the requirements of law, and in such manner that the people of Kansas have had full and fair opportunity to participate "through their representatives" in its formation. And that it must be regarded as the legal expression of the will of the people; because it will place the people of Kansas in a condition to have their own Governor and other State officers, who, being elected by themselves, and from among themselves, will necessarily command more fully the confidence of the people than such officers appointed by the national Administration, and therefore subject to external influence and control, could possibly receive; which officers, coming directly from the people; and dependent upon them alone for political preferment, having all their interests, personal and political, identified with those of the people, will have the strongest possible motives for consulting their will and wishes. Because, with their State organization, with the legislative and executive officers all under their own control, and subject to their will, that will must at once become the law of the State, and will indicate itself in their legislative acts as well as in the speedy alteration of their constitution to such form as they may desire. And because, without admission, I see no prospect of an end of strife and agitation which have so long vexed and disgraced not only the people of Kansas but us as a nation. And with admission I entertain the fullest confidence that peace and harmony and prosperity will be at once restored to that divided and distracted people.

I shall vote for admission because of the consequences which will, in my opinion, inevitably result from a rejection of this application; for if we reject this application for the reasons which have been urged by the Opposition, we hold out to the future the strongest possible inducements for a recurrence of these scenes whenever any Territory is hereafter about making application for admission as a State. If we allow the perverseness, the lawlessness, the obstinacy, and rebellion of a portion of the people of Kansas, be it a minority or a majority, to constitute a ground for the rejection of the application of those who, whatever may have been their errors, their follies, or their crimes, have sustained the authority of the Government there, and in their proceedings have conformed to all the requirements of law, we offer a reward for perverseness, lawlessness, obstinacy, and rebellion in the future. But if we, as in duty we are bound, recognize only those proceedings which have been in accordance with law; if we refuse to recognize the irregular action of the turbulent and the lawless; if, by our decision we give notice to all others in like case offending that no advantage can possibly result from such a course, that they thereby peril their most important interests, we shall present a strong motive for the future observance of law and order.

Another consequence has been suggested by some honorable gentlemen as likely to result from a refusal by Congress to admit Kansas under this constitution, namely, a dissolution of the Union. Although I have no fears of such result from any cause, and much less from such a cause; and although this is the first time that I have had the honor to address a legislative body, I cannot conclude my remarks without entering my protest against this cry of dissolution. I am aware that this is no novel project. Since the first organization of the Republic we have heard these intimations. Scarcely had the ink become dry upon the parchment on which was recorded the sacred compact, until these "prophets of woe" began their doleful predictions. Massachusetts and South Carolina, Alabama and Wisconsin, and other States, each in her turn has pronounced the doom of the Union. Vain prediction! Idle threat!

Dissolve this Union? And for what? Is the nominal freedom of a few thousand negro slaves an object so dear to the hearts of northern gentlemen that, to effect it, they will hazard the liberties of the millions of freemen both North and South? Is the extension of the domains of slavery of such paramount importance to the interest, the prosperity, and the honor of southern gentlemen, as to be purchased at the sacrifice of the priceless legacy bequeathed to them by their Washingtons, their Jeffersons, their Madisons, Monroes, and Henrys, and the long list of other worthies of whom they are so justly proud? Shall we, the sons of those great and good men who framed this glorious structure, and with such admirable skill adjusted its several parts, who laid its sure foundations deep imbedded in the principles of eternal truth, and firmly based upon that immovable rock, the right of man to self-government, who cemented it together with their hearts' best blood, and consecrated it with their devoutest prayers, who left upon its every part the impress of their lofty patriotism and their deep devotion to the principles of civil and religious liberty; shall we, their sons, for such inadequate considerations, demolish this grand edifice, and scatter its fragments to the winds? Never, never!

We, upon this floor, may talk of dissolution; but we forget that there is, behind us and above us, an irresistible power, which holds, and will forever hold, this Union firm and indissoluble—the power of the people—a people who cherish this Union in their heart of hearts; whose blood and treasure are forever pledged to its support and defense. That people will never permit this Union, sanctified by the blood of their ancestors, and hallowed by every feeling of national and individual pride and honor, to be dissevered by any ruthless hand.

Sir, this Union was formed to be perpetual; and it will live through coming time. And even but half a century hence, when this Hall shall have ceased to be the scene of our national councils and our national conflicts; when the capital of this great nation, seeking some more central point, shall have fixed its location on one of the broad prairies west of the Mississippi; when, perhaps, Kansas, now the scene of turmoil and strife, shall have become the seat and center of this empire of freedom; when fifty States shall cluster round that center, and fifty stars shall grace our still unsullied and unruined flag, our sons, then grown gray with age, will, as they read the history of these days, smile at our causeless fears, and marvel at our weakness. Mr. Chairman, I repeat it, I have no fears of a dissolution of this Union. For—

"What God in His wisdom and mercy designed,
And armed with His weapons of thunder,
Not all of earth's despots and factions combined
Have the power to conquer or sunder."

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Davis.

Ho. OF REPS.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. H. W. DAVIS, OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The earlier explorers in high northern latitudes were perplexed at beholding great icebergs mysteriously making their way to the north against current and wind and tide. Philosophers in the closet divined from the strange phenomenon the existence of an under current running counter to that of the surface that bore them along. The disinterested spectator, Mr. Chairman, of the course of this debate, ignorant of our history for four years, and of who now holds the helm, would find himself similarly perplexed, and perhaps he might surmise a similar solution.

That an Administration which professes to be the god-father of "popular sovereignty," should oppose the submission of a constitution to the popular vote; that an Administration which is, in name, Democratic, should propose to impose upon the majority the will of the minority; that an Administration elevated to power by the South, against the will of the North, should urge, as the shortest way to accomplish the great purpose of making Kansas a free State, her admission as a slave State; that the Administration which professes anxiety to preserve the peace of the country, should say that the shortest way to restore the broken piece is, not to remove, but to fasten, by irrevocable laws, in the form of a State constitution guarantied by the united power of the country, that hateful oligarchy upon a people whose neck was too tender to bear the weight of their territorial yoke, which Congress could at any moment alleviate; that these methods should be taken to accomplish these purposes, may well puzzle the speculator in exploring the hidden reasons that drive men thus contrary to what apparent reason—the ordinary method of guiding the Commonwealth, the ordinary propelling powers of the Government—would seem to dictate. And possibly, Mr. Chairman, he might not be very far from solving the problem if he were to assume that the question is not so much how to accomplish the pacification of Kansas, or to make legislation square with the dogma of "popular sovereignty," or to secure the right of the people to form their own domestic institutions in their own way, which we are taught to believe is a new revelation of the year of grace eighteen hundred and fifty-four—not so much any of those reasons as to prevent the Administration, which boasted itself the omnipotent pacificator, from being brought to lick the dust, now, ere the termination of the first session of its first Congress—to lick the dust before the will of that majority which it is defying in one of the Territories; before the will of that majority of the people of the United States, against which Mr. Buchanan ascended the presidential chair, and amid the irreconcilable diversities of opinion of the people who were combined to elevate Mr. Buchanan to the Presidency—but here that men and parties are brought face to face, can no longer coalesce in the policy he would have them pursue.

We are debating the recognition of an independent State.

The Administration produce a piece of parchment with a form of government written on it, and a certificate of one John Calhoun that it is the constitution adopted at Lecompton by a convention of the people of Kansas; and on this evidence the President and his friends demand the recognition of the State of Kansas.

We respectfully ask for the proof that the piece of parchment contains the will of the people of Kansas.

We are told the Territorial Legislature took, by law, the sense of the people, and two thousand six hundred and seventy voted to call a convention; that two thousand two hundred persons voted, in all, for the members of the convention; that the convention, whose journal no one here has seen, voted the constitution; that it was not submitted to the people for their ratification; and that the vote of the 4th of January, of ten thousand against it, is of no legal relevancy to the question before us.

On this state of facts, Mr. Chairman, we are besought, on behalf of the Administration, to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution for the sake of the principle involved. Sir, I confess myself the servant of principle; and I respectfully ask gentlemen, what principle they ask me to sanction?

Is it that a minority in a Territory constitute the people, and so must make their will the law over the majority? If so, I respectfully dissent from the principle.

Is it that the people of a Territory, with or without previous authority of Congress, have a legal right themselves to take the initiative, and to lay upon your table a constitution which they are entitled to demand at our hands that we shall accept? If so, then I respectfully dissent from the principle.

Is it, on the part of our southern friends, that any constitution which may be laid upon our table containing, no matter how put there, a clause sanctioning slavery, is to shut the eye to every other circumstance connected with it, and to drive us to the admission of that people as a State merely because that provision is in the constitution? If so, then I respectfully dissent from the principle.

Is it that they mean that gentlemen may look into the constitution for the purpose of seeing that slavery is there, and when they find it there, are bound to vote for the admission? If so, then the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, by exactly the same reason, may look into that constitution to see that slavery is there; and, if they think it the more logical conclusion, may vote to refuse admission upon that ground. But as I do not understand the gentlemen on the other side to admit the latter alternative as one fit to be embraced, they will indulge me in the logical consequence of not regarding the former as a proper consideration to weigh at all with me upon the question that is before the House.

That slavery is embraced in that constitution is certainly, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, no ground at all for the rejection—no ground at all for any difficulty about admission. If put there by the will of the people, it ought not to weigh with the weight of the dust in the balance upon the question; for to allow that to be a ground of exclusion, while it would be within the legislative discretion of Congress, would be, in my judgment, unwise, tending directly to consequences that all of us are most anxious to avoid, and would exhibit an unsocial disposition in behalf of the majority which might come to such a conclusion; which, whether rightfully or wrongfully, the past history of the nation teaches us only too well will lead to nothing but disastrous civil collisions; which, in their result, if not immediately, will first undermine and then bring down in ruin the whole fabric of our liberties.

Then, if these be not the principles which ought to commend themselves to the judgment of a right-judging man, is there any other? Is it that because the Territory has proceeded under a law of a Territorial Legislature, with all the regularity and formality, as the President tells us, that any Territory has ever proceeded, we are bound to accept what they send to us, blindly and without looking beyond it? Is it the principle of this Government not only that we may stop, but that we are bound to stop, at what the Territory sends to us? Then, Mr. Chairman, I do not assent to that proposition; and it is to that proposition that I desire chiefly to draw your attention now.

Upon that question I am freer than most of the gentlemen upon either side of this House. I voted with my southern friends against the Topeka constitution, being a free constitution, formally sent here by the majority of the then inhabitants of the Territory. I am, therefore, free to raise the question whether there is legal authority at the bottom of that constitution now presented to us? They protested against the admission of California because there was no evidence that a majority of its people had assented; because there was no formality of law preceding its constitution; because there were no protections to the ballot-box. I am, therefore, now free to ask those who did protest to join me in inquiring whether there be here legal authority; whether here the ballot-box has been protected; whether here we have the will of the people ascertained in legal form, which we not only may accept, but which we are bound to accept?

This assumes the validity of the laws of the Territorial Legislature calling the convention, and the proceedings under them in point of law; and that the legal effect of those proceedings is to clothe this parchment with all the attributes of a State constitution, and that we are not entitled to inquire who voted for or against it; how many staid from the polls, or why they did so; nor whether fraud or force has decided the result; but that the legal certificates preclude inquiry into everything beyond.

I respectfully deny the validity in point of law, and further say, that if they were as valid as if authorized by act of Congress, they could to no extent exclude the legislative discretion of Congress as to the fitness of recognizing the new State.

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment all that is necessary to the admission of a State is the concurrence of the will of the people of a Territory and of Congress. Prior to such concurrence there is no State. After that concurrence there is a State. The application of a Territory to be admitted as a State is only a petition on your table—an offer upon their part which we may accept or which we may reject at our pleasure. After that concurrence, it has been ingrafted into the living body-politic of the country, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, to share with us, for good or evil, to the end of time, the blessings or misfortunes of the Republic—to be severed by nothing except that external violence which shall lop off some living limb of the Republic, or that civil strife which the chief of the Republic is so rashly provoking.

Enabling acts, whether contained in the organic law of the Territory or in special acts authorizing the formation of a constitution, providing for the formalities of election, the protection of the polls, the expression of the popular will under the forms of law, are only the guarantees that Congress in its wisdom throws around the expression of the popular will. They are only methods of ascertaining that will; and when that will is ascertained, Congress has everything that is indispensable, and all the Territory can supply. The will of Congress to concur with the will of the people is expressed in the act of Congress admitting the State; and it is that concurrence, no matter how ascertained, by what forms, or with the omission of what forms, which makes the distinction, and alone makes the distinction, between a Territory of the United States and a State of the United States.

There is no such thing in our system as an incipient State—a State whose federal relations are undefined—a State of uncertain federal relations, as Mr. Calhoun once expressed himself. I respectfully submit that there is no intermediate condition between a Territory and a State; that a State whose federal relations are undefined is a State of which the Constitution of the United States knows nothing. Uncertain federal relations are no federal relations. Unless the State be in this Union, the State is out of this Union. Unless the State be bound by the Constitution, the State is independent of the Constitution. Unless the State have a right to be here represented, the State has no right to be represented anywhere. It is a State under the Constitution, or it is a State independent. If, therefore, any proceeding create a State which does not simultaneously bring it within, and make it one of, the United States, that State may as well form an alliance with the incipient confederacy of Canada and New Brunswick as enter this Confederacy. It may levy war against the United States, and you cannot punish its people for treason. It may appropriate the territory of the United States, and it is beyond your power. In a word, by the public law of the United States, all the territory within her jurisdiction is either a Territory of the United States or a State of this Union.

If, then, that be the case, we are brought at once to the question of the relation of Congress to the Territories in the formation of States. What are the respective parts belonging to the people of the

HO. OF REPS.

Territory and to the Congress in the creation of a new State?

With the dogma of sovereignty I do not deal here. I leave that to the schools or to the gentlemen who meddle with metaphysical disquisitions. What sovereignty is, I shall not attempt to define. The word is not used in our laws; it is not found among the wise words of our Constitution. It is the will-of-the-wisp, which they who follow will find a treacherous guide through fens and bogs. We are not engaged with defining that "popular sovereignty" with which gentlemen on the other side have been so much plagued for the last year or two. Popular sovereignty is only a demagogue's name for the foundation principle of all our institutions. It is only a demagogue's name for the right of the people to govern themselves—not that popular sovereignty which is limited by and springs from an act of Congress; not that mushroom growth, bred in the hot-bed of political corruption as a dainty delicacy for the people's palate, under the sedulous care of my honorable friends opposite, which, now that it is grown, is found to be nothing but toad-stools, whereof the body-politic is now sick; but that right of the people to govern themselves, recognized by the fundamental law as the very corner-stone of the Republic which, in this case, the President violates and denies.

Here this day would deal in legal language; and in legal language there is such a thing as the people of the United States, of which the people of a Territory form the subjects. And there is known in the law of the United States such a thing as the right of a people of a State to form their own government. And it is assumed that every State which can form, at any time, a part of these United States, shall have emanated spontaneously from the people whose affairs it regulates, and shall have been received voluntarily into the United States by the authority of Congress.

Now, sir, what is the relation of Congress to the Territories? Have the Territories—I do not say any natural right, for I am not here upon philosophical dissertation—have they any legal right to initiate proceedings to form a constitution? I do not ask whether they may not come here and ask, by petition, Congress to receive them, for that does not meet the difficulties of the case; but I ask whether the people of any Territory, by their simple volition, can meet in convention and assume to themselves such legal powers as shall compel Congress to recognize them as a legal body? Certainly those gentlemen who protested against the admission of California, because there had been no preceding law, cannot maintain that proposition. Certainly gentlemen who voted against the Topeka constitution cannot maintain that proposition. Certainly the gentlemen who signed what purported to be a report of the committee of investigation of this House, cannot maintain that proposition. Certainly the President, who devoted a great part of his message to demonstrate that it is only through legal channels, by legal forms, and under legal authorities, that a constitution could be formed, cannot maintain that proposition.

Neither can we, in point of sound sense and reason, maintain it, because that assumes there is a power in the people of some portions of the Territory not derived from the Constitution of the United States—since the Constitution says nothing upon the subject, except that Congress may admit new States. And if they have any inherent power, by the same reason they have all power; in other words, we are upon revolutionary ground, and not legal ground. It is to confound a right by law under the Constitution with the natural right mentioned in the Declaration of Independence, of people to alter and change their government to suit themselves. But we are not dealing with revolutionary, but with legal rights. We live and were born under the Constitution, and to us that is the ultimate criterion of legal rights; it is our embodiment of natural right in a living, practical form of government; beyond it we recognize no natural right as a source of legal right; and he who cannot deduce his claim of right under it, has none. I submit, therefore, that by the law of the United States, the people of a Territory have no original right or authority to form a State government. No public man of position and character, of any party, has ever ventured to maintain such a proposition distinctly. The distinguished head of the State Department has fallen into expressions which seem to imply it; he has hastened to repel the inference; but, in his haste, has involved himself and his opinions in inexplicable perplexity and mystification, whence nothing can rescue him.

Then, if there be no inherent legal right in the people of a Territory to form a State government, how is it to be accomplished? They must form it; Congress cannot do it for them; yet Congress is the only legal authority, the only source of law for the Territories. Where, then, does it exist? I maintain that, so far as legal authority is asserted of, or essential to, any proceeding for a convention, it must flow from Congress; because here only is any government over the Territories, in the eye of the law of the United States. The Supreme Court, which even States-rights gentlemen now-a-days regard as the ultimate arbiter upon all questions, has settled some other things besides the relation of slavery to the Territories; and among them it has settled that Congress alone governs the Territories—whether under the clause which authorizes them to make all needful rules and regulations for the territory of the United States, or under some unwritten clause implied by the strict constructionists, it is needless here to inquire. It can flow from nowhere else, because a State, in the view of the Constitution of the United States, means a body of people within a particular territory, and that territory belongs to the people of the United States; and the people who live upon a particular portion of that territory have no right to assume to themselves, without our assent, any portion of it. A State involves the idea of a certain population inhabiting and possessing a certain territory; and if the people cannot get the territory without the assent of Congress, they cannot make themselves a State without the assent of Congress, nor take any steps towards it essential to its existence, which can exclude the control of Congress. Congress, it is true, cannot make a constitution for a Territory. It can only throw around the people of a Territory a legal protection, authorize them to proceed, and give them the guarantees of law in their proceedings; but beyond that I apprehend Congress can do nothing, and excepting Congress nobody can do that. What I wish here to maintain is, that that is the fundamental principle of all the legislation of Congress upon that subject. All the history of the Republic is in its favor; it has all authority in its favor; and there is no precedent which raises even a doubt against it.

Now, sir, I ask the attention of the committee very briefly to the law—for I rose to-day to deal with the legal position of gentlemen on the other side. They have not been willing to enter the controversy with their opponents on the question of fraud in the formation of the constitution, or whether it be the fair and bona fide expression of the will of the people. They have insisted that these things were concealed from them by a screen of legal technicalities; and it is to tear down that screen that I now address myself.

In the absence, therefore, of any special act of Congress authorizing a convention, the only question is the construction of the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854. Does that act confer on the Territorial Legislature power to call a convention to form a constitution?

There have been many States admitted into the Union, and under divers circumstances, but much the greater number of them have been admitted under the express and precedent authority of laws of Congress. And, sir, you will perceive at once—if the authority can only come from Congress to take the initiative steps—that it is immaterial whether that authority be contained in the organic act or in a special act. In either case it is our authority that they are exercising. In every instance they are our agents. In every instance they have only the authority that we give them. And, therefore, it comes exactly to the same thing, whether there was an enabling act to authorize the Territory to proceed to form a State constitution and government, or whether the authority was given under its organic act. This can never be a judicial question; but it is settled by every form of political authority. The States of Vermont, Kentucky, Maine, and Texas, have been admitted into the Union; but not, as has been erroneously stated, without precedent legislation. If it were so, it would not affect the argument, for they were never Territories of the United States. But the assumption is historically erroneous. Vermont went through the Revolution without any defined relations to the other colonies, claiming independence at the time of the Revolution, under no colonial government; and, as a State, by its own inherent power, it acceded to and adopted the Constitution of the United States, exactly as the other States did. It is no case of the formation of a State out of a Territory of the United States. Texas was likewise an independent Republic, acknowledged by the United States, and afterwards received into the Union. Kentucky proceeded under a law of the State of Virginia, whose territory it then was, and on that authority formed its constitution, and was admitted into the Union. Maine proceeded under the authority of a law of Massachusetts, whose territory it was, and by that means formed its State government, and was admitted into the Union.

But the argument is irrelevant; for the question is not whether Congress may, in its discretion, recognize constitutions formed by the people without authority of law; but whether a Territorial Legislature was, in point of law, authority to legalize the election of a convention, to give the convention itself a legal existence, to vest it with legal power to bind not merely the people, but the Congress? No one denies the power of Congress to admit Tennessee and Florida; yet nobody ever asserted any legal validity in their proceedings before admission.

The language of the organic acts and the proceedings of Congress thereupon are decisive.

The Territories divide themselves into two great classes. In Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Michigan, the Legislatures had "power to make laws, in all cases, for the good government of the people of the said Territory, not repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the Constitution and laws of the United States."

In Wisconsin, Minnesota, Oregon, Florida, and Iowa, the power of the Legislatures was declared to extend—in the identical words of the Kansas-Nebraska act—"to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Congress has construed both forms of expression by passing enabling acts for both classes. Not only for Ohio, Louisiana, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama, Illinois, and Indiana, but also for Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Oregon, did Congress pass acts specially authorizing them to call a convention and form a State government; and, in every instance, excepting Wisconsin, these bills provided all the details of the convention, the number of delegates, its time of assembling, the modes under which the delegates should be elected. It is plain Congress thought the power "to make laws in all cases" necessarily extended it "to all rightful subjects of legislation." It is plain Congress thought neither form of expression authorized the temporary territorial government to create a convention to form a constitution which would begin to operate only after the Territorial Legislature itself had ceased. Its power to govern was confined to the Territory—a temporary contrivance for a temporary purpose—involved in all the local interests and conflicts of territorial politics—and not safely to be intrusted with the providing for a constitution. In a word, they were authorized to make laws to govern the Territory; but a law for a constitution was no law for governing a Territory at all.

The case is stronger under the Kansas act; for it reserves to Congress the power to make two or more States of Territories out of that Territory; and if Congress have the right to make two States, it is absurd to suppose it gave the Legislature power to make one State of it.

But there are cases of Territories which have spontaneously petitioned for admission under constitutions framed without an enabling act, and they are fruitful of authority.

The proceedings for the admission of Arkansas, Michigan, and Iowa—where there were no acts of Congress authorizing conventions—are decisive.

The law admitting Arkansas declared the boundaries of the State. That, I suppose, establishes the fact that nobody then maintained that there was any authority in her constitution prior to her admission. The territorial limits of a State are essential to her existence; until they are defined there can be no State; after there is a State, Congress cannot determine its right of territory. On the territory depend the counties, the election districts, the judicial divisions, the apportionments of representation, the very people who are entitled to be heard on the adoption of the constitution.

If the territorial law can authorize a convention which can adopt a constitution having any legal force prior to the recognition of Congress, it must have the right to define and appropriate the territory of the State it creates; and, if it have not this power, it cannot create a State, in the eye of the law, at all; for Congress may destroy its identity by taking away a half, or two thirds, or all its territory, and give it to another State.

Congress recognized the State of Michigan upon the condition that her people should accept the boundaries Congress prescribed; and, on their acceptance only, was Michigan admitted.

Iowa was declared to be admitted as a State, in 1845, under her constitution of 1844, Congress declaring her boundaries, and requiring the assent of her people to them. But, in August, 1846, Congress prescribed by law other boundaries for Iowa; and, by that law, recognized the validity of the proceedings of the Legislature of the Territory of Iowa of the 17th of January, 1846, submitting the boundary between the Territory and Missouri to the Supreme Court; and, finally, in December, 1846, Congress declared Iowa admitted into the Union under a constitution formed in May, 1846, and with the boundaries of the law of 1846.

The case of Wisconsin is still more decisive. The territorial legislative power extended to all proper subjects of legislation; yet Congress passed an enabling act, and in it defined the boundaries of the future State, on the 6th of August, 1846. The people formed a constitution on the 16th December, 1846, and Congress admitted the State on condition the people assented to other boundaries. Instead of merely assenting to the boundaries, they formed a new constitution on the 1st of February, 1848; and, on their application, were admitted as a State with the boundaries of the enabling act, on the 29th of May, 1848.

These cases demonstrate that, whether a constitution be formed by the people, under or without an enabling act, the constitution has no force of law over either person or Territory till the final and complete admission of the State. Till her Senators and Representatives are entitled to their seats, the territorial authorities continue, the organic law is operative and supreme, the Territorial Legislature retains its legislative power, Congress can absolutely dispose of the territory, assign its limits and exercise its discretion whether to admit the people as a State or to retain them as they are. In a word, these cases display the great fact lost sight of in this controversy, that till actual and final admission as a State, the constitution is not a law; it is merely a proposition, which will become operative only when Congress recognizes the existence of the State.

With reference to Michigan, a controversy arose in the Senate which elicited some salutary opinions. We have, first of all, the statement of his Excellency, the President, then in the Senate. When Michigan was applying for recognition, the exact question arose, whether there was a legal power in the Territorial Legislature to proceed, their powers being as I have stated them. Mr. Buchanan then said:

"We have pursued this course [that is, to disregard informality] in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

This was said in the hearing of the whole Senate, that no Senator would contend that they had legal authority, and he asserted that it was an act of usurpation! And, so far as the record shows, no man rose to controvert the authority of this distinguished expositor of Democratic doctrines of that day. Well, sir, that covers the three cases of proceedings by Territorial Legislatures without authority from Congress by special act. That destroys the whole argument which has been attempted to be founded upon them. With reference to Arkansas, I am protected by the authority of a name dear to the party which he founded. The Governor of that Territory applied to General Jackson to know whether the Territorial Legislature had any authority to pass an act for the purpose of taking the sense of the people on the subject of a State constitution. General Jackson took the opinion of his Attorney General, Mr. Butler; and the opinion of that distinguished lawyer, acquiesced in by the whole Administration, was, that there was no legal authority in the Territorial Legislature, but that it was beyond their temporary functions; that there was no authority inherent in the people, but that they were subordinate to the power of Congress, governed, as he says, under that clause of the Constitution which gives Congress power to make all needful rules and regulations for the territory of the United States. The new lights had not risen in their day. And as if no authority should be wanting, entitled to command respect with every division of the various opinions that are entertained now in this House, we have the further authority of a gentleman from whom, in many respects, it is my misfortune to have differed in political opinion, but who, in my judgment, was one of the ablest gentlemen that ever graced the councils of this country—more conservative, manly, and upright in his views and convictions and conduct than almost any man of his party; always ready to sacrifice party allegiance upon the altar of truth; always following the dictates of an independent judgment, as well in his votes as in his reasoning, and, for that reason, justly the worshiped idol of the great southern section of this country. I suppose that the strict-constructionist gentlemen of this House will not accuse me of any sympathy for dangerous dogmas from Federal quarters when I quote the authority of Mr. Calhoun:

"My opinion was, and still is, that the movement of the people of Michigan in forming for themselves a State constitution, without waiting for the assent of Congress, was revolutionary."

What does the incumbent of the Executive chair say to that now? Why were not the military forces of the United States directed—instead of guarding and protecting the Lecompton convention, to turn them out, as they were directed to turn out the Topeka convention, equally illegal or equally legal?

Mr. Calhoun proceeds to assign the reason:

"As it threw off the authority of the United States over the Territory."

That he regarded as necessarily involved in the very idea of their assuming to themselves to take the first step, in a legal form, towards the establishment of a State government.

He proceeds to say:

"And that we were left at liberty to treat the proceedings as revolutionary, and to remand her to her territorial condition—" for doing which, with reference to Kansas, we are now threatened with the direst consequences by the gentlemen who then concurred in this opinion——"or to waive the irregularity."

Now all the argument of our friends on the other side is to follow the regular course, and break down the irregular course—only they have agreed to call the regular course that which Mr. Calhoun called the irregular course. He proceeds to say:

"And to recognize what was done as rightfully done—as our authority alone was concerned—my impression was that the former was the proper course; but I also thought that the act remanding her back should contain our assent, in the usual manner, for her to form a constitution, and thus leave her free to become a State."

And so a distinguished gentleman in another place [Mr. CRITTENDEN] thought, not long since, and possibly there are some here who may think like him.

Well, sir, no gentleman can rise here and cite any Administration that has ever existed in this Republic, down to the beginning of Mr. Buchanan's administration, that has ever so flagrantly violated the laws of the Republic as to recognize any proceedings of a Territorial Legislature on this subject as having authority of law. No man can name any high officer of the Government that has ever said so, as no man can show any vote of Congress that has ever looked to such a recognition. It was, sir, the first blunder—to be followed up consecutively and logically by other blunders in law, in policy, as well as in morals—that this Administration made, when it recognized the legal authority of the Lecompton convention, assembled under the Legislature of Kansas. It was the last of the novelties which have been palmed on the country as sound law, to break the fall to which the inventors of the Kansas-Nebraska act have been staggering for the last four years.

Sir, it was new in this Administration. No member of either House of Congress, at the last Congress, thought that there was any authority in the act of 1854 for the people to proceed, or for the Territorial Legislature to proceed. That law reserved to Congress the right to divide the Territory. How, then, could it authorize the people of that Territory to form themselves into one State? Did it contemplate that the wandering rabble that was there when that law was passed had then the right? And if they had not the right, pray how and when was the construction of the law changed, so far as the legal meaning is concerned, by the accession of population?

Did President Pierce, when he requested Congress to settle the difficulties of Kansas by passing a law authorizing them to form a State constitution when they should have ninety-three thousand inhabitants, think the people of Kansas then had that authority? Did the gentleman [Mr. TOOMBS] who, in another place, during the last Congress, moved a bill authorizing them, when they should have ninety-three thousand inhabitants, to form a constitution, and providing all the detailed organization of the convention, think that without that law they had the authority then? Did this House, when it passed Mr. Dunn's bill, suppose they were doing then what the Territorial Legislature had the right already to do, although that bill postponed the exercise of the authority it conferred until their population had reached the requisite point? If they did not, then we have the concurrent opinions of all departments of the Government during the last Administration—nay, of every member of the last Congress of both sides, Democratic and Republican, as well as of all previous Administrations, of the statute-book speaking for itself no less than the reason and nature of the proceeding, against the possibility of any legal validity being imparted to the convention and its proceedings by virtue of the territorial laws; and those things of themselves ought to be sufficient, in my judgment, to settle the principle that there is no legal authority in the Territorial Legislature to proceed in the matter.

But it is perfectly clear that the law of the Legislature of Kansas itself has not been executed. It required a census to be taken in all the counties. It was not taken in half of them. It required the appointment of delegates to be made after the census was "completed" and "returned." It was made before the census was more than half taken. The law contemplated an apportionment on the basis of a completed census of the whole Territory; and, of course, till that was done, there was no authority to make any apportionment. The causes of failure are immaterial to the legal point; but they are certified officially, by the Governor and Secretary, to have been the neglect of the local officers, and not the hostility or opposition of the people. It required the apportionment to be made by the Governor and the Secretary. It was made by the Secretary alone, who was acting Governor at the time. It required counties, not having population enough for a delegate, to be attached to some district; the fourteen counties excluded from the census were not attached to any district. They therefore had neither vote nor representation, actual or constructive, in the convention. This failure to execute the law alone is fatal to every idea of legal validity in the proceedings.

If there was no legal authority in the Legislature, then I suppose that the fabric of my honorable friends on the other side tumbles about their ears. What becomes of the argument that we cannot look behind the certificates? Why, the certificates have no legal authority. What becomes of the argument that these people who staid at home authorized those who voted to vote for them?

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Clay.

HO. OF REPS.

If there was no legal election, they were not bound by it. If there was no law requiring them to attend, staying at home was their duty. They were only not participating in an usurpation. The foundation for a presumption of the assent of those who staid at home, is, that the law required them to be at the polls. The good old law of Virginia, as my honorable friend in my eye will remember, made it a punishable offense to stay away from an election; and though there may be no law punishing it, yet it is a violation of law, and of the duty of the citizen, to stay away from an election. It is the duty of the citizen to cast his vote; and if the citizen does not cast it, he is held to authorize those who do; but that cannot be where the proceeding has no legal validity—that presumption cannot arise where it is merely a voluntary collection of a portion of the people of the Territory to signify their willingness to admit a certain form of constitution without their having any authority to bind anybody else. I suppose, then, that in that point of view, the whole argument upon the other side is in ruins. All their barriers of laws and certificates, presumptions against fact, and acquiescences extorted from protests and denials, are swept away.

We are at liberty to see that only two thousand six hundred and seventy people voted on calling a convention; that only two thousand two hundred people elected the convention; that the census shows only nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one voters, and twenty-four thousand seven hundred and eighty people in the Territory which has transformed itself into a State. And if they who hitherto insisted on confining us to legal returns and certificates now suggest the imperfections of the census and registry, I agree we may go further and see that there may be twelve thousand voters, and from thirty-seven thousand to forty-two thousand people in the Territory; but of them not three thousand voters modestly ask the powers of a State government against the votes of ten thousand, and the protest of seven thousand. Nay, sir, emancipated from every trammel, we are at liberty and bound to go further and to inquire whether there has been in this Territory such fierce collisions, such hostile passions, so much of rebellion against their regular government, such an absolute division of the people with reference to their government, so much of civil bloodshed, so much of military control, such an absence of the ordinary political virtues, of calmness, of consideration, of deliberation, as the President describes; whether an overwhelming majority of the people are opposed to the thing that is now sought to be forced or foisted upon them and devoted to another form of government. It relieves us from the fear of encountering the dangers intimated and vaguely hinted at by gentlemen upon the other side in the event of our venturing to do our duty. It leaves us free to determine whether, under all these circumstances, it is not a fair case for legislative discretion to pause and ask the people again what they say, upon "a sober, second thought," about it—to see whether the people are likely to submit or likely to resist—whether any such great good is to be accomplished by now forcing this constitution upon them, that inevitable civil war will be compensated by it.

We are told by the President that this is the shortest way to settle the agitation. Mr. Chairman, I confess myself astonished at such an opinion from a gentleman who has seen so much of public service, has so long filled distinguished positions, and also knows, or ought to know, so much of human nature. Why, what has been the difficulty in that unfortunate Territory? Was it not that their Territorial Legislature was usurped? Is not that the reason that, from the foundation of the Territory to last October, the people refused to recognize any authority under the laws emanating from that Legislature? Have they not been quieted only by the earnest efforts and warm appeals, backed by the military power, of Governor Walker? Were they not quieted alone by the assurance, which he gave them, that they should have an opportunity of expressing their opinion on the law which was to govern them? Did they not join in the October election because they had confidence in his assurances? Was it not for the first time that the people of that Territory had ever met, face to face, in an American manner, at the common ballot-box? Was it not the first time that they had stood in any other attitude, except that of hostility, with arms in their hands and hatred in their hearts? And are we to be told by the President that the way to pacify them is, to subject them permanently to the hateful domination of the handful of men from whose hands they would have wrested the government—as the President tells us—but for the United States troops; that the whole sanctity and authority of a State government shall remove them from all the power of Congress to redress their grievances; that they shall be admitted as a State, and thereby be delivered over to the legal authorities under the constitution which they protest against, which Congress cannot repeal, and will be bound to enforce if resisted? for, if the State be admitted, Congress has then no discretion but to follow the legal line of authority, and to put down everything else as rebellion. But has not the President learned enough from the experience of the last three years to make him pause ere he pushed the country upon this dangerous experiment; or is he madly bent on a party triumph at the risk of civil war, forced on people of Anglo-Saxon blood, as the only alternative to a tame surrender of their right of self-government?

The President's policy is high treason against the right of the people to govern themselves. His apology for his conduct is insulting to the victims of his usurpation.

Is it true that the dividing line is between those who are loyal to this territorial government and those who endeavored to destroy it by force and usurpation? Then the latter have been no parties to the proceedings for a convention, yet are to be subject to the constitution.

Is it true that the territorial government would long since have been subverted had it not been protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States? Then the stronger part of the people is against the proceeding for a constitution; and it is to the weaker part the President proposes to confide the powers of State government over the stronger. Is not this to deliver the State into the hands of its enemies? or will the rebels submit when the United States withdraw their troops? or are they to guarantee the new usurpation?

Is it true that Secretary Stanton was obliged to summon the Legislature as the only means whereby the election of the 21st December could be conducted without collision and bloodshed? Then, why was Mr. Stanton dismissed for summoning them? Was it in furtherance of the same policy which then refused the people an opportunity to speak, and now that they have spoken, refuse to hear them? Or if that election could not be conducted without collision and bloodshed, because the people were subjected to an authority they defied, is it the purpose of the President to insure the collision and bloodshed Stanton avoided, by forcing on them a government which they have protested and remonstrated against, and are ready to defy and destroy? Is that the readiest method of settling the Kansas question?

Is it the truth, that up to the present moment the enemies of the enabling government adhere to their Topeka revolutionary constitution? Then they are not likely to receive the Lecompton constitution.

Is the reason the people refused to vote for delegates to the convention, that they have ever refused to sanction or recognize any other constitution than that of Topeka? Then surely they are not among those who sanction the Lecompton constitution. It is not by their will it is put over them. It was not from acquiescence they refrained from voting. Their silence is their dissent; the President tells us so. He says they would have voted against it had it been submitted. Surely, then, silence is as instructive as their voice.

Sir, in my judgment, the passage of this law is a declaration of civil war. The history of the last three years in Kansas leaves no doubt that the people will not submit to this constitution. It cannot legally be changed before 1864. I think it a fair case for disregarding the form of law, and the substance of law. If the constitutional authorities should concur in the change, peace may be preserved. I trust they will concur, and that peace will be preserved. But if they do resist the change which the mass of the people will demand, if we now refuse to listen to their protest, then, in my judgment, the shortest remedy is the best.

Free government is a farce if men are required to submit to usurpation such as has here been perpetrated, and I fear the people of Kansas are not in a mood to assist at the farce. They will turn it into tragedy. Having heretofore resisted, we ought to suppose they will resist again. We ought to act wisely and carefully; and if we have discretion now, we will not drive this people upon revolutionary courses. Give them a mode of relief, and allow them to follow that peaceful course which they are inclined to follow, according to all reports from that Territory. Give them the opportunity of expressing their will as to the law under which they are to live; and having expressed their will—whether it be for slavery or against slavery, is, in my judgment, absolutely immaterial—allow them to come in at a proper time, with a proper population, and with reasonable boundaries and a rich dower, as one of the sister States of the Republic.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES B. CLAY,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. CLAY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have repeatedly, sir, sought to obtain the floor to make known some of my opinions; but, until now, have never been so fortunate as to succeed, because, I presume, of the fact that I would not go to the Speaker's chair to ask my name to be placed on the list there kept, having determined that if I could not get the floor from this, my seat, as a Representative in Congress, I would confine myself to my duty of voting upon all questions of importance. And now, sir, having been recognized, I am ill, quite ill, as I have been for some days; and this fact must be my excuse and my apology for doing that which, under ordinary circumstances, I disapprove, reading the greater part of the remarks I shall offer; but to-morrow is the last day allowed to this debate, and I must say now what I wish to say, or not at all.

I have desired, sir, at some time during the pendency of the question of the admission or non-admission of Kansas as a State into the Union, under the constitution made at Lecompton, to give public expression of some of my views upon the subject from my proper place in this House. It is so late, sir, in the debate that the subject seems, indeed, almost to be exhausted; the minds of members are made up, and I can hope to accomplish nothing beyond placing myself upon the record, whilst there is some doubt as to the ultimate fate of the measure. I only desire to do this that my friends at home, and the country generally, may know precisely how I stand upon the question; and it will be my purpose to express myself with that frankness and freedom which I have endeavored always to observe during my short political career.

In the first place, sir, I wish to make a personal explanation, which, perhaps, I ought to have made at the time, but which I have considered would be more apropos when I should have other occasion to address the House. In the early days of the session I had the honor to call upon the President, with other gentlemen, for the purpose of giving him information as to the state of the Democratic party upon the Kansas question, which, in my opinion, was at the time important. Of this I made no secret; and yet, in newspapers of my own country and elsewhere, I was greatly misrepresented, as having gone to tender advice and remonstrance to the Chief Magistrate. I went to the President for no such purpose. Advice or remonstrance on my part to him would have been a sort of intervention which my sense of propriety would have forbidden. He understood me well, or ought to have done so, as did all those who knew the facts. My sole desire was to preserve harmony and good feeling in a party with which I was acting.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Clay.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. Chairman, we have now before us all the light upon the Kansas question that we can expect to have. A committee of investigation of this House was early appointed. Majority and minority have made their reports, if not to the House, at least they are before the country. The whole subject has been elaborately discussed in both Houses of Congress, and there is not a single fact bearing in the remotest degree upon it, not even the determination of Mr. Calhoun in respect to the State officers of Kansas, which is not well known.

It is impossible to disguise the fact, sir, however much gentlemen may protest against it, that at the bottom of all the difficulties about Kansas, lies that same question that has so often put the Union in peril: I mean the question of negro slavery. And it does seem to me, sir, that if we could only bring ourselves to be actuated by the same spirit of lofty patriotism that inspired the best men of all parties in those momentous periods of 1820, 1832, and 1850, we should find but little difficulty in our way.

I am perfectly aware, sir, that many gentlemen assert that the question of slavery has nothing to do with their opposition to the admission of Kansas; and I am free to admit that I believe some of the northern Democrats in opposition honestly think it has not. I believe, sir, that they only deceive and delude themselves, and that they will find it impossible to convince the country that such is not the fact. Everywhere in Kentucky, during the contests of 1856 and 1857, whilst those with whom I acted asserted that the Democratic party was a national party; that its members North as well as South were true to the Union and to the guarantees of the Constitution, especially upon the question of slavery, we were met by the response that the whole North was abolition in sentiment, and that we were only deceived by our northern friends, honest though we might be ourselves; and that at the first presentation of the question, they would desert us. How will we return to our constituents should Kansas be refused admission? They will say to us, that up to the meeting of Congress; from the time immigration, actual or forced, first began to flow into Kansas, the question of slavery, and that alone, was the prominent, absorbing, and agitating question. They will say that the northern Democrats took their position against admission before many of the matters which have since afforded pretexts had any existence; before the elections of December and January, pronounced, and perhaps justly, as full of fraud; before the conduct of Calhoun was known. No matter what questions of submissions or of enabling acts have since been raised, all, all, they will say, have been but pretexts by which gentlemen have sought to disguise from themselves and from others the bare, naked truth, that their opposition to the Lecompton constitution is because of the slavery clause. Scornfully they will point to the aspect of parties in this House. They will show how the Republican party presents itself in solid, unbroken phalanx, not a member of it hesitating or wavering for an instant; all, who answer the question frankly, declaring they will never vote for the admission of a slave State. Turning to the Democratic opposition, they will show that not a man comes from south of Mason and Dixon's line. They will see some few southern members, it is possible, untrue to the constitutional rights of the South; but they are not of the Democratic party; they are of that party so signally defeated in my own State, some of whose members openly asserted, in 1856, that they would prefer the success of Fremont to that of Mr. Buchanan; and who, upon the news of every Abolition victory over the Democrats, threw up their hats and shouted for joy; who, by their sullen opposition to the Democratic party, to say the least, laid themselves open to the charge of suffering Mr. Banks to be elected Speaker of this House.

Sir, whilst in this connection, I cannot fail to notice some passages of the very remarkable speech of the old and distinguished Senator from my State, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] Filial, if not public duty requires that I should do so. I refer to that part of the honorable Senator's speech against the admission of Kansas in which he alludes to the compromise line of 36° 30', in the language which I read, as the creation of Mr. Clay:

"That compromise was a bond and assurance of peace. I would not have disturbed it. It was hallowed in my estimation by the men who had made it. It was hallowed in my apprehension by the beneficial consequences that resulted from it. It was hailed at the time it was made by the South. It produced good, and nothing but good, from that time. Often have you, sir, [addressing Mr. TOOMBS,] and I, and all of the old Whig party, triumphed in that act as one of the great achievements of our leader, Henry Clay. It was from that, among other things, that he derived the proudest of all his titles—that of the pacificator and peace-maker of his country. We ascribed to him a great instrumentality in the passage of that law, and over and over again have I claimed credit and honor for him for this act. This, for thirty years, had been my steadfast opinion. I have been growing, perhaps, during that time, a little older, and am a little less susceptible of new impressions and novel opinions. I cannot lay aside the idea that the law which made that line of division was a constitutional one. I believed so then. All people believed it. I must be permitted to remain that opinion still; to go on, at any rate, to my end with the hope that I have not been praising, and have not been claiming credit for others for violating the Constitution of their country."

Sir, this statement of Mr. CRITTENDEN is of a piece with all those misrepresentations or misconceptions of Mr. Clay which I encountered in the Ashland district, and upon which I was so often in the newspapers of the party charged with being an apostate son. Mr. Clay never was the author of the miscalled Missouri compromise, the line of 36° 30'. He expressly repudiated its authorship. He regarded it as a measure only of temporary relief, and as wholly inadequate, in 1850, to form the basis of the compromise of that day. Yet many good men of the North who were his friends, upon the mistaken idea that he was its author, arrayed themselves, after the fall of the Whig party, in opposition to the Democratic party, which had abrogated that line of 36° 30' by the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Hear, sir, what Mr. Clay himself said in reference to that matter, in 1850, in one of the last, and perhaps the greatest speech of his life:

"Sir, while I was engaged in anxious consideration upon this subject, the idea of the Missouri compromise, as it has been termed, came under my review, was considered by me and finally rejected, as in my judgment less worthy of the common acceptance of both parties of this Union than the project which I offer to your consideration."

"Mr. President, before I enter into a particular examination, however, of that Missouri compromise, I beg to be allowed to correct a great error, not merely in the Senate, but throughout the whole country, in respect to my agency in regard to the Missouri compromise, or rather the line of 36° 30', established by the agency of Congress. I do not know whether anything has excited more surprise in my mind as to the rapidity with which important historical transactions are obliterated and pass out of memory, than has the knowledge of the fact that I was everywhere considered the author of the line of 36° 30', which was established upon the occasion of the admission of Missouri into the Union."

"It would take up too much time to go over the whole of that important era in the public affairs of this country. I shall not attempt it; although I have ample materials before me, derived from a careful and particular examination of the Journals of both Houses. I will not occupy your time by going into any detailed account of the whole transaction; but I will content myself with stating that, so far from my having presented as a proposition the line of 36° 30', upon the occasion of considering whether Missouri ought to be admitted into the Union or not, it did not originate in the House of which I was a member. It originated in this body. Those who will cast their recollection back—and I am sure the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] more correctly, perhaps, than anybody else—must bring to recollection the fact, that at the first Congress, when the proposition was made to admit Missouri—or rather to permit her to hold a convention and form a constitution, as preliminary to deciding whether she should be admitted into this Union, the bill failed by a disagreement between the two Houses; the House of Representatives insisting upon, and the Senate dissenting from, the provision contained in the ordinance of 1787; the House insisting upon the interdiction of slavery, and the Senate rejecting the proposition for the interdiction of slavery. The bill failed. It did not pass that session of Congress."

"At the next session it was renewed; and, at the time of its renewal, Maine was knocking at our door, also, to be admitted into the Union. In the House there was a majority for a restriction of the admission of slavery; in the Senate a majority was opposed to any such restriction. In the Senate, therefore, in order to carry Missouri through, a bill or provision for her admission, or rather authorizing her to determine the question of her admission, was coupled with the bill for the admission of Maine. They were connected together, and the Senate said to the House, 'you want the bill for the admission of Maine passed; you shall not have it, unless you take along with it the bill for the admission of Missouri also.' There was a majority—not a very large one, but a very firm and decided majority—in the Senate, for coupling them together. Well, the bill went through all the usual stages of disagreement, and of committees of conference; for there were two committees of conference upon the occasion before the matter was finally decided. It was finally settled to disconnect the two bills; to admit Maine separately, without any connection with Missouri, and to insert in the Missouri bill a clause—which was inserted in the Senate of the United States—a clause which was proposed by Mr. Thomas, of Illinois, in the Senate, restricting the admission of slavery north of 36° 30', and leaving the question open south of 36° 30', either to admit or not to admit slavery. The bill was finally passed. The committees of conference of the two Houses recommended the detachment of the two bills, and the passage of the Missouri bill with the clause of 36° 30' in it. So it passed. So it went to Missouri. So, for a moment, it quieted the country. But the clause of 36° 30', I repeat, you will find, sir, if you will take the trouble to look into the Journals, was, upon three or four different occasions, offered. Mr. Thomas, acting in every instance, presented the proposition of 36° 30'; and it was finally agreed to. But I take occasion to say, that among those who agreed to that line were a majority of southern members. My friend from Alabama, in the Senate, Mr. King, Mr. Pinckney, from Maryland, and a majority of the southern Senators in this body, voted in favor of the line of 36° 30'; and a majority of the southern members in the other House, at the head of whom was Mr. Lawrence himself, voted also for that line. I have no doubt that I did also; but, as I was Speaker of the House, and as the Journal does not show which way the Speaker votes, except in cases of a tie, I am not able to tell, with certainty, how I actually did vote; but I have no earthly doubt that I voted, in common with my other southern friends, for the adoption of the line of 36° 30'."

Mark this language, sir:

"The committee of conference of the two Houses recommended the detachment of the two bills, and the passage of the Missouri bill with the clause of 36° 30' in it. So it passed. So it went to Missouri. So, for a moment, it quieted the country."

Sir, I cannot conceive how a gentleman of the great reputation of the honorable Senator from Kentucky can so soon have forgotten an historical fact, can so completely have overlooked the solemn protest of Mr. Clay, made at so recent and so momentous a period as 1850. Sir, I have great respect for the distinguished Senator; I have the kindest feelings towards him. So far as I am concerned, requiescat in pace.

Mr. Chairman, whilst I believe the question of slavery is the true matter of difficulty, and only real ground of opposition to the admission of Kansas, at least on the part of Republicans and those Democrats in opposition, I do not mean to discuss it. Far too much has already been said. I have regretted and deplored the extreme speeches that have been made on either side, calculated only to widen the breach between the two sections of the country, and still further to endanger the existence of that Union, which in my opinion depends now, only, upon the justice and patriotism of the North. On this subject I array myself, sir, under the banner of my old friend from Oregon, [General LANE,] and by the side of my young friend from Connecticut, [Mr. BISHOP.]

Sir, whilst I will not discuss this slavery question, I will briefly notice some of the objections made to the admission of Kansas. Whatever may have been said in the earlier part of this discussion about enabling acts and the necessity of submitting a constitution formed by a convention, for the ratification of the people, no one now believes that either the one or the other is a necessary prerequisite to the admission of a new State. It appears to me that the only proper inquiries for Congress upon a new State applying for admission into the Union of States, are: Whether it has sufficient population; whether its proposed constitution be republican in form; and whether its proposed constitution be the act and will of the people proposing to be governed by it, expressed in lawful manner. So far as Congress is concerned, these are the only requisites. Applied to Kansas, the first two of them are admitted on all hands. No one has questioned that she has a sufficient population; and although gentlemen have asserted that the clause restricting amendments of the constitution after 1864 is anti-republican, no one can seriously maintain it. It may be wrong, but it is not anti-republican. If it be, the Constitution of the United States itself is anti-republican; because that instrument, in its fifth article, provides "that no amendment made prior to 1808 shall, in any manner, affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article;" a provision in principle just as anti-republican as the clause in the Kansas constitution. Neither is so. Whether it were wise in the people of Kansas to insert that clause in their constitution, is not for me to determine. As a member of Congress, I have nothing whatever to do with it. It is their business to settle their organic law in their own way, provided it be republican. They have chosen to do so, and it is my opinion that we cannot interfere with it, unless we wish to assume for Congress power directly in conflict with the doctrine of "non-intervention." I have, however, no objection to the Senate bill, which, in this respect, neither gives nor takes away any right of the people of Kansas.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Clay.

Ho. OF REPS.

The only question, then, of all those made in the first instance is, whether the constitution presented to us is the act and will of the people of Kansas, lawfully expressed. The distinguished Senator from Illinois, the master spirit of the Opposition, without whom it could not have stood for an hour, has admitted, over and over again, that this was the only question of importance. Upon this point, sir, what evidence shall we, as members of Congress, receive? Prima facie, the Lecompton constitution is the will of the people of Kansas. There is nothing in the instrument itself furnishing the least proof to the contrary. In its provisions, it is similar to most of the new constitutions of the other States. The proof is clear, and beyond all doubt, that the people of the Territory proceeded, in the usual mode, to call a convention; its delegates were chosen by a fair vote of the people, who chose to vote at all, for the express purpose of framing a constitution; they proceeded regularly in the performance of their duty, and did frame the constitution under which, and which alone, Kansas now demands admission as a State. So careful were they to do nothing which the reasonable and fair men of the Territory could object to, that they did what, in my judgment, there was no obligation upon them to do—submitted the only feature of the constitution liable to objection, to a vote of the people.

I am aware, sir, that now, searching about in all directions to find pretexts to justify opposition, gentlemen have lately attacked the Legislature which summoned the convention; that it has been asserted that the convention itself represented but partially the people of the Territory. These attacks and assertions are not in my opinion sustained before us by any competent testimony. On the contrary, in the earlier part of the discussion it was on all hands admitted—and I have since heard distinguished gentlemen in the Opposition regret the admission—that the Legislature was a legal one, and that the convention properly represented the people of the Territory. It was only in the eleventh hour that anything was said about fifteen or nineteen counties being unrepresented; and in this Governor Walker has been unsustained by his own friends. The only matter of evidence strongly insisted upon, and appearing, indeed, like proof that the constitution is not the will of the people, is the vote of the 4th of January last. But, sir, in my judgment, that vote cannot properly be considered by us at all. I do not believe that the Legislature called by Mr. Stanton, competent as it may have been for other purposes, had any power to submit to a vote of the people the constitution formed by the represented sovereignty of the people, which had not chosen in its sovereign capacity to submit it. That a large portion of the people of Kansas thought so themselves is evident from the fact that the vote was all on one side. As against the constitution, if it were not their will, I believe the people of Kansas had a clear legal remedy. I believe it was in their power to have furnished Congress with competent testimony against it. I mean by petition. They have not chosen to exercise that right; and I, for one, cannot regard a one-sided party vote, directed by incompetent authority, in the light of a petition, which is a clear legal right. Sir, I do not, as a member of Congress, give any weight whatsoever to individual or newspaper charges against the Lecompton constitution. I believe there has been fraud and violence—far too much of fraud and violence on all sides; but aside from the question of policy, I do believe that the weight of testimony before us is altogether in favor of the proposed requirement that the “constitution presented was at the time of its adoption the will of the people of Kansas lawfully expressed.”

But, sir, when I come to the question of the policy of admission, a question to which the practical statesman ought always to look, I am free from all doubts. The country is heartily sick and tired of the whole Kansas question. Even the opponents of Lecompton in Kansas are sick and tired of it—they want quiet, they want peace, they want opportunity to develop the glorious country they inhabit, over most of which I have myself been, and which I know to be one of the finest agricultural portions of America; where, indeed, in the language of the poet,

“Tell me that they will be fools enough to proceed to a fratricidal war amongst themselves, about the miserable question of slavery, when they have, in fact, no slaves amongst them, and when they know they have the power to make Kansas a free State when they will. I do not believe one word of it. I have lived amongst and known frontier people half the days of my manhood, and I know them well enough to believe that if you admit Kansas at once as a State, instead of bedewing the green sod of the prairie with kindred blood, they will drive out the bad and vicious men from amongst them by the force of moral sentiment; and the country, under the genial influence of the plow, rather than the sword, will be made to bloom like a garden. If we have doubts about mere technical abstract questions, in our desire to accomplish this great good, let us not forget that we should give the benefit of those doubts to the welfare of the country; and that greater men than any of us have, in other days of this Republic, compromised, conceded—ay, even yielded, something of principle, for the good of the country and the safety of the Union.”

These, sir, I believe to be the sentiments entertained by the great mass of the people whom I have the honor to represent. They have heard, as I have heard, and as they and I have regretted to hear, much said by extreme men about a dissolution of the Union in any contingency. Against such idea, sir, I wish, for them, to enter a solemn protest. It may do well for gentlemen from the far South, with a barrier of States between them and the North, to talk about dissolution, and a northern republic and a southern republic. Sir, Kentucky, in old times, was called the dark and bloody ground. Her sons of this day do not mean that she shall ever more deserve the appellation. We are ready, and we have in every battle-field shown that we were willing, to shed our blood for the honor and the glory of the whole country.

Painted above us upon the ceiling of this gorgeous chamber, is our coat-of-arms; and its legend is, “United we stand, divided we fall.” So may it be to the end of time.

Mr. HOUSTON. If no one else wants the floor, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the gentleman from Alabama will yield to me for a minute or two I desire just here, at the conclusion of the speech of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] to read an extract from a speech delivered in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in favor of relieving Kentucky from slavery. In speaking of those who complained of the movement, the distinguished orator said:

“What would they who thus reproach us have done? If they would repress all tendencies towards liberty and ultimate emancipation, they must do more than put down the benevolent efforts of this society. They must go back to the era of our liberty and independence, and muzzle the cannon which thunders its annual joyous return. They must revive the slave trade, with all its train of atrocities.”

“They must blow out the moral lights around us, and extinguish that greatest torch of all which America presents to a benighted world, pointing the way to their rights, their liberties, and their happiness. And when they have achieved all these purposes, their work will be yet incomplete. They must penetrate the human soul, and eradicate the light of reason and the love of liberty. Then, and not till then, when universal darkness and despair prevail, can you perpetuate slavery, and repress all sympathies, and all humane and benevolent efforts among freemen, in behalf of the unhappy portion of our race who are doomed to bondage.”

“Our friends who are cursed with this greatest of human evils, deserve the kindest attention and consideration. Their property and their safety are both involved. But the liberal and candid among them will not, cannot, expect that every project to deliver our country from it is to be crushed because of a possible and ideal danger.”

The gentleman from Kentucky censures the course which northern members have seen fit to take in opposition to the extension of slavery into territory now free—into territory north of 36° 30'. The extract I have just read was the sentiments uttered in the Hall of the House of Representatives by the illustrious predecessor of that gentleman who represents the Ashland district of Kentucky. I read the speech when a boy. The distinguished man who made it taught me the very first lesson I ever learned upon this subject of slavery. His name, sir, was HENRY CLAY.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed permission, I would reply, for a moment or two, to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. I did not come into this House to-day, sir, for the purpose of bringing here the speeches of the gentleman from whom I am proud to have descended. The sole purpose with which I alluded to his name was to correct a misstatement, or misrepresentation, or misconstruction, whichever it may have been, of the honorable Senator from my own State, in reference to the so-called Missouri compromise line of 36° 30'. The position, sir, of Mr. Clay upon the question of negro slavery is well known, and I have no doubt that the gentleman from Ohio has correctly quoted his language. But I will tell you what you will find in the speech delivered by him upon the compromise measures of 1850. You will find that in place of that line of 36° 30', which he himself believed was no longer operative for the purpose for which it was designed, he gave us another compromise, and that was the very doctrine of non-intervention by Congress upon the subject of slavery. He, sir, in his speech in 1850, said also, as I am willing to admit, that, by his own act, he never would place slavery where slavery was not; but at the same time, and in the same speech, he said that if a new State were to present herself at the door of Congress, asking admission into the Union of States, he, for one, would never oppose her admission because she had chosen to have slavery in her constitution, for in that case slavery would be there by the will of the people themselves, and Congress would be absolved from all agency in placing it there. He believed that the people of this country were capable of self-government, and was willing that they should decide the question for themselves; and when they presented themselves to Congress asking admission with slavery, he would vote to admit them into the Union. That was the position then held. That is the position I am proud to hold, and that is the position in which I am proud to follow him. Sir, talk about the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and the doctrine of non-intervention contained in it, as though it were there to be found for the first time! You find it for the first time in 1850, a substitute, a better thing—that doctrine of non-intervention—than your line of 36° 30'; a better thing than any compromise ever made upon the subject of slavery; at least, so thought the author of the compromise of 1850, and I follow him. I speak by the record when I assert that these were his sentiments.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I had no disposition, when I rose, to enter into any discussion upon this subject. My opinions in regard to slavery are pretty well understood. I did not think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] would become excited over the fact that I dared to quote from the speech of a man to whom I became attached in my early boyhood, and whose banner I followed in political struggles as long as he lived.

Mr. CLAY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say if he thought I was excited by his referring to Mr. Clay as he did, then he must attribute it to perhaps an unfortunate manner of mine, and not in the least degree to any excitement which I felt.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I defend the principles of that departed statesman; I adopted his position that slavery ought not to be extended into free territory; and it was upon that principle that I opposed, through many days and many nights, the repeal of the Missouri compromise—a measure which, if Henry Clay did not vote for, he supported throughout the subsequent portion of his life, as one bringing peace and harmony to our then distracted country which he loved.

In the same speech from which I have read, delivered by him in 1827, he uses this language. I recite from memory:

“Could I relieve of this foul blot [slavery] the revered State which gave me birth, and the no less beloved State which adopted me as her son, I would not exchange the satisfaction I should enjoy from such a triumph, for the proudest laurels ever worn by Roman conqueror.”

It would seem not only that Henry Clay was opposed to the extension of slavery into free territory, but that he was desirous of removing the blot entirely from Virginia, where he was born, and from Kentucky, that had so highly honored him.

The gentleman has referred to the measures of 1850, and to the position which Mr. Clay took then. What was it? He was at the head of a committee of thirteen, appointed by the Senate, and he made an able report in regard to the territories acquired from Mexico. In it he addressed himself to the North to this effect: there is no necessity for applying a Wilmot proviso to this territory, because slavery can never go there; it was excluded by the law of Mexico; California has already adopted a constitution rejecting slavery; in all human probability Utah and New Mexico will do the same.

And following out the suggestion of that report, you may remember that Daniel Webster, in his speech of the 7th of March, so highly lauded throughout the South, said to the Senate, in substance: you ought not to ask the Wilmot proviso, because it is but a human statute applied to a territory over which nature's God has decreed through his laws of climate and soil, that slavery never can go; and why reenact His statutes?

By the compromise measures of 1850, it must be borne in mind, there was no provision for squatter sovereignty. They provided that the people of the Territories of Utah and New Mexico may, when they acquired sufficient population, decide the question of slavery for themselves, and not before they were prepared to form a State constitution. It was not contended by Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, or by any other leading member of either branch of Congress, of any party, that while they remained in a territorial condition, slavery could enter the Territories of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have said all I desire to say at this time.

Mr. CLAY. I regret, and I feel it proper to express my regret, that the name of my father has been brought so frequently into this discussion.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have referred to it with the most profound respect, and in vindication of my own position as a Representative.

Mr. CLAY. I know it; and I thank the gentleman from Ohio, and I thank all others who were his friends, for having been so. My heart has always been full of gratitude to them.

My sole reason, as I stated in the first instance, in mentioning his name at all, was because it had been mentioned in the Senate Chamber by a gentleman of great distinction, and great influence over this land, and who has been looked upon as his great friend; but who had, unintentionally perhaps, misrepresented him. I had no purpose of going into the question of squatter sovereignty and other questions, which my honorable friend from Ohio has brought up, to show, or to attempt to show, the opinions of Mr. Clay, upon any of those subjects. It was for a single and sole object that I mentioned his name at all.

Always, however, it has been my fate, since first I raised my head above the political waters, and stood out a freeman before the country, to be sought to be crushed in his name. Those attempts have failed, thank God, in my own country, and I hope always everywhere to be able to sustain the positions I have taken by his record.

I have not spoken upon any of those subjects of squatter sovereignty, &c., to which the gentleman has alluded; and I shall no longer continue a discussion upon what were or were not the opinions of Mr. Clay, which I do not think relevant to this debate on Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no disposition to put the gentleman from Kentucky down.

Mr. CLAY. I know it; I know it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I merely wished to show that I preferred to follow the course of his father, rather than to follow his; that is all.

Mr. CLAY. Very well; very well. We shall see; we shall see.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. AARON HARLAN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HARLAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: History teaches, and experience verifies the truth, that when a great fraud or wrong is about to be committed by the Government of a country against the peace and repose of society, nothing is more common than for the party engaged in the wrong to seek to accomplish it under the name and with the pretext of restoring some lost right or liberty of the people. Weak and corrupt administrations frequently resort to these false pretenses for the purpose of perpetuating their power. When, therefore, for the purpose of expanding the institution of slavery, extending its area, increasing and rendering permanent its political power, by pulling down all obstructions in its way, which must necessarily agitate society and disturb the peace and harmony of the country, it was to be expected that those who had resolved upon this outrage should invent some plausible plea or false pretense that there was some long-lost liberty or equality of the people to be reclaimed and restored by the new policy, the repeal of the Missouri compromise was effected by using, in the act to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, these very remarkable words:

"The eighth section of the act, preparatory to the admission of Missouri into the Union, approved March 6, 1820, which, being inconsistent with the principle of non-interference by Congress with slavery in the States and Territories as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures, is hereby declared inoperative and void; it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory, or exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Why not say, in direct words, that "the eighth section of the Missouri compromise act, which prohibited slavery north of 36° 30', is hereby repealed?" Why all this circuitry of language?

Why pretend that the legislation of 1850 was inconsistent with the act of 1820? Why this talk of "leaving the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," if it were not to conceal the wrong under the name and pretext of extending the blessings of freedom? It was with an air of triumph asked, why not extend all the rights now enjoyed by the people of the States to the people of the Territories? Why not allow this right of self-government to the few settlers of a Territory as well as to large communities and States?

The Democratic party, from the time this provision was incorporated into the law for the organization of Kansas Territory, determined to appropriate this doctrine of "popular sovereignty" to its own exclusive use and benefit. It was to be claimed as a great distinguishing principle between them and all other parties; and this was to be kept very prominently before the people.

The chief leader at the South in setting up this claim was Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, who, while the Kansas bill was pending in the House of Representatives, said:

"Those who hold that Congress ought to impose their arbitrary mandates upon the people of the Territories in this particular, whether the people be willing or unwilling, hold the doctrine of Lord North and his adherents in the British Parliament towards the Colonies during his administration. He and they claimed the right to govern the Colonies in all cases whatsoever, notwithstanding the want of representation."

Yes, sir, the people of the Territories must be left "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," and those who did not subscribe to this doctrine must be charged with holding the political opinions held by Lord North and the British Government in the days of the Revolution. This was the Democratic doctrine in 1854. Two years afterwards, the Democratic national convention, held at Cincinnati, revised this doctrine of "squatter sovereignty" by one of their resolutions, which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

This commentary upon the original text placed an apparent limitation upon the power of the Territories; but still a "majority of the actual residents," when they came to form a constitution, could form their "domestic institutions" to suit themselves.

The President having placed himself upon this Cincinnati platform so fully that, according to his own language, he was no longer James Buchanan, but was the Cincinnati platform, it was but reasonable to expect, at least, that this exposition of "squatter sovereignty" would be fairly and fully carried out in his administration.

In his inaugural address he said:

"It is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote."

In his instructions to Governor Walker, in speaking of the constitutional convention, and of the constitution then about to be formed by it, he says:

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

Governor Walker proceeded to Kansas under these instructions; and, in his inaugural address to the people, among other things, he said:

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that, unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

To show that these statements were made by Governor Walker in good faith, in pursuance of his instructions, and with the knowledge not only of the President, but with the approval of all the members of his Cabinet, and with a view of presenting other facts and arguments on this subject, I beg leave to read from Governor Walker's letter of resignation the following extracts. He says:

"I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas on the express condition that I should advocate the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people for ratification or rejection."

"These views were clearly understood by the President and all his Cabinet. They were distinctly set forth in my letter of acceptance of this office of the 25th of March last, and reiterated in my inaugural address of the 27th of May last, as follows:

"Indeed, I cannot doubt that the convention, after having framed a State constitution, will submit it for ratification or rejection by a majority of the then actual bona fide resident settlers of Kansas."

"With these views well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas."

"In my official dispatch to you of 2d June last, a copy of that inaugural address was transmitted to you for the further information of the President and his Cabinet. No exception was ever taken to any portion of that address. On the contrary, it is distinctly admitted by the President in his message, with commendable frankness, that my instructions in favor of the submission of the constitution to the vote of the people were 'general and unqualified.' By that inaugural and subsequent addresses I was pledged to the people of Kansas to oppose, by all 'lawful means,' the adoption of any constitution which was not fairly and fully submitted to their vote for ratification or rejection. These pledges I cannot recall or violate without personal dishonor and the abandonment of fundamental principles; and, therefore, it is impossible for me to support what is called the Leecompton constitution, because it is not submitted to a vote of the people for ratification or rejection."

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given or could be given for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory, and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Leecompton constitution on the 7th November last. If, then, sovereignty can be delegated, and conventions, as such, are sovereign, which I deny, surely it must be only in such cases as when such conventions are chosen by the people, which we have seen was not the case as regards the late Leecompton convention. It was for this, among other reasons, that in my inaugural and other addresses I insisted that the constitution should be submitted to the people by the convention, as the only means of curing this vital defect in the organization. It was, therefore, among other reasons, when, as you know, the organization of the so-called Topeka State government, and as a consequence an inevitable civil war and conflict with the troops must have ensued, these results were prevented by my assuring, not the Abolitionists, as has been erroneously stated—for my address was not to them, but the people of Kansas—that in my judgment, the constitution would be submitted fairly and freely for ratification or rejection by their vote; and that, if this was not done, I would unite with them, the people, as I now do, in lawful opposition to such a procedure."

"The President takes a different view of the subject in his message; and, from the events occurring in Kansas as well as here, it is evident that the question is passing from theories into practice, and that, as Governor of Kansas, I should be compelled to carry out new instructions, differing, on a vital question, from those received at the date of my appointment. Such instruction I could not execute consistently with my views of the Federal Constitution, of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, or with my pledges to the people of Kansas. Under these circumstances, no alternative is left me but to resign the office of Governor of the Territory of Kansas.

"No one can more deeply regret than myself this necessity; but it arises from no change of opinion on my part. On the contrary, I should have most cheerfully returned to Kansas to carry out my original instructions, and thus preserve the peace of the Territory, and finally settle the Kansas question by redeeming my pledges to the people."

As a further proof that it was the universal understanding, before and at the time of the election of the delegates to the Lecompton constitutional convention, that the constitution was to be submitted to the people; and to corroborate the evidence of Governor Walker, if it required any, I read the publication of John Calhoun and seven other candidates for the convention, in which they pledge themselves that the constitution shall be submitted. It speaks for itself, and reads as follows:

To the Democratic Voters of Douglas County:

It having been stated by that Abolition newspaper, the Herald of Freedom, and by some disaffected bogus Democrats, who have got up an independent ticket, for the purpose of securing the vote of the Black Republicans, that the regular nominees of the Democratic convention were opposed to submitting the constitution to the people, we, the candidates of the Democratic party, submit the following resolution, which was adopted by the Democratic convention which placed us in nomination, and which we fully and heartily endorse, as a complete refutation of the slanders above referred to.

JOHN CALHOUN,	A. W. JONES,
W. S. WELLS,	H. BUTCHER,
J. S. BOLLING,	JOHN M. WALLACE,
WM. T. SPIGELY,	L. A. PRATHER.

LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, June 13, 1857.

"Resolved, That we will support no man as a delegate to the constitutional convention, whose duties it will be to frame the constitution of the future State of Kansas, and to mold the political institutions under which we, as a people, are to live, unless he pledges himself, fully, freely, and without reservation, to use every honorable means to submit the same to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, at the proper time for the vote being taken upon the adoption by the people, in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers of this Territory, as the majority of voters shall decide."

Under the assurances thus given by the Cincinnati platform, by the instructions of the President of the United States to Governor Walker, by the advice of his Cabinet, by the addresses of Governor Walker to the people of Kansas, by the published pledges of the candidates for the convention, the election for delegates to the Lecompton convention was held; and a majority of its delegates were found to be in favor of making Kansas a slave State! It then, for the first time, began to be whispered that the constitution would not be submitted to the people for their adoption.

To show with what indignation this suggestion was met at the South at that time, I refer to an extract from a Virginia newspaper, the Richmond Examiner, of the 14th July, 1857. This extract is as follows:

"Here is the whole question, then, from alpha to omega: Shall the constitution be submitted to the people? The Democracy of Kansas demand that it shall, and the Democracy of the Union second their demand. Mr. KERR says, nay; the ultra South clamors in chorus, nay. Well, why should not the constitution be submitted to the people? What is the objection of the ultras? Strange to say, the reason is not denied. We blush for the South that the reason is avowed. The reason alleged is, that the people of Kansas would vote down such a constitution as the clamorers would frame for them; and the effort is to thrust upon them, by a political trick and contrivance, what could not be put upon them by fair Democratic means. Such is the scheme of 'the chivalry' of the South! such the lame and impotent conclusion of all the grand airs and affectations of virtue and honor, with which 'the chivalry' have amused the country so long! A paltry fraud, a political juggle, a legal swindle, upon the people of Kansas—insisted upon, demanded, clamored for, by 'the chivalry,' par excellence, by the pink and pick politicians of the South.

"Our tools in the convention will frame a constitution for Kansas? It will be such as the people would repudiate; we will take care to prevent the people from voting upon it; we will juggle it through a show of mock formalities; and we will accomplish by chicanery what we could not have accomplished by straightforward, honest, Democratic practice? Such is the position of the peculiar champions of the South; such the attitude in which they are striving to place the South before the Union and before the world; such the humiliating depths of dishonor—with faith violated, pledges broken, and reputation blasted—in which they would sink the noble Democracy of the slaveholding States. The fraud is infamous enough in itself, but it is doubly so in being in violation of express pledges given by the Democracy of the Union, and participated in, in the most solemn manner, by the ultras themselves."

The above article appeared in the organ of the Administration, the Washington Union, of the 18th July, 1857, with the following indorsement, and approval by its editor:

"WILL THE SOUTH COUNTENANCE THE FRAUD?—We commend the following article from the Richmond Examiner to the earnest attention of our readers. Its statements, its reasonings, its indignant expostulations, are so eloquent and forcible that they cannot fail to impress the minds of all who read them. The more we examine this subject, the more we attend to the reasonings of others; the more we are impressed with the palpable error into which our southern friends have fallen in condemning Governor Walker and the Administration for proposing to submit the constitution of Kansas, when framed, to the people. It is a war against a principle universally acknowledged by the national Democracy to be right; it was adopted as a principle of their national platform; it was accepted, acquiesced in, and sanctioned by the southern Democracy, as well as by the Democracy of the whole country, without a dissenting voice. We fought upon it, and with every other issue connected with it we triumphed. These very southern men, aided by their spirited efforts and united voices in bringing into power a great statesman, a true friend of the South, an ardent patriot and a pure man, committed to the very principle now called in question by every act of his past life. And can it be believed, the very first moment that it is attempted to apply the principle in practice—that is, to allow the people of Kansas to adopt, by their votes, such a constitution as they may be willing to live under—many of our southern friends practically repudiate their previous acts, repudiate their resolution of the Cincinnati platform which contains the principle, and array themselves for the moment against an Administration which is only endeavoring to do its duty, and faithfully fulfill its pledges; and this, we think, is very clearly shown by the following article." (The one above read.)

In an editorial, of the same date, the editor of the Union says, in speaking of the Kansas constitution:

"If the convention shall make a constitution in the name of the people, and refuse to let their constituents pronounce upon it, we can only say that the best evidence of its authenticity is withheld."

And this was the tone of the party press here, and all over the country, until the 7th of November last, when the convention closed its labors, adopted the Lecompton constitution, refused to submit it to a vote of the people for their rejection or approval. Since that time we have had, from the organs of the Administration, and from the President of the United States, and those who profess to be his friends, all sorts of opinions, statements, and claims.

First, the convention was censured; then excuses and apologies were made; and then a complete justification for not submitting the constitution to a vote of the people; and lastly, and finally, it is claimed by the President, in a message to Congress, that the constitution was submitted to the people, in accordance and substantial compliance with his instructions to Governor Walker. When this last pretense was gravely written by the President, and read by his friends, it would not be surprising if both he and they should have exclaimed, in the celebrated language of Jack Falstaff, when caught in an unmitigated falsehood, "Lord, Lord, how this world is given to lying!"

That the constitution was submitted for adoption or rejection in substantial compliance with the provisions of the Cincinnati platform or the pledges of the President, or his instructions to Governor Walker, is wholly false; not one word of truth in it. The claim that the question of slavery or no slavery, the question of a slave or a free State, was submitted, is equally without truth—unqualifiedly false. The scandalous and contemptible mockery of submitting the shadow of the question of slavery or no slavery to the people was performed. The substance of even that single question was withheld—expressly withheld.

Why, sir, what was submitted to the people? Simply whether, in future, slaves should be imported into Kansas. The perpetuity of all the slavery then in Kansas, was provided for in the constitution in express terms, no matter which way the people voted on the question submitted.

The man who in private life would claim in his private affairs that his obligations under such circumstances, and with such compliance, were discharged, would but live to be loathed and despised as a man without honor, without truth.

The Lecompton constitution is now presented with slavery as fully recognized by it as by the constitution of any State in the Union; and the President in his message tells us "it is as much a slave State as Georgia or Alabama." That slavery exists there, either by law or by force, is emphatically true.

Such, then, is the Lecompton constitution. Is it the constitution of the people of Kansas? Is it the work, or the act and deed of that people? Does it speak their voice or reflect their will? If it is their constitution, then let it be so treated; if it is not their constitution, then let it be treated as the work, the vile work, of the infamous scoundrels who made it. What is the evidence upon this question? Those who assert it to be the constitution of the people of Kansas rely upon a series of legal inferences and presumptions. Inferential evidence will do if no positive evidence is furnished to contradict it. The assent of the people might be presumed if they were silent; but when they do speak, we must be governed by their voice; we must know what it is; we are no longer at liberty to infer their assent; they have spoken yea or nay, and we must see and know what they have said.

Now look at the evidence. A bogus Legislature ordered the convention to be elected. At the election for delegates to the convention, by the evidence of Governor Walker above referred to, it is shown that nearly half the Territory was disfranchised. He says:

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four, (the whole number in the Territory,) there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties."

Acting Governor Stanton, in his message to the Territorial Legislature, says that all the votes given at the election in June last for delegates to the Lecompton convention, only amounted to about two thousand two hundred. If they are all set down as in favor of this constitution with slavery, there were only two thousand two hundred of them, all told. At the election in October last for a Delegate to this Congress, there were two candidates; one was the slave-State candidate, the other was Mr. PARROT, the free-State candidate, and who is now a member of this House. This election was held under the laws of Congress, which all parties in the Territory recognize as valid. All parties voted, and the election was warmly contested. The majority for the free-State candidate was about five thousand.

At the election held on the 21st December, on the adoption of the Lecompton constitution the whole vote cast for the constitution, as the returns show, was only six thousand one hundred and forty-three, one half of which have since been proven to be fraudulent, and a considerable number more given by non-residents; showing the actual strength of the pro-slavery party in Kansas to be only about three thousand.

But a more conclusive vote than either of those mentioned was given on the 4th of January last, when the question of adopting or rejecting the Lecompton constitution was directly submitted to a vote of the people, and over eleven thousand votes were then cast against the constitution and against slavery. No evidence has been offered in this House to impeach the fairness of this vote.

We can, then, with perfect confidence, claim that we have positive and affirmative evidence that there is now, in truth and in fact, a majority of over eight thousand of the citizens of Kansas protesting that this is not their constitution.

There have been memorials, signed by over seven thousand residents of Kansas, sent to this Congress, remonstrating against admission under this constitution.

The Delegate on this floor, elected and sent here to represent their interest in person, remonstrates against the admission of Kansas under this constitution.

The Territorial Legislature but recently elected send here their remonstrance, and ask, what right has Congress to admit Kansas as a State into the Union against her will?

This remonstrance is in the following three resolutions:

"Resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State; and we, the representatives of said people, do hereby, in their name and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission.

"Resolved, That such action on the part of Congress would, in the judgment of the members of this Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution in its stead of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority."

"Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves."

It may well be averred that "Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State." And it may, with still greater propriety, be asked by what rightful power does Congress propose to force Kansas into the Union against her will? Why drown the voice of four-fifths of the people of Kansas, and do for her what she has not done for herself, and that is, to make a constitution for her and compel her to receive it? If this is to be done, let it be done under the name of congressional non-intervention. Let it be done by the Democratic party of this country; let it be done by the southern portion of that party; let it stand forth as the last and latest commentary upon the doctrine of "congressional non-intervention with slavery in the States and Territories."

Governor Hammond's views on this subject are brilliant and clearly expressed. He meets the question just as it is, and with manly courage disposes of it as becomes a modern Democrat. He says:

"If this was a minority constitution I do not know that that would be an objection to it. Constitutions are made for minorities. Perhaps minorities ought to have the right to make constitutions, for they are administered by majorities."

This may be very good Democracy, but it is not exactly Cincinnati-platform Democracy, so far as I understand it. Does the South now again propose to disregard wholly the will of the inhabitants of the Territories, and that Congress shall give not only laws to the Territories, but constitutions for the new States? Before this is done it might be well for gentlemen to look to the results of the next census, to the time when the race of dough-faces will be extinct, and when the power of legislation may be in the hands of non-slaveholding States, and when the examples now set may be followed to its utmost results. Sir, disguise it as you may, the plain simple proposition, divested of all its fraudulent robes and false pretenses, is whether Congress will usurp the power of making a constitution unalterable for seven years to come, and force Kansas into the Union under it?

Why, if this has been determined on, did you not divide Texas into four or five more States, bring up New Mexico as another, and have Nebraska and Arizona all organized as slave States with constitutions unalterable for twenty years to come, and admit them all together? This might be done, and not one half the evidence to prove the fraud that now stares us in the face in relation to Kansas. And could not a few more Calhouns have been found to distribute over these Territories, ready and willing to make these new States with constitutions to order?

Does any member of the Administration party in this House doubt what the people of Kansas would do if left to themselves "perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?" Then let him vote with us to send this question back to the people for their free choice of a constitution for themselves. Will any member of this House refuse, and for what reason will he refuse? Will it not be for the same reason that the Lecompton convention refused to submit the question to the people, and that was, that this rascality would, in that event, be defeated? The result will be left in no uncertainty. I desire to see Kansas a free State; my constituents desire it, and I am bound to use all fair means in my power to accomplish it; I will go for results regardless of words or forms. I cannot now here, by my own vote, make her a free State. I will delegate the power to her as my agent, and she will have both the power and the will to do it. She has battled with this question of slavery for four years, against border ruffians, southern cat-throats, against the oppressions and wrongs of a ruthless Administration against all odds. Her honor and her interests are all at hazard, and she has a greater and stronger interest in the question than I have. The friends of freedom there have suffered everything but martyrdom, and some have suffered even that. Then why not trust them?

A Democrat cloaked by his name and professions of bowing at all times to the people's will, and of leaving them "perfectly free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," may refuse, but those who do not wear this name and the cloak which this name gives, are compelled to wear the substance and maintain the cause of popular freedom. Unfortunately for the honor of this country the history of Kansas is written and it cannot now be blotted out. Every step in its onward march, from the date of the organization of the Territory until this day, is a step marked, and that step may now be traced by a fraud, a forgery, a wrong, a robbery, a plunder, a violence, a murder, an assassination—a people ruled by oppression, overawed by bayonets; houses plundered and burnt, towns sacked, peaceable citizens driven from the Territory; the roads, rivers, and avenues leading to the Territory blocked up, emigrants turned back, and leave to enter the Territory refused; and all this done and suffered by the connivance of the past and present Administrations. The picture would not be complete without this crowning act of infamous injustice, of forcing upon them a slavery constitution, by first making the people themselves slaves.

No gentleman can shut his eyes to the great question of political power lying at the bottom of this great effort to make Kansas a slave State. Look at a few passages in the speech of Governor Hammond. He says:

"The Senator from New York says that that is about to be at an end; that you intend to take the Government from us; that it will pass from our hands. Perhaps what he says is true; it may be, but do not forget—it can never be forgotten; it is written on the brightest page of human history—that we, the slaveholders of the South, took our country in infancy, and after ruling her for sixty years out of the seventy years of her existence, we shall surrender her to you without a stain upon her honor, and boundless in prosperity, inculcable in her strength, the wonder and the admiration of the world. Time will show what you will make of her, but no time can ever diminish our glory or your responsibility."

Again, he says:

"But what guarantee have we, when you have this Government in your possession in all its departments, even if we submit quietly to what the Senator exhorts us to submit to—the concentration of slavery in its present territory, and even to the reconstruction of the Supreme Court—that you will not plunder us with tariffs, that you will not bankrupt us with internal improvements?"

Yes, sir, it is very plain that the Government must remain in the hands of the slaveholders, or if we take it we must give security for our good behavior. It may be we will give them that security; the whole sum and substance of which is, that the South shall be allowed to make as many more slave States as may be necessary, at all times, to maintain the control of the Government in the hands of the slaveholders. This is to be done regardless of population. The States must be made, population or no population. The slave States now have only one third part of the population of the nation; but their equality must be maintained in the Senate, where the slaveholders are to exercise a veto power upon the legislation of the country—a veto upon all the appointments and patronage of the country. This is modest, and most decidedly cool. We, the slaveholders, he says, have ruled you for sixty years. They who constitute one fortieth part of the population of this country shall have their power perpetuated. This may be Democracy. If it is, I know it is not so written in their platform; and were it not historically true in the past, and had it not been so often and continually claimed for the future, it might be ascribed to the ravings of a madman.

I regret to hear any anti-Lecompton Democrat complain of being read out of the party for his course on the Kansas question. It should be remembered that at no time during the last or present Administrations has any Democrat been allowed to set up his own judgment, his honor, or his conscience, against the wishes of the President or the party on Kansas affairs. Have not offenses of this kind been uniformly punished by dismissal from office and exclusion from the ranks of the party? Was it not for such offenses that the first, second, and third Governors of Kansas were removed—Reeder, Shannon, Geary, all read out of the party? Yes; it was for honorable adherence to the instructions of the President that Walker and Stanton were forced out of office. The President himself came very near being read out of the party for instructing Walker to use his influence to cause the Lecompton constitution to be submitted to a vote of the people. But the President silenced his scruples of conscience, if he had any; obsequiously asked pardon, forced Walker and Stanton out of office, and restored himself to favor; and having done so himself, expects all others to follow the example.

Let it be remembered by the people of this country, that, while men are every day read out of their party for refusing to do its dirty work, and for honorable, manly, and independent opposition to the despotism of party desperation, there is no example of any man, high or low, being read out of his party for loathsome and sycophantic subserviency.

I have referred to the pledges of the Democratic party, as a party, to the claim set up of having inaugurated a new territorial policy far more liberal than any ever before offered to the people of this country; to the pledges and claims of its newspaper press; to the speeches of its leading men; the inaugural address of the Chief Magistrate, and to his official correspondence with Governor Walker. These pledges now all broken, trodden under foot and despised; and this proposition, (to admit as it is pretended,) but in fact, to force Kansas against her will into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, with slavery provided for and perpetuated by it, deserves to be met, not with argument, but with denunciation; and denunciation in language far more harsh and severe than the usages and proprieties of this Hall will permit. To call it a fraud, a cheat, a conspiracy against popular rights, fails to do justice to the subject or to characterize the outrage.

We have been told by at least twenty southern gentlemen here in this House of Representatives, that if we Republicans will not agree to admit Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, that, well and dearly as they always have and still do, and as the South always has loved and cherished the Union, they will feel compelled to advise the South to withdraw from the Union and defend their rights to the last extremity. Will they go home and hold another southern Hartford convention? And why is this folly to be perpetrated, and why is it threatened? For no other reason, in fact, than that the Republican Representatives, and a few of the free-State Democrats in this Hall, will not compel Kansas to come into the Union with a slavery constitution, while four fifths of her people are opposed to it. And these gentlemen constitute the choice spirits of the southern Democracy. They are the Union savers—the national men—the deadly enemies of sectionalism. They are the patriots of this country. Whether this patriotism is of that quality which has been defined to be "the last refuge of a scoundrel" or not, I leave the country to decide.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. L. UNDERWOOD, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I rise to essay no effort at elocution, nor any extended observations upon the vexed question of Kansas. Contemplating that question from a point of view differing from that of most if not all others that have addressed you, entertaining in regard to it opinions that have not yet found expression, duty to myself demands that I should announce the reasons that shall control my action.

To those who know me at home I shall have no occasion to defend myself against any charge of intentional infidelity to the South and her cherished institutions. From the dawn of my humble political career until now, they have had no more devoted friend than I. Born in a slave State, having lived in one all my life, a large owner of slaves, and representing one of the largest slave districts in the Union, it would be nothing short of impossibility for me to become faithless to its real interests. I have heretofore expressed my opinions on this floor with sufficient fullness upon the subject of the relations of master and slave. I will not repeat them. It is sufficient for me to say, that I honestly regard them as the best possible relations which can exist between two dissimilar and unequal races of men thrown together upon the same territory; and that every attempt to create other relations than these, whilst the two races thus coexist, has thus far only deepened the degradation and misery of the black race. I should, therefore, instead of circumscribing slavery, be perfectly willing to see it extended, with the consent of those immediately interested, to the remotest confines of the Republic. It is not, then, because, in any possible form, I am opposed to slavery, that I am opposed to the Lecompton constitution for Kansas. Indeed, rather, it is because I am the friend and advocate of the peculiar institutions of the South that I am in part constrained to object to that constitution.

Mr. Chairman, there are new theories of government and motives of action presented by the advocates of the Lecompton constitution that cannot fail to grate harshly on southern ears: First, in order to induce our assent to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution—which constitution provides that “after the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution,” they shall proceed to do so according to certain salutary precautions and methods prescribed in the instrument—it is now contended that this fundamental provision may be disregarded, and that steps may be immediately taken to abolish it so soon as Kansas is admitted under it. The people of the United States have heretofore been taught to regard constitutions as the sacred repositories of their dearest rights; as removed, by the solemnities by which they have been inaugurated, from the flippancies of change; and as constituting the bulwarks upon which they might repose in the security of established order. But now, for the purpose of making room for this new comer, all these established theories of government are forsaken, and pass away as the baseless fabric of a dream. A new light dawns upon the political sky, and anarchy is organized. Constitutions, which were intended heretofore for the protection of minorities, lose their power. Majorities, we are told, at their pleasure, may cast them down, and riot on the rights which constitutions were intended to preserve inviolate. The distinction heretofore so well understood and recognized between a legislative act and a constitutional provision is no more, and the only step which remains to be taken, since the all-prevailing voice of mere numbers is enshrined, is to declare that this voice need not even proclaim its edicts in written laws, but has only, in the fury of the mob, to issue its mandates and execute them. Strangest to me of all this is, that this wild doctrine finds countenance with my southern friends, interested, like me, in preserving and maintaining to the last our southern rights and our southern property. Why, sir, with such governmental policy as this, not only will the general prosperity sicken—for all the interests of society must sicken with the instability of government—but the peculiar institutions of the South must die. Let me read you what is already said by a Black Republican organ, the Chicago Tribune, on this subject:

“It is now said that the act admitting Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, will contain a clause declaring that the people of the new State may amend their constitution at any time they please, though in doing so they violate a plain and emphatic provision of the constitution itself. With this powerful overhead constitutional barrier, recognized by solemn act of Congress, we shall be disposed to abate our opposition to Lecompton and help it along; but with this express understanding, that the rule laid down for Kansas shall be applied to the Constitution of the United States; and that when a majority of the legal voters of the Republic choose to demand an amendment of the fundamental law, the mode of amendment prescribed in the Constitution shall not stand in the way of the attainment of their will.”

Mr. Chairman, I enter my solemn protest against this suicidal doctrine. Kansas, with her Lecompton constitution, brings with her no benefits to any part of our common country which would compensate a solitary State for the damning tendency of such a dogma. And if it shall be inaugurated into the political theories of the times by the present Administration, I shall preserve the proud consciousness of saying that it was by no act of mine you did it, and, therefore,

“Shake not your gory locks at me.”

But it may possibly be said (I hardly think that any candid man will venture to say it) that this principle, touching the right of the majority to override the terms and forms of the constitution by amendments, alterations, or abrogations, in violation of those terms, is not contained in the act passed by the Senate. Mr. Chairman, it is there, and, I grieve to say, insidiously there. If it is to be there at all, put it in like a man. Speak it out like a freeman. Let us have no quibbling about it. But it is there plain enough. The honorable Senator [Mr. Pugh] proposed in plain, direct terms to insert it. His amendment was withdrawn by himself, because, as he said, its substance was embodied in the bill as it now stands; and it was thus withdrawn to make room for the more insidious and entrapping provisions now contained in the bill, to wit:

“That nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people, asserted in the constitution of Kansas, at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper.”

Why was this clause inserted? Does anybody suppose that, if Kansas should become a State, she would thereafter be dependent on Congress for her right “to reform or abolish her form of government in such manner as she thought proper?” Certainly not. For what purpose, then, was this formal disclaimer of a power or right of Congress to do that which no one ever supposed before Congress had the power to do, asserted in this bill? It was, Mr. Chairman, a negative pregnant of most affirmative meaning. It is a direct intervention by Congress in the affairs of Kansas, in violation of your cry of non-intervention. Your President, sir, had, in a labored argument, in his Kansas message, announced the doctrine that

“A majority can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure. It would be absurd to say they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove.”

If, therefore, the provision changing the Kansas constitution after the year 1864 could, by possibility, be construed into a prohibition to make such a change previous to that period, this prohibition would be wholly unavailing. The Legislature already elected may, at its very first session, submit the question to a vote of the people, whether they will or will not have a convention to amend their constitution, and adopt all necessary means for giving effect to the popular will.”

It was necessary, therefore, to insert these provisions in the bill; but lest an outspoken expression of them should justly offend the public ear, and justly alarm the settled and conservative elements of society, they have been couched in the covert and ambiguous phrase quoted in the law. But they will not the less confidently be appealed to as the expression of the legal right, in the Abolition portion of the people of Kansas, to abolish the few remnants of slavery that exist in that devoted Territory on the instant, should Kansas be admitted under the Lecompton constitution. And then will come, sir, in the event Kansas is thus admitted into the Union with her Lecompton constitution, under the provisions of this act of admission, one of those struggles, weak and feeble, perhaps, it may be, compared with others, which I yet contemplate in her eventful history, a struggle in which her peace may be seriously jeopardized, and the rights of the slaveholder—rights which I feel it my duty here to forewarn, if I cannot forewarn—will inevitably be sacrificed.

According to the programme thus suggested by the President, and significantly and obsequiously intimated to Kansas by the Senate bill, a new constitution will be adopted prior to 1864, in disregard of the Lecompton constitution. It will abolish slavery; the slaveholders in Kansas will assert their rights under the Lecompton constitution, wrongfully overturned, in violation of the provisions for its own amendment; and I do not hesitate to declare my opinion that there is not an enlightened jurist in America but will recognize their claim. That agitation, bitterness, and strife will result, even from this comparatively minor conflict, no one can doubt; and, I ask, is it the part of statesmanship thus to legislate in blind disregard of such inevitable consequences?

Mr. Chairman, the great excellency of American liberty is, that it is the liberty of law. The President, in the principles which I have thus deduced from his Kansas message, proclaims the European idea of liberty, which is the liberty of license. The one is peaceful, the other rebellious. He attempts to fortify his specious conclusions by a reference to those grand fundamental principles of human liberty which underlie all free governments, and which, in proper cases, are the last resorts of nations. No people so well as ours know the right of revolution, and none, thank God, in a most righteous cause, God being our helper, have asserted it so triumphantly. I trust, however, that no legislative or political necessity will ever compel any portion of our beloved country again to resort to this terrible arbitrament. And if I had no other reason for voting against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I should be justified in doing so in order to avoid the dread expedient approximating revolution, to which the President refers the people of Kansas, whereby to extricate themselves from the difficulty in which his policy has involved them, by a change of their constitution, regardless of the forms and methods prescribed in the constitution itself.

The second of the motives which are urged upon us is, that it is the shortest way to make Kansas a free State. The President, in his Kansas message, after correctly stating that Kansas is now a slave Territory, tells us, in this remarkable language:

“Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas except by means of a constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be obtained so promptly, if a majority of the people desire it, as by admitting it into the Union under its present constitution.”

Mr. Chairman, when I consider this opinion of the President, in connection with the means he suggests of effecting the object of making Kansas a free State, to wit: by the unauthorized alteration of her constitution in the manner I have stated, I cannot forbear the expression of my surprise at the support which his purpose and his policy receive at the hands of the South. For myself, I am free to declare that I am not anxious to pursue that path which shall most promptly admit Kansas into the Union as a free State; not that I would throw obstacles in the way of the admission of a State, whether slave or free, into the Union, when justly entitled to come in; but when I consider how rapidly the number of free States has increased and is increasing; that the safe equality that so long existed between the free and slave States has passed away, giving place to an existing preponderance in favor of the former, to be augmented by other free States pressing at our doors for admission; more than this, when I consider who are likely to come, as the Senators of Kansas, to take their places here—Lane and Robinson, perhaps reeking with bitterness and wrath against the institutions of the South, from the fierce conflicts and raids in which so long and recently they have been engaged—I confess to no indecent haste for the admission of Kansas; and the last thing, I think, that ever I shall be guilty of doing will be to dissolve the Union of these States because she is not admitted “so promptly to swell the tide of political ascendency that beats already so heavily against the South.”

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would invite your attention to a most singular fact—singular, indeed, it would be if it did not recur in every phase of Democratic policy and tactics. It is the rare and singular facility—I should rather call it craft—of the Democratic party to give to all their measures a northern and a southern aspect. In no instance have they succeeded so well, I ween, as in this. They did apprentice work in the repeal of the Missouri compromise, when they declared in the North it was a measure of freedom, and in the South that it was the unlocking of the Territories for the expansion of slavery. They did journeymen’s work in their divers interpretations of squatter sovereignty, suited to all latitudes and localities; and they are doing master work now, when this very measure of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution is advocated by the President and his northern supporters as the “promptest” manner of prohibiting slavery in that State, whilst their southern brethren are advocating it, and are ready to split the Union about it, because it recognizes slavery north of 36° 30’; albeit it shows its head there for a moment, and disappears thenceforth forever.

You are too familiar with the bold and ardent declarations of my southern friends to require me to cite instances to prove the burning zeal with which they contemplate and advocate admission under the Lecompton constitution. It will be more novel, and not less instructive, that I quote to you what John Van Buren, the most sagacious of the Democratic Abolitionists of the North, declares on the same subject. In his celebrated speech at Tammany Hall, he says:

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Underwood.

Ho. OF REPS.

"By admitting Kansas into the Union, you put her in a condition where she can cure all this evil—stop fraud, and make herself a free State; and those men from the free States who refuse this opportunity to admit Kansas with this population and their disposition to make the State free, and who would keep her out as a slave State, as she now is, until the population is thrown there to make her permanently a slave State, will have to answer to their constituents for the result they have thus produced."

And this sentiment, we are told, was received with "applause" by the vast Democratic audience assembled to hear him. Why, Mr. Chairman, John Van Buren did not announce a new Democratic policy at the North. Let me read to you from a handbill for a Democratic meeting at Mifflinsburg, Pennsylvania, September, 1856:

"Democrats! Whigs! Republicans! turn out and learn the fact that it is the Democratic party that is laboring for freedom for Kansas, the assertion of opposition orators to the contrary notwithstanding."

I could quote from Dix and other orators of this political school, but I forbear. I however affirm that the northern Democratic advocates of the Lecompton constitution all maintain this view, contending that it is another measure for freedom. Should not these bold contrasts, then, teach forbearance to our extreme southern friends? especially when they were told the other day on this floor, by one of their northern allies, that the North got the oyster whilst the South got the shell, in this division of the spoils. Are they not at least sufficient to silence the cry of "Abolitionism," which, I doubt not, is preparing to be raised throughout the South against all those who shall dare to resist this measure, so really destructive of every principle the South should hold sacred and inviolate? But, Mr. Chairman, more than this, is it not time for us to have a straightforward and honest policy? Have we not been paltered with long enough in a double sense? How much longer will the South, or the North either, suffer itself to be deluded thus with fallacious hopes, having the word of promise kept to the ear but broken to the hope? For myself, I am weary of the Janus face and the forked tongue.

I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to invite your attention to the questions: first, is the Lecompton constitution of such legal validity and force as to claim adoption from its inherent legality? and, second, if legal in form, are there not facts connected with it that render it invalid? And, first, as to its legality.

I shall not go back to inquire into the validity of the Territorial Legislatures of Kansas. I shall take them for granted, for all the purposes of my argument, however great and grating may have been the improprieties practiced in the earlier elections under the territorial law. Nevertheless, those Legislatures have been recognized, and must be considered the legislative branch of the de facto government of Kansas; and I shall concede to them the right to exercise all powers delegated to them by the authority which created them, to wit: the Kansas-Nebraska act. It will not be contended that the Legislature of a Territory can exercise, like the Legislature of a State, any independent, sovereign powers. The Legislature of a Territory is but the creature of the law establishing the Territory, and has no power to step beyond it. It then becomes material to inquire what powers did Congress confer upon the Kansas Legislature? The language of the act is: "That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and this act." I would venture an original argument upon the nature and extent of this qualified and limited legislative power, if argument upon it had not long ago been merged in authority, and that authority so high with those to whom I would commend it, that nothing is wanting to give it absolute command. Upon the admission of Arkansas, during the administration of President Jackson, the question arose, how far the Territorial Legislature was competent to inaugurate the preliminary measures to cast off its territorial existence, and to prepare to assume the attitude of a State. This question was submitted to his Attorney General, Mr. Butler, who used the following language:

"To suppose that the legislative powers granted to the General Assembly include the authority to abrogate, alter, or modify the territorial government established by the act of Congress, and of which the Assembly is a constituent part, would be manifestly absurd. The act of Congress, so far as it is consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and with the treaty by which the Territory, as a part of Louisiana, was ceded to the United States, is the supreme law of the Territory; it is paramount to the power of the Territorial Legislature, and can only be revoked or altered by the authority from which it emanated. The General Assembly and the people of the Territory are as much bound by its provisions, and as incapable of abrogating them, as the Legislatures and people of the American States are bound by and incapable of abrogating the Constitution of the United States. It is also a maxim of universal law, that when a particular thing is prohibited by law, all means, attempts, or contrivances to effect such a thing, are also prohibited. Consequently, it is not in the power of the General Assembly of Arkansas to pass any law for the purpose of electing members to form a constitution and State government, nor to do any other act, directly or indirectly, to create such new government. Every such law, even though it were approved by the Governor of the Territory, would be null and void. If passed by them, notwithstanding his veto, by a vote of two thirds of each branch, it would still be equally void."

This was the ground taken by the Administration of General Jackson in regard to Arkansas; and the position is an unanswerable one. Any law passed by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas—which possessed no greater authority than the Territorial Legislature of Arkansas—inaugurating a convention, is utterly null and void.

In addition to this, I present you the authority of Mr. Buchanan, the present distinguished Chief Magistrate of the United States, whose early counsels are so worthy of the consideration of his later years; and who, upon the occasion of the admission of Michigan, expressed himself in the following emphatic language:

"We ought not to apply the rigid rules of abstract political science too rigorously to such cases. It has been our practice heretofore to treat our infant Territories with parental care, and to nurse them with kindness, and when they had attained the age of manhood, to admit them into the family without requiring from them a rigid adherence to forms. The great questions to be decided are: Do they contain a sufficient population? Have they adopted a republican constitution? And are they willing to enter the Union upon the terms which we propose? If so, all the preliminary proceedings have been considered but mere forms, which we have waived in repeated instances. They are but the scaffolding of the building, which is of no further use after the edifice is complete. We have pursued this course in regard to Tennessee, to Arkansas, and even to Michigan. No Senator will pretend that their Territorial Legislatures had any right whatever to pass laws enabling the people to elect delegates to a convention for the purpose of forming a State constitution. It was an act of usurpation on their part."

And on the same subject, Mr. Calhoun, the brightest constitutional luminary of all, used the following brief but emphatic words:

"My opinion is, and ever was, that the proceeding of the people of Michigan, in taking the first steps to form a State constitution without waiting for the assent of Congress, was revolutionary."

If these quotations fail to convince, then, so far as my Democratic auditors extend, they would not be convinced though one rose from the dead. But, to obviate these high authorities and these unanswerable arguments, it is now stated that the Kansas-Nebraska act is itself an enabling act, dispensing with all others. Unfortunately for those who affirm this, it proves too much for them. That act, it is true, "leaves the people perfectly free to form their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution." Prior to it the people had been restrained in this "perfect freedom" by the provisions of the Missouri compromise line, which prohibited slavery north of 36° 30' north latitude; and this provision was intended merely to apply to the condition and privileges of the people when, subsequent to the repeal of this line, they should come legally to form their domestic institutions in their own way, and was not intended to confer upon them any new powers or privileges, contrary to the consent of Congress, whereby they might at pleasure cast off their territorial allegiance. If such be not the true interpretation of this clause; if it conferred upon the people of the Territory the inherent right at any time they pleased to form a constitution and claim admission absolutely under it; how can we resist the application of those who formed the justly and universally repudiated Topeka constitution for admission under it into the Union of these States? Their constitution is first in point of time; and it will be observed that it is not the Legislature of the Territory, but the "people of the Territory," that are left "perfectly free to form their own domestic institutions in their own way," and hence, upon this hypothesis and language of the law, you need not apply for an enabling act, even from the Territorial Legislature, because that language does not confer the power upon the Legislature, but confers it "on the people," and the high prerogative of making a constitution is not a legislative function. Besides, if the Kansas-Nebraska act enabled the Legislature of Kansas to call a constitutional convention, why did President Pierce recommend, and why did the Democratic Senate under his administration, with a singular unanimity, pass an act authorizing Kansas to call a convention?

Without pursuing this argument further, I conclude, from the high authorities cited, and from the reasons already adduced, first, that the Legislature of Kansas was not competent to commit an act of political suicide, and to subvert and overturn the very power of which they were but constituted the keepers, guardians, and preservers, by the Congress of the United States; and second, that the Kansas territorial law was in no sense an act which enabled its Legislature thus to subvert the territorial existence at its pleasure.

It follows, then, that the Lecompton constitution is not an imperative legality; that it cannot challenge and demand our implicit and unquestioning submission, because it comes accredited to us by all the regularities and forms of law. But losing these high pretensions, which are all the title that it brings, it loses all. For, unless it can be sustained upon the ground of legitimacy, it has no other foundation to sustain it.

Mr. Chairman, let it not be inferred from anything I have said that I hold it illegal or rebellious for a Territorial Legislature to institute preliminary proceedings in order to bring about the transition from a territorial to a State condition. All I wish to establish is that their proceedings bind not the Government of the United States, or render it in any sense imperative upon such Government to admit such Territory into the Union as a State, merely because the Territorial Legislature have gone regularly through the formalities it may have instituted. The power of the United States, and the duty of the United States, stand untouched and unaffected by these subordinate territorial formalities, except so far as they may address themselves to the Congress of the United States as matter of petition, deserving its favorable consideration from their inherent merit, and not from their inherent legality.

2. If the Lecompton constitution be legal in form, are there not facts connected with it that render it invalid in fact? Mr. Chairman, this field of argument has been perfectly exhausted. Let me add but a few words to what has been so much better said by so many others. And let me premise that the Congress of the United States is under no stress, or legal or political necessity, to admit new States into this Confederacy. Neither Kansas, nor any other Territory, can demand as a right, admission into this Union; although she may have formed a republican constitution, and although every man, woman, and child within her borders desired it, yet the right and the power to admit or not to admit, according to its own will or pleasure, rests alone in the Congress of the United States.

This high power and unlimited discretion is expressed in the Constitution of the United States in the simple words, "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." In the exercise of this high prerogative, perhaps the most morally grand of any which our current history exhibits, the Congress has the right, and it is its duty, to look with the utmost scrutiny and caution upon every fact, circumstance, and condition which bears upon the prudence, fitness, and propriety of the permanent relations it is about to establish between the new comer into the Confederacy and the old; and if there be any time and any act which, above all others, should demand the exercise of the utmost good faith, forbearance, and honesty, it is this. I do not hesitate to declare that, if new States are to be precipitated into this Confederacy contrary to the consent of a material portion of the old ones, and above all, with constitutions contrary to the ascertained will of a material portion of the citizens of such new State, then are the sappers and miners at work beneath the foundations of the Republic, and the enemy to its perpetuation has entered within its walls.

Mr. Chairman, if we could for a moment relieve ourselves of all party bias and excitements, we should find the facts pertaining to the Kansas question to be few and simple. A portion of its people are in favor of a constitution with slavery, another portion are in favor of a constitution without it. For years they have been waging a disreputable contest, disturbing the quiet and repose of the Union, and seeking political advantages of each other. Both of these parties have made themselves a constitution—one at Topeka, relying for its support upon your naked doctrine of popular sovereignty; the other at Lecompton, relying upon popular sovereignty indorsed by legislative intervention, without congressional sanction. The latter is much the better, I think, of the two, but both bad. Each party has endeavored, as far as possible, to ignore the other, and to refrain from a recognition of the legal validity of its acts. The free-State party believed it was outraged and trodden down by an invasion from Missouri, which gave despotic character to the Legislature, inasmuch as it was elected, not by the people of the Territory, but by alleged invaders, and hence, thereafter, it abstained from participating in elections authorized by this Legislature. Whilst the slave-State party denied the extent of the force and violence charged by their opponents, and justified themselves by the charge that emigrant aid societies had thrown upon Kansas, for the purpose of controlling its domestic institutions, a population as spurious as any introduced from adjacent States.

Thus waged the war until delegates were authorized to be chosen by the Territorial Legislature to form a constitution preparatory to the admission of Kansas into the Union. From this point onward we have a right, and it is our duty, to look, in order to ascertain what it is proper for us to do. Delegates, under the law, were to be apportioned among the thirty-four counties of the Territory according to their population, to be ascertained by a census directed to be taken. This was fair and right, and ought to have been done; but, if we may believe the very highest authorities on this subject, it was not done, and by reason of the failure, nearly one half of the counties of the Territory were denied any representation in the convention that formed the constitution under which they were to live. Hear what Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton say on this subject. Governor Walker, in his letter to General Cass, of the 15th December, 1857, says:

"In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates, based upon such census; and in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention."

"In fifteen counties out of the thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any of these counties."

Governor Stanton, in corroboration of this statement, in his address to the people of the United States, says:

"The registration required by law had been imperfect in all the counties, and had been wholly omitted in one half of them; nor could the people of the disfranchised counties vote in any adjacent county, as has been falsely suggested."

I could multiply proofs on this subject, but it is unnecessary. These are sufficient, except to those determined not to believe. It is true that many of the free-State party refused to vote for delegates to form the constitution. They professed to believe, and perhaps did believe, they would be defrauded out of their votes by their opponents, who had complete control of all the machinery by which the elections were to be conducted; and they were unwilling, as before stated, by voting at an election authorized by what they denominated the bogus Legislature, to recognize the validity of its acts. I am not their advocate or defender. I think in all this they did wrong; and the other side were wrong in not taking the census and registration as far as practicable, to give to all the right and unquestionable American privilege of being represented in the body which was to ordain their highest law. The free-State party in some of the counties made an attempt to elect delegates to the convention, notwithstanding the failure to take the census and registration. Their delegates were rejected. I will not dwell on these things. One fact of importance, during the progress of this election, occurred. It was the unequivocal, clear, distinct, and absolute promise of the Governor, in his own name, and in the name of the President of the United States; it was the promise of his Secretary, Mr. Stanton; it was the promise of Mr. Calhoun and many of his associates, that the constitution, when formed by the convention, should be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection.

Governor Walker, everywhere in Kansas, pledged his honor, by the approval, as he told the people, of the President and his Cabinet, that the constitution should be submitted. Without stopping to refer to his inaugural, in which he is most emphatic on this point, I read from a speech of his, delivered at Topeka, on the 8th of June, 1857, and published in the Topeka Statesman of the 9th:

"At the next election, in October, when you elect the Territorial Legislature, you can repeal these laws; and you can also, by a majority of your own votes, adopt or reject the constitution, presented for your consideration, next fall. Can you not peaceably decide this question in the mode pointed out by act of Congress, if you, as you can and will, have a full opportunity of recording your vote? [A voice. 'How are we to get it?'] You will get it by the convention submitting the constitution to the vote of the whole people. [A voice. 'Who is to elect the convention? That is the grand question?'] Gentlemen, it is a comparatively small point by whom the constitution is submitted. Do not let us run away after shadows. The great substantial point is this: Will the whole people of Kansas next fall, by a fair election, impartially and fairly conducted by impartial judges, have an opportunity to decide for themselves what shall be their form of government, and what shall be their social institutions? I say they will; but I go a step further. [A voice. 'Have you the power?'] If I have not the power to bring it about, if the convention will not do it, I will join you in lawful opposition to their proceedings. [Cries of 'Good!'] 'Good! 'We hold you to your promise. Nothing can be asked fairer than that?'"

This, with me, is high matter of substance. Here you see a people, jealous of their rights, holding earnest question with their Governor, and receiving from him solemn answer, touching those important rights upon which we are acting now; and in consideration of his solemn pledge that the constitution should be fairly submitted to them, yielding it up indifferently to be formed by these who might be selected to do it, yet relying upon their own ultimate right to pass judgment upon it in the last resort. Shall we obtain the benefits of their non-action, without complying with the conditions upon which it was procured? Shall we, in any sense, fail to comply with the solemn assurances thus given? It will not do to say that Governor Walker had no authority to make these assurances. That he had the authority of the President there is no doubt. He states it, and it is not denied. Whether he had authority or not, the confiding people believed he had; and it would be inconsistent with all my notions of propriety and honor to take advantage of their ignorance or credulity to wring from them advantages which they at least held sacred. I cannot—I will not do it.

How the constitution was submitted, Mr. Chairman, we all know. The slavery clause was only submitted; and, strange to tell, you could not vote against the slavery clause without swearing to support the constitution with slavery. An act like that needs no comment. I am a slaveholder and a friend of slavery; but, thank God, slavery needs no instrumentality like that for its extension; and its most dangerous adversaries are those who would identify it with violations of personal propriety and honor, and especially with an outrage upon the unquestioned American right of the people, when forming a constitution, to say whether it shall exist with them or not. When the slavery clause of the constitution was submitted, some six thousand two hundred and twenty-six are reported to have voted for it, of which subsequent investigations have shown two thousand seven hundred and twenty were fraudulent; five hundred and sixty-nine votes were cast in favor of the constitution without slavery; thus leaving only two thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven votes in favor of the constitution with slavery. So great was the excitement of the people of Kansas at the events I have thus detailed, that we are informed by Governor Stanton that they were almost on the point of civil war, which was only prevented by his convening the Legislature.

In the hope (which proved successful) of restoring peace, a law was passed taking the sense of the entire people for and against the constitution, abolishing all test oaths, and leaving all free to vote just as they pleased. The result of that election was that ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six persons voted against the constitution. The friends of the Lecompton constitution did not vote. This election was held on the 4th of January, 1858.

Mr. PEYTON. I ask my colleague whether he believes that the ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six votes cast on the 4th of January were all bona fide legal voters?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state, in all frankness, that it is my opinion—mere guesswork, of course—that it is highly probable they were not. I will say, however, in all candor to my colleague, whose interruption is agreeable, or certainly not embarrassing to me, that there is no proof that any of that vote was fraudulent or illegal, and that all concurrent testimony agrees in proving that three-fourths, or more, of the inhabitants of Kansas are inimical to the constitution.

Mr. PEYTON. I would like to know from my colleague how he arrives at that conclusion?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am gratified at the opportunity of saying to my friend that I arrive at it from various sources of information—authentic sources which are open both to him and myself—and from private statements from gentlemen of the highest respectability cognizant of the facts. It is the uniform report coming to us from Kansas, that there is a decided, an unqualified, and almost unmitigated disinclination on the part of the people to accept the Lecompton constitution. I trust my friend is answered. And now I ask him whether he would force any constitution or form of government upon any people against their will?

Mr. PEYTON. I will reply to my colleague very frankly and very candidly, that I would not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I knew, sir, that there was a Kentucky spirit beating in my friend's bosom which would keep him from such a course.

Mr. PEYTON. Will my friend permit me to state my own position in regard to this matter?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope my colleague will not exhaust too much of my time.

Mr. PEYTON. I ask him whether, in all State, county, and presidential elections, it is not well known that there are more or less improper fraudulent votes polled? That there have been fraudulent votes polled in Kansas I have but little doubt; and I have as little doubt that in any election, from the first authorizing of the convention down to the final ratification, there have been votes enough withheld to have changed the result. My colleague says that if the fraudulent votes on the ratification of the constitution were thrown out, there would be only twenty-seven hundred votes left. Well, that may be so; but then those who did not go to the polls authorized those who did to vote for them, and this left a clear majority of twenty-seven hundred votes in favor of the constitution. Now, I ask my friend if he thinks that the votes cast on the 4th of January were all legal? I say, that out of the ten thousand two hundred votes cast on that day against the Lecompton constitution, nine thousand six hundred were polled in those registered counties where the pro-slavery party had cast six thousand votes in favor of the constitution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In regard to the legality of that election, my friend will bear me witness that I have, at least, endeavored to establish the proposition that these elections were not of such a character as to demand of the people to come to the polls, and hence, that his position does not apply, that those who stay away from the election authorize those who go to vote for them. My friend asks me in regard to the nine thousand six hundred votes cast in the counties which had already given six thousand majority in favor of the constitution; and I ask him if he will venture to say, on his integrity as a gentleman, and a statesman well informed on this subject, that he believes that the Lecompton constitution is the will and voice of the majority of the people of Kansas? I speak merely of the question of numbers, not of the question of legality, because I have disposed of that.

Mr. PEYTON. I shall answer your question fairly and properly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know you will.

Mr. PEYTON. The remark which I made in regard to the nine thousand six hundred votes was for the purpose of calling my colleague's attention to this fact, that out of the ten thousand two hundred and fifty votes polled on the 4th of January, nine thousand six hundred votes were polled in registered counties where six thousand votes had been polled in favor of the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I only asked you your opinion, whether you believe the Lecompton constitution was the will and voice of the majority of the people of Kansas, and whether the votes in its favor were fraudulent or not?

Mr. PEYTON. That is my opinion. I frankly tell you now that I do not know who has the majority. The list received is sufficient to satisfy me that the contest is a close one, and I have no idea that the anti-Lecomptonites have such an overwhelming majority as they claim.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. While my friend may thus remain in doubt, the authentic documents produced before the Congress of the United States, and which have been heretofore adverted to by many a speaker, satisfy my mind, and remove all doubt as to what the will of the people of Kansas is in respect to that constitution; and that is, that they are preëminently against the Lecompton constitution.

Thus stand the facts; and the naked question is, shall we admit Kansas into the Union at the instance and request of two thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven of her people, or shall we not admit her at the like instance and request of ten thousand two hundred and twenty-six? If figures could decide it, it seems to me easy of solution. If the sublime truths which underlie the American Republics, whereby majorities govern in their organic laws, it seems to me the question is easy of solution. But we are told that the vote on the 4th of January came too late. Too late for what? Too late to tell us what the people of Kansas willed? Certainly not.

But we are told that it was irregular and revolutionary for them to have expressed their will in any other form, or at any other time, than in the form and manner directed in the Lecompton constitution itself. That is remarkable; for it gives to the Lecompton constitution validity before it assumes to possess it—makes it the law before it is accepted by Congress; and assumes for the people of a Territory, in their colonial or dependent condition, the power, whenever they see proper, to call a convention, to make absolute laws, supplanting, by their own mere force, the preëxisting authority exercised by the Territorial Legislature established by Congress, and without the consent of Congress. But, again, is not this still more remarkable, as coming from those same Lecomptonites who contend, even after their constitution has successfully passed through all the forms of law, been ratified by the people, and approved by Congress, that immediately thereafter the people may disregard all its provisions in regard to its alteration or amendment, and change, alter, or abolish it at pleasure; and yet, before the constitution is established, while it is yet in fieri or the progress of establishment, that same people can do no act to arrest it.

Mr. Chairman, both these propositions cannot be true, and common sense has but little difficulty in determining which is true. I have already shown that there is no such legality in the proceedings which led to the formation of the Lecompton constitution as estops the Congress. Indeed, sir, Congress, in the admission of new States, has thus far been limited by few rules of legality, technicality, or form. It has acted upon the various cases according to the facts which attended them, ever carrying out the will of the people of the new State, however expressed or however ascertained. One thing the Congress has never done, and that is to admit a State into the Union under a constitution contrary to the well-known wishes of her people. This, if ever done, will first be done in Kansas. Her people have expressed, in every form they can command, their determined opposition to the Lecompton constitution. A majority of nearly ten thousand of her people tell you not to accept it as the fundamental organic law of the State; her Legislature, by a unanimous vote, beseeches you not to do so; and even the officers elected under the Lecompton constitution itself protest against your so doing:

"We, the officers elected under said constitution, do most respectfully and earnestly pray your honorable bodies not to admit Kansas into the Union under said constitution, and thus force upon an unwilling people an organic law against their express will, and in violation of every principle of popular government."

Signed by the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, State Treasurer, and Auditor.

Against these solemn and earnest appeals why should we seek to admit her under the Lecompton constitution? Above all, why should the South seek to admit her? What will we gain by it? Mr. Chairman, we shall gain a loss. We shall set instructions, which, being taught, may return to plague the inventors. This will inevitably be the case in regard to the new theories now inculcated for the ready overthrow of constitutions, by the unrestrained fiat of majorities. We show ourselves, perhaps, willing to extend our peculiar institution against the will of the majority of those amongst whom we would carry it, giving the majority opposed to us, should they have power, pretexts for disregarding our right and our property. But if these consequences did not follow, we gain no foothold for our slaves in Kansas, since the advocates of admission under the Lecompton constitution themselves tell the people there that they may turn slavery out as soon as you get the constitution in. I would have the South play no such paltry game. I would rejoice to have Kansas a slave State, if she could be permanently so with the consent of her people. I will not violate the general principles of free government, whereby the American people are authorized to establish their own institutions in their own way, for the paltry advantage of having Kansas forced into the Union under the Lecompton constitution as a slave State for a moment, to be scorned and kicked out instantly thereafter, and forever.

But we are told that the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution will localize the slavery excitement and give peace to the country.

I believe this to be one of the profoundest delusions that ever presented itself to an intelligent mind. Leave a people free to settle their own institutions, and they cannot long remain excited. Restrain them, and it is the inevitable outbreak of the American heart, North and South and everywhere, to resist you. I believe in my conscience that to force the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas against their consent, expressed in so many forms as I have shown you, will be to sound the tocsin for a wilder and deeper and far more pervading popular commotion than any you have ever known. It will not be confined to Kansas; but, rolling from its level plains, it will sweep through the northwestern prairies and the mountains of New England, until every hamlet and village and town and county will be instinct with excitement.

On the contrary, do justice to Kansas; do not to her what you would not have done to yourselves; encompass her not with nice technicalities of law; but suffer her people to speak and act their will; extend to them, in fact, what you profess to extend to all in theory—the right to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way—and, my life for it, peace will prevail from one end of our beloved country to the other.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. CHAS. B. HOARD, OF NEW YORK,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 30, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HOARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have sought the floor for the purpose of presenting the free-State view of the questions now agitating the country, as I understand it, truthfully and frankly. With little preparation and less experience, I can only hope, in a desultory manner, to perform a task which I regret has not been undertaken by the ablest and most experienced member from the free States.

There is a misapprehension, or else a studied misrepresentation, of the sentiments and intentions of the free States, by those who have spoken from the slave States during this discussion; and, as I hope that no one desires to add to the present excitement by misrepresentations, I am persuaded that they do misapprehend the facts. It is our first duty to endeavor, by frank and full interchange of opinions, to ascertain wherein the real difference between us exists; and then we can agree, or differ, as men. To accomplish this, we must lay aside the tricks of politicians, the technicalities of law, and the arts of diplomacy, which appear to be out of place in adjusting difficulties between members of the same family—proprietors having a common interest in the welfare and destiny of the Government and the country. Certainly, if we could forget our party prejudices for a few days, and enter upon the discussion of the questions before us with a desire to come to some just conclusions, we could either agree upon some mode of settling present difficulties, and avoiding, in the future, such controversies, or, failing to do that, we could determine not to agree, and come to the responsibility before us deliberately and calmly. These angry debates, these imputations, threats, and recriminations, are neither pleasant nor profitable; and they do not add luster to our reputation as national legislators, or dignity to the American Congress.

It cannot be the desire of any friend of the Union that the action of Congress, on the question before the country, shall tend to aggravate present difficulties; and, therefore, a question of this character should not be made a party test, or settled by a party vote. Can the President imagine that any party has a higher interest in the welfare of the country than the people have? Why, then, not leave the Representatives free to act and vote as they please, responsible only to their constituents for the manner in which they shall discharge this high trust?

The people of the free States are opposed to slavery. There may be a few individuals in the free States that do not concur in the general sentiment; but it is nevertheless proper to say, that the people there are opposed to the institution. This opposition is not confined to any political party, to any class in society, to any sect or denomination. It pervades the whole people, and is as universal there as Christianity. The institution of slavery is looked upon as a moral, social, and political evil of great magnitude. It is discussed in its various aspects at the altar, at the fireside, at the hustings, and on the stump. We have abolished it by law; and we look upon that action as furnishing one of the strongest elements of our prosperity, and as the cause of our more rapid advancement in wealth and general improvement. We have noticed the advancement of neighboring States, apparently equal in natural advantages; and in no single instance has the State in which slavery exists kept pace with the States which are free. In schools, in churches, in libraries, in manufactures, in roads, in canals, in commerce, in domestic peace and security, in agriculture and in wealth, (upon soil where the natural advantages are equal,) the free States uniformly excel. We believe that slavery degrades labor wherever it exists; and therefore free laborers will not live in a slave State, or emigrate to a slave Territory.

The free States have already twice as much population as the slave States, and therefore require, upon every rule of equity, twice as much territory for surplus population as the slave States; and in the ordinary course of things must create free States twice as rapidly as you can under the same rules create slave States. In addition to this, the interests of all foreign emigration go with the free States, which, added to the migration of free-State men from the slave States, would probably require, on terms of perfect equity, three fourths of the territory, or three free States, to one slave State. With what propriety, then, or with what show of fair intention to adhere to the principle of equality of rights, can you ask to keep pace with the free States in political power, or in representation in any department of the Government? If you desire to keep a perpetual balance of power between liberty and slavery, that would be a denial of equality of popular rights, and would place northern freemen in an inferior position to southern freemen. If you expect the free States to consent to such a proposition, you will certainly be disappointed. The demand would be offensive, and compliance with it would be humiliating. The idea of a balance of power between opposite interests like liberty and slavery, to promote peace and quiet, is clearly delusive. It would perpetuate the discord which has existed ever since the slave States entered upon that policy, and it would terminate in open hostility. Formerly, you only asked to be let alone in the States—you demanded "State rights." More than this you cannot justly expect; less than this, you could not with honor submit to. Upon that ground you are impregnable; on any other, you will be overthrown.

If our opinions on the subject of slavery are wrong, we answer that your best men have been our teachers; and I beg leave here to call your attention to some of their opinions, in connection with other authorities, that you may the better understand how inbred the sentiment is, and how hopeless the effort must be to remove or change it, by any of the means thus far resorted to. It is, I know, deeply regretted by all in the free States, that this cause of difference and difficulty exists to disturb the harmony and happiness of the country; and if any of you really believe that this excitement and ill feeling is congenial to us—that we cherish, and desire to continue it—you do us great injustice. But to the testimony:

Opinions of Washington.

"I hope it will not be conceived from these observations that it is my wish to hold the unhappy people who are the subject of this letter, in slavery. I can only say, that there is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do, to see some plan adopted for the abolition of it; but there is only one proper and official method by which it can be accomplished, and that is, by the legislative authority; and this, as far as my survivor will go, shall not be wanting."—Letter to Robert Norris.

"The benevolence of your heart, my dear Marquis, is so conspicuous on all occasions, that I never wonder at fresh proofs of it; but your late purchase of an estate in the colony of Cayenne, with a view of emancipating the slaves, is a generous and noble proof of your humanity. Would to God a like spirit might diffuse itself generally into the mind of the people of this country! But I despair of seeing it. Some petitions were presented to the Assembly at its last session for the abolition of slavery; but they could scarcely obtain a hearing."—Letter to La Fayette.

"I never mean, unless some particular circumstance should compel me to it, to possess another slave by purchase, it being among my first wishes to see some plan adopted by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law."—Letter to J. F. Mercer.

Opinions of Jefferson.

"And with what execration should the statesman be loaded who, permitting one half of the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms these into despotisms, and those into enemies, destroys the morals of the one part, and the love of country of the other. For if a slave can have a country in this world, it must be any other in preference to that in which he is born to live and labor for another; in which he must look up the faculties of his nature, contribute, as far as depends on his individual endeavors, to the enrichment of the human race, or entail his own miserable condition on the endless generations proceeding from him." * * *

"What an incomprehensible machine is man? Who can endure toil, famine, stripes, imprisonment, and even death itself, in vindication of his own liberty, and the next moment be deaf to all those motives whose power supported him through his trial, and inflict on his fellow man a bondage, one hour of which is fraught with more misery than ages of that which he rose in rebellion to oppose? But we must wait with patience the workings of an overruling Providence, and hope that that is preparing the deliverance of these, our suffering brethren. When the measure of their tears shall be full—[Has not the Supreme Court, in declaring that these persons have no rights, filled that measure to overflowing?] when their tears shall have involved heaven itself in darkness, [what ray of hope remains to those people, since the ministers of justice have solemnly declared that they have no rights?] doubtless a God of justice will awaken to their distress, and by diffusing light and liberality among their oppressors, or, at length, by his EXTERMINATING THUNDER, manifest his attention to things of this world."—Notes on Virginia.

"The sentiments breathed through the whole do honor both to the head and the heart of the writer. Mine, on the subject of the slavery of negroes, have long since been in possession of the public, and time has only served to give them stronger root. The love of justice and the love of country plead equally the cause of these people, and it is a moral reproach to us that they should have pleaded so long in vain. Nursed and educated in the daily habit of seeing the degraded condition of those unfortunate beings, but not reflecting that that degradation was very much the work of themselves and their fathers, few minds have yet doubted but that they were as legitimate subjects of property as their horses or cattle!" * * *

"I had always hoped that the younger generation, receiving their early impressions after the flame of liberty had been kindled in every breast, and had become, as it were, the vital spirit of every American, would have sympathized with oppression wherever found, and proved their love of liberty beyond their own share of it. Your solitary but welcome voice is the first which has brought this sound to my ear; yet the hour of emancipation is advancing in the march of time. The enterprise is for the young—for those who can follow it up and hear it through to its consummation. It shall have my prayers; and these are the only weapons of an old man."—Letter to Edward Cole, Esq.

No one can doubt that Jefferson, in the preceding opinions, referred to African slavery, however anxious men of this day are to controvert that opinion.

Opinion of Patrick Henry.

"Would any one believe that I am master of slaves, of my own purchase! I am drawn along by the general inconvenience of living here without them. I will not, I cannot justify it. However culpable my conduct, I will so far pay my debt to virtue as to own the excellence and rectitude of her precepts, and lament my want of conformity to them. I believe a time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil. Let us transmit to our descendants, together with our slaves, a pity for their unhappy lot, and OUR ABHORRENCE FOR SLAVERY!"—Letter to Robert Pleasants.

Who, of Patrick Henry's descendants, have this inheritance?

Opinion of James Monroe.

"We have found that this evil [slavery] has preyed upon the very vitals of the Union; and has been prejudicial to all the States in which it has existed."—Speech in Virginia Convention.

Opinion of William Pinkney.

"Sir, iniquitous, and most dishonorable to Maryland, is that decay system of partial bondage which her laws have hitherto supported with a solicitude worthy of a better object, and her citizens by their practice continued.

"Founded in a disgraceful traffic, its continuance is as SHAMELESS as its origin.

"ETERNAL INFAMY awaits the abandoned miscreants whose selfish souls could ever prompt them to rob unhappy Africa of her sons, and freight them hither by thousands, to poison the fair Eden of LIBERTY with the rank weed of BONDAGE!"

"But wherefore should we confine the edge of censure to our ancestors, or those from whom they purchased? Are not we EQUALLY GUILTY? They sowed around the seeds of slavery; we cherish and sustain the growth. Yes, let it be handed down to posterity that the people of Maryland, who could fly to arms with the promptitude of Roman citizens, when the hand of oppression was lifted against themselves; who could behold their country desolated, and the citizens slaughtered; who could brave, with unshaken firmness, every calamity of war before they would submit to the smallest infringement of their rights—that this very people could yet see thousands of their fellow-creatures, within the limits of their own territory, bending beneath an unnatural yoke.

"For shame, sir: let us throw off the mask; it is a cobweb one at best, and the world will see through it. It will not do thus to talk like philosophers, and act like UNRESENTING TYRANTS; to be perpetually sermonizing, with liberty for our text, and actual oppression for our commentary! Here have emigrants from a land of tyranny found an asylum from persecution; and here, also, have those who come as rightfully free as the winds of heaven, found an eternal grace for the liberties of themselves and their posterity!"

"In the name of God, should we not attempt to wipe away this stigma! Survey the countries, sir, where the hand of freedom conducts the plowshare, and compare their produce with yours; your granaries, in this view, appear like the storehouse of emmets, though not supplied with equal industry. The cause and the effect are too obvious to escape observation."—Speech in Maryland House of Delegates.

Opinion of John Randolph.

"Dissipation, as well as power or prosperity, hardens the heart; but avarice deadens it to every feeling but the thirst for riches. Avarice alone could have produced the slave trade. Avarice alone can drive, and does drive, this infernal traffic, and the wretched victims of it, like so many post-horses, whipped to death in a mail coach. Ambition has its cover-sluts in the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war; but where are the trophies of avarice? The handcuff, the manacle, and blood-stained cowhide!"—Southern Literary Messenger.

"Virginia is so impoverished by the system of slavery, that the tables will sooner or later be turned, and the slaves will advertise for runaway masters."

"Sir, I neither envy the head nor the heart of that man from the North who rises here to defend slavery upon principle."—Rebuke of Edward Everett in Congress.

"I give to my slaves their freedom, to which my conscience tells me they are justly entitled. It has a long time been a matter of the deepest regret to me that the circumstances under which I inherited them, and the obstacles thrown in the way by the laws of the land, have prevented my emancipating them in my lifetime, which it is my full intention to do, in case I can accomplish it."—Randolph's Will.

Opinion of Thomas J. Randolph.

"The gentleman has appealed to the Christian religion in justification of slavery. I would ask him upon what part of those pure doctrines does he rely; to which of those sublime precepts does he advert to sustain his position? Is it that which teaches justice, charity, and good-will to all, or is it that which teaches 'that you do unto others as you would they should do unto you?'"—Speech in the Virginia Legislature.

Opinion of Governor Randolph, of Virginia.

"We have been far outstripped by States to whom nature has been far less bountiful. It is painful to consider what might have been, under other circumstances, the amount of general wealth in Virginia."—Address to the Legislature of Virginia, 1820.

Opinion of Mr. Brodnax.

"That slavery in Virginia is an evil, it would be more than idle for any human being to doubt or deny. It is a mildew which has blighted every region it has touched from the creation of the world. Illustrations from the history of other countries, and other times, might be instructive; but we have evidence nearer at home, in the short histories of the different States of this great Confederacy, which are impressive in their admonitions and conclusive in their character."—Speech in the Virginia Legislature, 1832.

Opinion of Mr. Custis.

"The prosperity and aggrandizement of a State is to be seen in its increase of inhabitants, and consequent progress in industry and wealth. Of the vast tide of emigration which now rushes like a cataract to the West, not even a trickling rivulet winds its way to the ancient dominion. Of the multitude of foreigners who daily seek an asylum and home in the empire of liberty, how many turn their steps to the region of the slave? None. No, not one. There is a malaria in the atmosphere of these regions which the new comer shuns, as poisonous to his views and habits. See the wide ruin which the avarice of our ancestral Government has produced in the South, as witnessed in a sparse population of freemen, deserted habitations, and fields without culture. Strange to tell, even the wolf, driven back long since by the approach of man, now returns, after a lapse of a hundred years, to howl over the desolations of slavery."

Opinion of Mr. Faulkner.

"I am gratified to perceive that no gentleman has yet risen in this Hall the avowed advocate of slavery. If there be one who concurs with the gentleman from Brunswick [Mr. Gholson] in the harmless character of this institution, let me request him to compare the condition of the slaveholding portion of this Commonwealth—barren, desolate, and seared as it were by the avenging hand of Heaven, with the descriptions which we have of this same country from those who first broke its virgin soil. To what is this change ascribable? Alone to the withering and blasting effects of slavery. If this does not satisfy him, let me request him to extend his travels to the northern States of this Union, and beg him to contrast the happiness and contentment which prevail throughout the country; the busy and cheerful sound of industry; the rapid and swelling growth of their population; the means and institutions of education; their skill and proficiency in the useful arts; their enterprise and public spirit; the monuments of their manufacturing and commercial industry; and above all, their devoted attachment to the Government from which they derive their protection; with the division, discontent, indolence, and poverty of the southern country."

Such were the opinions of some of the wisest, purest, and most experienced southern statesmen and patriots, whose disciples we profess to be, on the subject of slavery. I had collected, for insertion here, numerous other extracts, of similar tenor, from other southern gentlemen, which time and space both seem to forbid. I had also collected numerous texts from the Bible in support of the free-State sentiment, in reply to quotations that have been made here to support slavery; but I will content myself with simple reference to them. Leviticus, xxiv., 22. Deuteronomy, xxiii., 15, 16. Psalms, ix., 18; x., 2; xii., 5, 6; lxxii., 4. Isaiah, iii., 15; v., 20; lviii., 6. Proverbs, iii., 3; xiv., 31; xxii., 22, 23. Jeremiah, xxxiv., 16, 17. Matthew, vii., 12. Luke, x., 36, 37. Acts, xvii., 26. Hebrews, xiii., 3. Galatians, v., 14, 15. Ephesians, vi., 9. 1 Timothy, vi., 10. Revelations, xiii., 10.

The foregoing statements, opinions, and authorities, have fully convinced us of the correctness of our ideas as to the character and influences of slavery, and of our course in abolishing it. If you have turned a deaf ear to these teachings and warnings of our Washingtons, our Jeffersons, our Henrys, our Franklins, our Monroes, our Pinkneys, our Randolphs, our Clays, our Faulkners, and many others who spoke in like manner, and still prefer to remain in your bonds, whilst we have profited by their teachings, and present to you continually the living evidence of the wisdom of those patriots, we can only regret your determination, and hope that time will work out a change of opinion. Virginia had a position in advance of any of the States that are free, with a better soil and climate, and yet she has lagged behind in the march of prosperity. To what influence can you attribute your relative decadence, but to slavery? To our action upon that subject we attribute our greater prosperity. It was consistent with the doctrines of our Declaration of Independence. Heaven smiled upon us, and we have pursued our prosperous way rejoicing.

Now, with these opinions of the blighting effects of slavery upon the material prosperity of any State or Territory which maintains it, and especially in a climate where free white labor seeks employment, and our conviction of its moral and social wrong, can you expect us to approve of its extension—nay, to aid such extension, by our votes and action? Can an evil be extended into our Territories, and the majority not be morally responsible for action or inaction? If you believe us sincere in our opposition to slavery, then can you respect us if we do not on all proper occasions, maintain that opposition? Change places with us, and would you be more tolerant than we have been? If you believed of slavery, as we do, that it blights the land that is touched by it; that it retards development and civilization; that it is an evil and a wrong; then would you consent to its extension where you had the constitutional power to prevent it?

With regard to slavery in the States, we have no difficulty; and the slave-States need entertain no fears of any free-State interference. There never was any danger of any such intervention. The citizens of the free-States, with few and unimportant exceptions, can find in the Constitution sufficient authority to relieve them from any responsibility for slavery in the States. We regret the infatuation with which you cling to the incubus that prevents your advancement, because we desire your highest prosperity; but we have no desire to intermeddle with your prerogatives.

But, in the Territories, the case is, in our opinion, entirely different. The Territories being the common property of the States, must necessarily be under the rightful control of Congress, unless the power is delegated by it to some other authority. It is known of all men that such was the common opinion of all sections and parties until very recently, and that the Government long practiced upon it with the concurrence of all the departments, and without any protest from any State in the Union. We are loyal to the Constitution as we understand it; and we certainly do understand it as it was understood and practiced upon by all the early Presidents and statesmen, including many who participated in making the Constitution. The contradictory opinions of statesmen, and of the Supreme Court, are all of late date, and have an unquestionable partisan (if not sectional) origin and character. That they may be considered just and correct by the South, which desired them beforehand, I can well imagine; but at the same time they carry no conviction to the free States.

If the opinion of the court had preceded the political necessity which seemed to demand it, and had been given upon a case requiring that point to be decided, instead of being volunteered, (just at a time when party necessity required it,) then the free States, if they could not have concurred in the opinion, might have respected the court. This is one of the very worst features of the whole question, because, when the court ceases to be respected by the people, it is thenceforth powerless for good as well as for evil. To aid a political party, they have thrown their official reputation into the party scales, where it has not the weight of a feather, and thereby lost the confidence and respect of a large proportion of the people.

Plausible and satisfactory as that opinion of the court is to you, can you reasonably expect us, under the circumstances, to regard it with favor, or treat it with respect? It is opposed to long-established ideas, which the same court, with all other departments of the Government, have practiced upon ever since our national existence. The opinion was not concurred in by the whole court; and, as it was not called for by the case presented, it is certainly obnoxious to the suspicion that the judges forgot their judicial dignity and duty in a desire to contribute the weight of their opinion to the settlement of a troublesome question.

Your speakers here always characterize slavery as an institution of negro labor and servitude only. Can you defend its other features, or explain why the slave States do not endeavor to correct the evils that are connected with it, that wound so deeply our sympathies? As "negroes of pure African blood, whose ancestors were brought here and sold as slaves," are the only persons whom the Supreme Court, in their opinion, have decided to have no rights that white men are bound to respect, pray tell us where you find authority to say that certain females, who are advertised as having blue eyes, light, straight hair, and fair complexions, have no rights that white men are bound to respect? Or, if you admit that such persons have rights, what are they, and why do not your Christian societies and your laws protect them? Can you justify the practice of treating such persons as you would an African of pure blood? Have you made any efforts, or expressed any desire to regard their rights as superior to the rights of persons of pure African blood?

You have told us often in debate—and the same declaration is commonly used in defense of slavery—that slavery is a boon to the negro, and that our sympathies are entirely misdirected. In answering this, we ask you to explain to us why, then, you grant a slave his freedom as a reward for extraordinary services? Is this the way that you testify your gratitude? If you believed that slavery was a boon to the African, would you take it from him under pretense of granting him a favor? Pretending to testify your gratitude, would you give these unfortunate persons a scorpion instead of a fish? nay, would you give them a scorpion in exchange for a fish? How often do we read of slaveholders, in making their last will and testament, when the vanities of time and the realities of eternity are presented to them, granting freedom to their slaves, with expressions of regret that they had ever held them? This is a strange commentary upon the sincerity of such as hold that slavery is a boon. If slaveholders believed that slavery was really a boon, they would devote their property—if they desired to testify their interest in the welfare of the negro—to bringing them from Africa to be blessed with servitude! Has any charitable southern done this? This suggests another defense of African slavery, urged mainly by professing Christians: that it is one of God's appointed means of Christianizing the heathen. This appears very plausible; but, I desire to inquire, how many Christian generations of an individual heathen ought to be held in bondage to compensate for Christianizing their ancestor?

A few years ago your public men, your Christians, and your press, spoke of this institution as an evil, for the introduction of which you were not responsible, and which you desired to remove, as soon as some judicious and practicable method of doing so could be suggested, and matured. But now you defend it as the core of your heart, the apple of your eye, the very foundation, (in your own expressive language, the "mud-sill") of your political and social existence! But whilst to you this institution has of late become the object of so much solicitude, the theme of so much moral, religious, and patriotic devotion; experience, which we regard as the best of teachers, has been impressing more and more indelibly upon our mind, the wisdom of the early patriots in their efforts to limit and circumscribe it; and also the propriety and justice of the following impressive language of the immortal Jefferson, whose teachings, as a lamp to our path, have always served to guide republicans in the way of political duty:

"There must doubtless be an unhappy influence on the manners of our people, produced by the existence of slavery among us. The whole commerce between the master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions; the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it. The man must be prodigal, who can retain his manners and morals undepraved by such circumstances."—Notes on Virginia.

Sir, what a commentary upon the institution of slavery is furnished in the above extract; and what a painful proof of its correctness is furnished in the broken and shivered, yet still illustrious, Senator, who, believing that vengeance belongeth to the Lord, who would repay it, has not returned evil for evil!

Much has been said this session about Kansas, and many seem to think that in the settlement of that question is centered the destiny not only of parties, but of the country. I do not desire to detract from the importance of questions connected with the admission of Kansas, but I do say that that is not the great question before the country, nor can its settlement, in the manner recommended by the Administration, possibly produce that peace to the country which all patriots so devoutly pray for. Nay, sir, it would not only fail to produce peace, but it certainly would be a sword drawn against peace.

This whole Kansas question is one of a series of acts all tending to the same end, and which, when taken as a whole, are of sufficient magnitude to engage the attention of Congress and the country, not for a few weeks only, but for months, and years even, if thereby we can come to a just conclusion, and an amicable adjustment of difficulties.

Step by step the country has been, for many years, approaching the present point of acknowledged danger, and each one (as in this instance) has been urged upon us as the one that would bring to us our long-lost but ardently desired public quiet. Thus far, however, each step taken in that hope, instead of producing the promised quiet, has only served as an apology for the next, still less satisfactory demand. Whatever might have been the result of the longer continuance of the Missouri compromise, we know not; but this we do know, that the present Kansas controversy, with its long and aggravating story of frauds and wrongs, has grown out of the act repealing that compromise. It had been kept for more than a third of a century, and its only remaining effect, in favor of the free States, was confined to the Kansas and Nebraska Territories. If let alone, in a very few years its influence in their favor would have ceased by its own limitation, and just the same practical result would have followed in Kansas and Nebraska, as all now concede, must follow the triumph of the popular will in those Territories. This result was foreseen and acknowledged by southern statesmen who supported that measure.

What then, thus far, has been the fruit of that act which was to settle all controversy in Congress about slavery? Nothing but a wider and wilder alienation of feeling between the two sections of the country, growing out of the new feature involving the right of the people to govern themselves, which has been developed in the Kansas struggle; leaving slavery in the Territory just where it would have been had the Missouri compromise remained in force. We have found out, to be sure, how, when the Congress commits to the people of the Territories the right to govern themselves, the Executive can use the Army and the judiciary, in addition to his other powers, to oppress and subjugate them. We have found out that, when Congress abdicates its power in behalf of the people, a faithless President can seize it with the grasp of a despot, and wield it with the heart of a tyrant. We have weighed the strength, and measured the will and the power, of the contending interests. We have learned that the compromise was useless to us; you have found its repeal to be ashes to you.

But this measure was alleged to be necessary to secure perfect tranquility, and complete the circle of compromises of 1850, which, it was then discovered, were quite incompatible with the old one of 1820. Its repeal was to secure perfect peace, and "save the Union"—objects of great importance then—which the compromise measures of 1850 had not quite accomplished. Now, no one here can have forgotten that the compromises of 1850 were also inaugurated and passed to "save the Union," restore peace to the country, and put forever at rest the slavery agitation; great measures which the annexation of Texas, and the acquisition of Mexican territory, had unexpectedly failed to complete.

This brings us to a very interesting inquiry about the object of the annexation of Texas. The agitation which grew out of questions connected with the admission of Missouri in 1820 had subsided. The compromise line of 36° 30' as the line north of which slavery should not exist, established by the South against the North, (I speak of the sections as a whole,) settled the question of slavery in all the territory then owned by the Government. There was trifling agitation on the general subject of slavery, and some impatience was felt by religious societies at the tardiness of their southern brethren in urging upon their people the sinful nature of the institution. But this was always confined to a few persons in the free States, known there as Abolitionists, and never having political power sufficient to disturb the most sensitive southern nerves. All parties in the free States were then, as they are now, and have at all times been, the firm and consistent advocates of the political right of the States in which slavery exists, to continue or abolish it as and when they please.

Without the acquisition, then, of new territories, or the abrogation of the ordinance of 1787 or the compromise of 1820, it must be apparent that no ailment for slavery excitement existed, except that of a moral nature, which exists in all the slave States, as well as in the free States, and which we have no political power to restrain.

Now, who sought the annexation of Texas, and for what purpose was it desired? This was the beginning of the present agitation, which has increased in volume and bitterness from that time till this. That was the first act of the series, without which there could have been no sectional excitement, because the slavery question was settled in all the Territories by laws which were regarded as irrevocable by all parties.

I shall be able to show that Texas was annexed for the purpose, and with the avowed intention on the part of Mr. Calhoun, who was then Secretary of State, of strengthening and aggrandizing the slave States. And the act of annexation was done in a manner calculated to produce a war with Mexico, which it was known must result in the acquisition of more territory.

I extract the following from the official correspondence between Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of State for the United States, and the British Minister, Mr. Crampton, as germane to this subject—(Senate Ex. Doc., 1843-44, vol. 5, No. 341, pages 50-51:)

Mr. Calhoun's Letter, April 18, 1844.

"It is with still deeper concern the President [Mr. Tyler] regards the avowal of Lord Aberdeen, of the desire of Great Britain to get slavery abolished in Texas, and, as he infers, is endeavoring, through her diplomacy, to accomplish it, by making the abolition of slavery one of the conditions on which Mexico should acknowledge her independence."

"Under this conviction, it is felt to be the imperative duty of the Federal Government, the common representative and protector of the States of the Union, to adopt, in self-defense, the most effectual measures to defeat it."

"The geographical position of Texas would expose the weakest, and most vulnerable portion of our frontier to invasions, and place in the power of Great Britain the most efficient means of effecting in the neighboring States of the Union what she avows to be her desire to do in all countries where slavery exists."

"Acting in obedience to this obligation, on which our Federal system of Government rests, the President directs me to inform you that a treaty has been concluded between the United States and Texas, for the annexation of the latter to the former, as a part of its territory, which will be submitted without delay to the Senate for its approval. This step has been taken as the most effectual, if not the only means of guarding against the threatened danger, and securing their permanent peace and welfare."

Letter from same to same, dated April 27, 1844, page 66.

"It was not possible for the President to hear with indifference, the avowal of a policy so hostile in its character, and dangerous in its tendency to the domestic institutions of so many of the States of this Union, and to the safety and prosperity of the whole."

"The measure [the annexation of Texas] was adopted with the mutual consent, and for the mutual and permanent welfare of the two countries interested. It was made necessary, in order to preserve domestic institutions placed under the guarantee of their respective constitutions, and deemed essential to their safety and prosperity."

In this connexion, I will also read an extract from the Mobile Mercantile Advertiser of about 1836, (date is not given, but the extract was published in the East in 1837:)

"The South wishes to have Texas admitted into the Union for two reasons: first, to equalize the South with the North; and, secondly, as a convenient and safe place calculated, from its peculiarly good soil and salubrious climate, for a slave population. Interest and political safety both alike prompt the action, and enforce the argument. The South contends that preservation and justice to themselves call for that aid to be rendered to them which would be given by the acquisition of Texas. They are not safe without it; THEY ARE NOT BALANCED WITH THE FREE STATES."

A balance of power appears to have been a ruling idea with the slave States for the last fifteen or twenty years.

The foregoing facts settle, beyond any question, the following propositions: that the agitation about slavery in the States could not have seriously disturbed the quiet of the country; that no agitation could have grown out of that question in the Territories then belonging to the Government, because it was all provided for by laws that were then regarded as permanent; that no such controversy could have existed without the acquisition of new territory; and that the South, and not the North, desired the annexation of Texas, and the acquisition of Mexican territory. The South, in carrying out the policy avowed by Mr. Calhoun for promoting southern interests, has brought this contest upon the country, and she must bear the responsibility and abide the consequences.

Having thus traced back this sectional agitation which now "crops out" in Kansas to its origin in the acquisition of territory by southern action to strengthen and aggrandize the slave power, and having shown the foundation, extent, and sincerity of the anti-slavery sentiment of the free States, I come to speak of the misapprehension, or misrepresentation, by the South of the true ground of difficulty between the two sections. Slavery, although it is connected with the controversy, is not really the cause of our present difficulty. The contest is now fully shown to be broader, deeper, and infinitely higher than the abstract question of negro slavery. The entire discussion during this session of Congress on the part of the South, so far as I have listened or read, has been predicated upon the idea that the only opposition to the Kansas policy of the Administration was based upon enmity to the institution of slavery. Nothing could be more fallacious. Can the South be so infatuated as to believe that Governor Wise, Governor Walker, Secretary Stanton, Senators Bell, Crittenden, and Douglas, and twenty or thirty Representatives in the House, who, but a few days since, were acting with the Democracy—can they really believe that all these, and scores of thousands of Democrats who cast their votes for Mr. Buchanan at the last election, have suddenly become the enemies of the Democratic party on account of its support of slavery? I tell you nay, sir. But the opposition to that party has grown out of the course which it has resorted to, and the means which it has put in requisition to carry the country from its high position as a liberty-loving and liberty-defending Republic, as established by our revolutionary fathers, to a PRO-SLAVERY OLIGARCHY! Since this last excitement commenced, an organized, disciplined, and politic minority has undertaken to wrest the government from the possession of the MAJORITY, for the purpose of elevating a sectional institution which is at war with the rights, the dignity, and the material interests of that MAJORITY. Here, sir, lies the grave error.

The path of minorities to power is always boisterous, and beset with dangers. The commotion attending the progress of events, in such transfer of power, will be fierce, and the danger imminent, when the rights of a free, intelligent, and chivalrous people are thus attacked. Since this excitement commenced, this minority has been governing the majority in this country by political STRATEGY.

It is this startling truth, breaking upon the public mind, that is alarming, arousing, and uniting the people for the reassertion of popular rights! And neither party, nor patronage, nor courts, nor technicalities, nor stratagems, will divert or deter them from their high purpose.

With the facts before us, we cannot imagine why it is that the South are constantly charging the North as the authors of the excitement, when the free States have resisted the measures upon which the contest is based. You habitually charge the free States with bad faith; but the charge always rests upon some speciality or technicality, like their refusal to vote in Kansas. "All that are in favor of Brigham Young for Governor, and will support polygamy, will say, ay. All that are opposed to Brigham Young, and will support polygamy, will say, no." Suppose the people of Utah had the right to elect their Governor, and should present the question as above, so that no one could vote for or against Governor until he voted in favor of polygamy: would you call that a fair election of Governor? How, then, can you call it a fair submission, even of the question of slavery, in Kansas?

As far back as 1844, when it was determined that the Democratic party should be transformed into a pro-slavery agency, the national convention of that party adopted an anti-republican rule of party government, giving to the minority the control of the nomination of candidates for President and Vice President. Without the establishment of such minority rules, Mr. Van Buren, whose friends numbered a respectable majority in that convention, would have been nominated, and the Texas scheme for the aggrandizement of the slave power, would have failed. From that time to this, the tendency of that party to sectionalism has been constant; its strength in the slave States steadily increasing; and its decadence in the free States equally steady and uniform.

There is another bit of history connected with this Texas question which I must mention in passing. I find, in Benton's Thirty Years' View, vol. 2, p. 584, the following:

"Mr. Gilmer then explained to his friend the purpose for which this letter had been written and sent to General Jackson, and the use that was intended to be made of his answer, (if favorable to the design of the authors,) which use was this: it was to be produced in the nominating convention to overthrow Mr. Van Buren and give Mr. Calhoun the nomination, both of whom were to be interrogated beforehand; and it was well known what the answer would be—Calhoun for, and Van Buren against, IMMEDIATE ANNEXATION—and Jackson's answer coinciding with Calhoun's, would turn the scale in his favor and blow Van Buren sky-high."

Mr. Van Buren, sure enough, was blown "sky-high;" but Mr. Calhoun got no higher than Secretary of State.

It was supposed, nearly up to the time for the assembling of the Democratic national convention for 1844, that Martin Van Buren would be the Democratic nominee against Mr. Clay, who was to be, and was, the opposing candidate. Both of these gentlemen were interrogated upon the question of the annexation of Texas, and both stood upon the ground that General Jackson had previously occupied in relation to the same question, namely, that it would be unjust toward Mexico to annex a portion of territory which she claimed, (war then existed between Texas and Mexico,) without her consent.

Under General Jackson's administration it was good Democracy to keep national faith with a sister Republic. But when Texas was to be acquired for the purpose before stated, presto! Democracy consists in the disregard of national faith, and demands annexation, in spite of Mexico, and with war into the bargain. What constituted true Democracy in General Jackson was, therefore, heresy in Mr. Van Buren, and caused his defeat as presidential candidate. The "luck" was so sudden, too, sir, that even one who had been Commander-in-Chief could not change front quick enough to save himself.

In these days we have just a parallel case. The Senator from Illinois, but yesterday, was at the head of the Democracy, as the author of popular sovereignty. To-day, for holding the same doctrine, the Democracy cry out—"Crucify him!"

Mr. Jefferson taught that Democracy was a principle by which all political measures should be tried and judged. But modern Democracy sets up executive measures, as the test of political fidelity, and requires principles to be held in respectful abeyance. No familiarity with Democratic principles can guide aright, nor any fidelity to them keep any one in the way of modern party duty.

A great majority of the electors in the free States are interested in the rights of labor. They are Republicans—yes, Democrats—in habit and sentiment, intelligent, honest, but confiding almost to a fault. The grave political wrongs which have brought the present perils upon the country could not have been done in any party name less respected than the Democracy. It was a "time-honored," almost a sacred name. Beelzebub, not in his own hateful name, it is said, but as an angel of light, practices continually his plan against the welfare and happiness of mankind. So in this case, faithless pretenders, in the name of Democracy, have crucified Democracy! Under no other name could the people have been so enthralled, and their rights so betrayed.

The true Democratic party listened to the petitions of the people, and protected their rights; but this false Democracy has only leaden ears for their petitions, and calls the attempt to assert their rights rebellion, and crushes them out with the American Army! The true Democracy was economical of the people's money; but this false Democracy is profligate, beyond example; and depends for success upon sectional favor, and the corrupting power of its enormous patronage. The true Democracy was content with the constitutional distribution of governmental powers; but this false Democracy seeks to concentrate all such powers in the chief Executive. The true Democracy held that official fidelity consisted in a faithful and honest discharge of the duties of office; but this false Democracy demands craven submission to the will of the Executive. The true Democracy held that the Representative should obey the will of his constituents; but this false Democracy calls it heresy if he disregards the Executive behest. The true Democracy inculcated the high duty of representative fidelity; but this false Democracy, with filthy bribes seeks the itching palm, and attacks with fierce denunciations, every independent spirit.

Fidelity to the interests of the people is a just rule by which to test public officers of every grade, and I propose to examine the policy of the late Administration by that rule.

Washington, in his Farewell Address, says:

"I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the State, with particular reference to the founding of them upon geographical discriminations.

"This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all Governments; but in those of the popular form, is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

"The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissensions, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism."

"It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms. There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the Government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of a popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged."

"A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest, instead of warming, it should consume."

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the power of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

The policy of the present and preceding Administrations, from 1844, more than any previous ones, of whatever shade of political opinion, has been in conflict with the above advice of Washington; and at this present time we experience the bitter consequences in rancorous party prejudice, under the blind influence of which men appear to mistake their party for their country. Committed to the purposes of the minority, and regardless of popular interests, the modern Democracy has become, beyond comparison, extravagant and corrupt in the use of the public money.

The true Democracy can always be found by the standard of economy. It has always been one of its important characteristics, and in former days was one of its proudest boasts. I have taken the pains to collect some statistics of expenditures, which, when presented to the public, will I think go far to enlighten the people as to the true character of this professed Democracy.

The annexed table exhibits the expenses of the Government, for all purposes exclusive of public debt, foreign intercourse, pensions, and Indian department, for the several years therein stated, and also the population at several periods. The accounts, "civil list" and "miscellaneous," include sums expended for political purposes, and therefore an examination of those tables will be most instructive. I have not had the opportunity to examine the items which constitute either account, but presume they are the same class as have always been placed to these same accounts.

It cannot require argument to prove that the ordinary expenses of Government ought not to increase as rapidly as population. But there is another consideration that should be borne in mind, viz: that the increase in the expenses for "civil list" and "miscellaneous" should advance at a uniform rate, or nearly so; and it is impossible to imagine how, with an honest and economical administration of Government, the rate of increase could vary much. These items are not affected by war or peace, and therefore with a prudent management of public business, must keep steadily along. But what are the facts in the case? The increase of population averages about thirty-three per cent. in ten years. Now, from 1837 to 1847, whilst our population increased thirty-three per cent., our expenses for "miscellaneous" items increased forty per cent. From 1847 to 1857, the increase of population was, as before, thirty-three per cent.; but mark, the increase in miscellaneous expenses was more than four hundred and seventy-five per cent.!

The miscellaneous expenses for the single year ending 30th June, 1857, exceeds, by more than two million dollars, the same expenses during General Jackson's two terms, making eight years. The expenditures for this item of miscellaneous during Pierce's four years were $64,646,556. This, it must be remembered, is exclusive of Army and Navy, and the civil list. This, too, is the account to which the money is charged that is used for carrying elections and paying off party favorites. Is it strange, when we calculate this enormous expenditure, that the Democratic party is so powerful and self-sustaining? Will not $64,000,000 spent in four years furnish a cement strong enough to hold such a patriotic and national party together? Is any one astonished, after knowing the amount of money expended, at the boldness with which that party asserts its ability to hold the powers of Government? This $64,500,000 spent by Pierce in four years was necessary to pass the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and to carry the election of Mr. Buchanan.

To get some idea of its magnitude, imagine that it exceeds the whole amount spent for "miscellaneous" account by the Government in forty-eight years, namely, from 1792 to 1840. It will be remembered that in 1826 there was great excitement about the profligacy of Mr. Adams's administration, and afterwards a good deal about Mr. Van Buren's administration. But the forty-eight years above named include all the Administrations to the end of Van Buren's. Mr. Pierce said in his inaugural:

"In the administration of domestic affairs you expect a devoted integrity to the public service, and an observance of rigid economy in all departments, so marked as never justly to be questioned. If this reasonable expectation be not realized, I frankly confess that one of your leading hopes is doomed to disappointment, and that my efforts in a very important particular must result in a humiliating failure."

And then for commentary on that text spent more money under the head of miscellaneous, (that is, sundries—things that it is not easy to name,) in four years, than all the Presidents down to 1846. In a single year of his term he spent for miscellanies almost twice as much as Mr. Van Buren spent during his whole term.

Since the transfer of the Democracy in 1844 to Mr. Calhoun's sectional minority policy, which is only thirteen years, the miscellaneous expenses have exceeded the amount charged to the same account from 1789 up to that date, by the enormous sum of $48,000,000. Yes, sir, during the last thirteen years our miscellaneous expenses—which, in the days of republican economy, were comparatively unimportant, certainly not alarming—have amounted, in the aggregate, to the startling sum of more than one hundred and seventeen million dollars! whilst, for the whole fifty-five previous years, down to the close of 1844, the aggregate was less than sixty-five millions. This exhibits modern Democratic economy! The advance in profligacy would be expected to keep pace with the advance towards sectionalism, and the decadence of Democracy; and just so is the fact.

Under Mr. Polk's administration, at the inception of which sectionalism was inaugurated, the miscellaneous expenses in four years were a fraction over thirteen millions. Under Mr. Fillmore's, (which, though classed politically as Whig, was fully committed to the ruling southern policy,) these expenses reached, in four years, more than thirty-seven millions! And under Mr. Pierce's Democratic (?) four years, they swelled to the monstrous sum of over sixty-four millions! As popular support began to be withheld, the public money must be used to maintain waning power. Mr. Polk's first year's expenses were between three and four millions; Mr. Fillmore's first year between seven and eight millions; and Mr. Pierce's first year between thirteen and fourteen millions! Mr. Fillmore's last year was five millions greater than his first; and Mr. Pierce's last year was more than five millions greater than his first. Would to God that I could now inform you the amount of Mr. Buchanan's last year, but "time forbids."

It will be observed, if the table is examined, that, down to 1840, the expenses for "Army," "Navy," "civil list," and "miscellaneous," averaged about one dollar for each inhabitant. It was a trifle more in 1840; but, for the year 1847, the expenses were $21,000,000 more than the population, being just about double what the previous average had been. And in 1857, the last year of Democratic economy, the expenses for the same accounts had swelled to the alarming sum of $58,000,000! or $30,000,000 more than the population!

I have neither time nor inclination to pursue the details of this painful evidence of political degeneracy and corruption further.

I believe that the Pierce-Buchanan Administrations have no parallel in the history of this country, in the boldness with which they have attempted to strike down the rights of the people. The press has been muzzled by the public money and official patronage. Public officers have been turned out, not because they did not support the Administration, but because they would not be active and efficient party tools. The purity of the ballot-box has been corrupted by the use of public money; offices have been distributed with the view of carrying executive measures through Congress, thereby corrupting the representative system; and to finish the aggravating picture, the Executive is now using the whole power of the Government under the false pretense of restoring peace to the country, to complete, in one of the Territories of the Union, the subjugation of American citizens!

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. STEVENSON, OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. STEVENSON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I congratulate you and the country that this bitter, protracted, and exciting struggle gle, which has occupied so much of our time, to the almost entire exclusion of other important public business, is about to terminate. Before the setting of to-morrow's sun, this great question, momentous in its results of weal or woe, will have been decided.

In advocating the immediate admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I shall speak with the frankness and freedom which the subject deserves. I hope to do so, however, with entire respect to the opponents of this measure on the other side of this Hall, and especially without reflection upon the motives of those Democratic Representatives who have deemed themselves constrained to separate on this measure from four fifths of their political brethren on this floor.

It will be my purpose to show that the immediate admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, is demanded, not less by a strict observance of the true principles of representative government, than by a sacred regard to that equality and sovereignty of the States, which constitute the strongest bond of our Union.

What, Mr. Chairman, are the facts of this application? In 1850, when for the sake of peace, it was proposed to extend the Missouri line; as adopted in 1820 and applied to the Louisiana purchase, to the territory which had then been but recently acquired from Mexico, it was indignantly refused by the anti-slavery Representatives of the North, and their united votes stand recorded against the proposition. The nascent spirit of abolitionism was then too strong and potent to be hemmed in by any geographical line, and from the sectional agitation which ensued, it was apparent that the Missouri compromise line could not be extended. The fires of sectional discord waxed so warm as to threaten destruction to the Union. The stormy debate which then ensued, and the gloom which hung like a dark pall over the whole country, will always be regarded as a prominent crisis in the history of this Republic. The compromise measures closed that fearful struggle, and in lieu of the extension of a geographical line, there was substituted the more harmonious principle that the question of slavery was to be withdrawn from Congress, and the people of the Territories left free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. Whatever may have been the opinion and action of leading men in particular localities, the settlement of this sectional controversy by the compromises of 1850 was generally acquiesced in and approved by the conservative and patriotic men of all parties throughout the length and breadth of our land. In 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska act was passed; and acting on the principle of non-intervention which marked the compromises of 1850, this Missouri line was declared inoperative and void, non-intervention was again reaffirmed, and the Congress of the United States declared—

"The true intent and meaning of that act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way."

A territorial government was formed, and very shortly after its organization a Territorial Legislature was elected. In July, 1855, this Legislature submitted to the people of Kansas the question of whether they would call a convention to frame a State government, preparatory to admission into the Union. The election was held, and by almost a unanimous vote the people decided in favor of a convention. In pursuance of this vote the Territorial Legislature, on the 19th February, 1857, passed their convention act. This was just and fair in all its provisions. It was passed by legal authority, and was the result of the popular vote demanding its passage. It provided for the election of delegates, the taking of the census, and registry of voters. It afforded equal opportunities to all in the election of delegates. It allowed a month for the correction of registry returns, and denounced heavy penalties against fraudulent and illegal voting, and protected the elective franchise by the strongest provisions. It is proper here to mention, that this act of the Territorial Legislature was vetoed by Governor Geary, because it did not provide for a submission of the constitution to the people. The Legislature passed it by a two-thirds vote over his head, utterly repudi-ating the necessity of a submission of the constitution, or any part thereof, to the people, unless the convention deemed proper to do so.

An election for delegates took place. The convention met and adopted a constitution. The convention submitted to the people of the Territory the question of slavery or no slavery, and on the 21st December, 1857, this vote resulted as follows: constitution with slavery, six thousand two hundred and twenty-six; constitution without slavery, five hundred and sixty-nine. Since the assembling of Congress a vote has been taken for members of the State organization ordained by this constitution, and these officers were elected by the largest vote ever cast in the Territory. It is true that Governor Stanton convened the Territorial Legislature which met after the convention, and that this Legislature attempted to usurp the power of directing a vote on the constitution, upon the 4th of January, 1858, the day on which the State elections under the State constitution had been held. It is also true that a large vote was cast against the constitution on the 4th of January, as ordered by the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, and which it will hereafter be attempted to be shown was clearly null and void.

Kansas now presents her constitution, and is knocking at our doors for admission into this holy sisterhood of States! In the earlier, and I was going to say, better days of the Republic, an admission that the constitution of Kansas was republican, and that the Territory contained the requisite population would be all that would have been required to have added another State to our confederated Union. When we behold the strife and discord that this application has produced, after the development and growth of our free and noble institutions, planted more than eighty years ago by our patriot sires on this continent, and who wrote their pledges for their maintenance in revolutionary blood, and sealed them with their lives, it almost sickens the heart to think "That centuries should reap

No mellow harvest."

I propose briefly to answer some of the objections made against the passage of this bill. What are they? It is claimed that an enabling act was necessary before the people of a Territory can form a State government with a view to admission in the Union. This was one of the strong points made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, in his celebrated speech on the 9th December. In support of his position, he cited the admission of Arkansas, and the arguments of Mr. Buchanan and other distinguished gentlemen of that day, in favor of the necessity of enabling acts. Whatever conservative men of all parties might have at one period thought of the regularity of enabling acts as a prerequisite for admission, it is too late in the day now to insist upon their necessity. Against the arguments of northern and southern men, in former times, in favor of these enabling acts as a sine qua non to admission, we point to the precedents and past history of the Government. A large majority of the new States have come in without enabling acts. The settled practice of the Government has been against their necessity, and the honest opinion of distinguished men has been forced to yield to precedent. The distinguished Senator from Illinois, himself, disregarded the want of an enabling act in the admission of several of the free States, in which the South was compelled to acquiesce. The authority of the Territorial Legislature to call this convention was acquiesced in by Governor Walker, Secretary Stanton, and the people of the Territory themselves; ay, sir, by no one more fully than by the distinguished Illinois Senator himself, in his Springfield speech, delivered but a short period before the Kansas convention assembled! I understand, however, that the Senator from Illinois has now abandoned most of the positions of his speech delivered upon the 9th December, and that he announces himself as "ready to waive all irregularity and vote for admission, if he was satisfied the Lecompton constitution was the act and deed of the people of Kansas, and embodied their will." Such I understood to be his position, as stated by him in reply to an inquiry by the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, during the debate in the other wing of the Capitol, but a few days since. If any other authority were wanted that an enabling act is unnecessary, it could be furnished in the opinion of Mr. Justice McLean, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who (in the case of Scott vs. Johnson, 5 Howard, 380) says:

"Michigan was an organized Territory of the United States. Its Governors, judges, and all other territorial officers were in the discharge of their various functions. The sovereignty of the Union extended to it. Under these circumstances, the people of Michigan assembled by delegates in convention, and adopted a constitution, and under it elected members of both branches of their Legislature, Governor, judges, and organized the State government. No serious objection need be made, in my judgment, to the assembling of the people in convention to form a constitution, although it is the more regular and customary mode to proceed under the sanction of an act of Congress."

It is a notable fact, too, and I commend it to the attention of the Republicans, who have heaped such opprobrium upon a majority of the Supreme Court for their opinion in the Dred Scott case, (where the entire court held that they had jurisdiction,) that, in the case of Scott vs. Johnson, the entire court, save Mr. Justice McLean, held they had no jurisdiction, yet he, notwithstanding, delivered his opinion on the merits without the slightest suspicion from any quarter upon his spotless escutcheon as a judge or a man. The case further shows that an act of incorporation passed by the Legislature of Michigan before its admission into the Union was held valid by the court of last resort in that State. It is urged, however, as a valid objection against the Lecompton convention, that a large number of counties were unrepresented in consequence of the want of a registry; and, therefore, that the convention was not a fair representative of the popular will. It has been abundantly shown that these counties contained but a small population, and many of them scarcely a solitary vote. Some of them were attached to adjacent counties for civil and military purposes.

I have already referred to the provisions of the law making just provision for a full, free, and fair expression of opinion in the convention. Why were not its provisions carried out? Why a failure to register in these unrepresented counties? Let Governor Stanton give the reply:

"It is not my purpose to reply to your statement of facts; I cannot do so from any personal knowledge enabling me either to admit or deny them. I may say, however, I have heard statements quite as authentic as your own, and in some instances from members of your own party, (Republicans,) to the effect that your political friends have very generally, indeed almost universally, refused to participate in the pending proceedings for registering the names of the legal voters. In some instances they have given fictitious names, and in numerous others they refused to give any names at all. You cannot deny that your party have heretofore resolved not to take part in the registration, and it appears to me that, without indulging ungenerous suspicions of the integrity of officers, you might well attribute any errors and omissions of the sheriffs to the existence of this well known and controlling fact."

It is here apparent that faction prevented the registry, and that the people who were not represented did not desire and would not have voted in the choice of representatives to this convention, if the registry had been complete. Mr. Chairman, if there had been any portion of the people of that Territory who had felt themselves disfranchised—who found themselves deprived of the right of suffrage—can it be conceived that they would not have sought a corrective of such abuses at the hands of the convention? Where are their petitions setting out these grievances, and detailing these wrongs? Where is the remonstrance of a solitary county, that they had been denied a voice in that convention? Where is the demand for the correction of the apportionment made by Governor Stanton, with a full knowledge that there had been no registry in the counties enumerated? Where is the complaint from a solitary being in that ill-fated Territory that the convention was illegally assembled, and asking the returns to be scrutinized? The convention was alone authorized to judge of the returns and qualifications of its members. It had the power to apply the corrective; and, in the absence of any appeal to its interposition, we are justified in believing that no portion of the people felt themselves aggrieved or desired to vote for representatives. It will scarcely be argued that this small body of recusant factionists, by refusing to be registered, and by preventing, through force, a proper execution of the registry law, could stop a popular movement having for its object the establishment of a State government. It is apparent that there is nothing in this objection.

It is warmly insisted on that the Lecompton constitution was not submitted to the people as a whole for their ratification, and therefore it is not the act of the people. This argument, if it proves anything, proves too much. It upturns the whole system of representative government; it limits the circle of free institutions; it denies to the people of a State or Territory the right to select agents to make a constitution for them without their subsequent approval. If the right does not exist to select representatives, then it follows that the people must act themselves. Where they cannot be collected to deliberate and act in the formation of a constitution and laws, their popular government must end. If the people cannot select agents to make constitutions, and agree to abide by their action without a submission, how is it that the State laws are valid without a submission? This, Mr. Chairman, is a new phase of popular sovereignty. I acknowledge the people to be the source of all power, and that every free government must rest for its support on the consent of the governed. But how is this power to be exercised? Are constitutions and laws to be enacted in mass meetings? Is sovereignty to be carried about the streets, and are the popular masses to act per capita? I had supposed it was "that marvelous felicity of our representative system," under the operation of prescribed forms of law, that entitled ours to be justly styled the model Republic of the world. I had been taught by Mr. Madison (the father of the Federal Constitution) to believe that the effect of representative government is

"To refine and enlarge the public views by passing them through the medium of a chosen body of citizens, whose wisdom may best discern the true interest of their country, and whose patriotism and love of justice will be least likely to sacrifice it to temporary or partial considerations. Under such a regulation, it may well happen that the public voice, pronounced by the representatives of the people, will be more consonant to public good than if pronounced by the people themselves, convened for the purpose."

Mr. Chairman, it would not be difficult to show that one of the advantages in the scheme of representation in a Republic, as contradistinguished from a pure democracy of numbers, consists in its power to control a faction. I refer to the tenth number of the Federalist, where Mr. Madison, in defense of the Federal Constitution, goes fully into this argument.

It does not pertain to Congress to inquire why the whole of this Kansas constitution was not submitted? While as individuals we might all desire, and, perhaps as members of that convention, should all vote for the submission of that entire constitution to the people, it was the sole right of the Lecompton convention to judge of the propriety of a submission or non-submission of the constitution in whole, or in part, to the people for ratification. The validity of the instrument could not be impaired by a failure to have submitted any part of it to the popular vote. The people, through their Legislature, had, in the convention act, a perfect right to have required the constitution to be submitted, and the act was, as we have already shown, vetoed by Governor Geary, because it did not contain a provision for its submission to the people. The act was passed by a two-thirds vote of the Legislature over his veto, and thus became a law.

Popular sovereignty was then, as it would clearly appear, against a submission of this constitution to the people; for it can hardly be supposed that two thirds of the Legislature misrepresented the popular will.

Mr. Stanton himself clearly recognized the right of the people, through chosen delegates, to adopt a constitution, and seems to regard it as optional with the convention what part of the constitution should be submitted to popular vote. Hear him when he says:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view of making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention. I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretexts for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institution, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference be thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress, without delay, as one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

Here Mr. Stanton clearly thought that the only question necessary to be submitted was the slavery question, and "that great distracting question" was submitted to the popular vote. Mr. Chairman, the people may have acted wisely and well in refusing to fetter the convention with an absolute submission. The history of Kansas has been thus far a bloody and disgraceful drama. Faction showed its brazen front upon the inception of the territorial government. The Kansas-Nebraska act had scarcely received the President's signature before an organized effort was inaugurated to sow discord in Kansas. Hear Mr. Douglass, in his report to the Senate, as chairman of the committee to investigate these outbreaks. He says:

"The passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act was strenuously resisted by all persons who thought it a less evil to deprive the people of new States and Territories of the right of State equality and self-government than to allow them to decide the slavery question for themselves, as every State of the Union had done, and must retain the undeniable right to do, so long as the Constitution of the United States shall to be maintained as the supreme law of the land. Finding opposition to the principles of the act unavailing in the halls of Congress and under the forms of the Constitution, combinations were immediately entered into in some portions of the Union to control the political destinies, and form and regulate the domestic institutions of those Territories and future States through the machinery of emigrant aid societies. In order to give consistency and efficiency to the movement, and surround it with the color of legal authority, an act of incorporation was procured from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts. When a powerful corporation, with a capital of $5,000,000, invested in houses and lands, in merchandise and mills, in cannon and rifles, in powder and lead, in all the implements of arts, agriculture, and war, and employing a corresponding number of men, all under the management and control of non-resident directors and stockholders, who are authorized by their charter to vote by proxy to the extent of fifty votes each, enters a distant and sparsely settled Territory with the fixed purpose of wielding all its power to control the domestic institutions and political destinies of the Territory, it becomes a question of fearful import how far the operations of the company are compatible with the rights and liberties of the people. Whatever may be the extent or limit of congressional authority over Territories, it is clear that no individual State has the right to pass any law or authorize any act concerning or affecting the Territories, which it might not enact in reference to any other State. It is a well-settled principle of constitutional law in this country that while all the States in the Union are united in one for certain purposes, yet each State, in respect to everything which affects its domestic policy and internal concerns, stands in the relation of a foreign Power to every other State. Hence, no State has a right to pass any law, or do or authorize any act with a view to influence or change the domestic policy of any other State or Territory of the Union, more than it would with reference to France or England, or any other foreign State with which we are at peace. Indeed, every State of this Union is under higher obligations to observe a friendly forbearance and generous comity towards each other member of the Confederacy than the laws of nations can impose on foreign States."

"If our obligations, arising under the law of nations, are so imperative as to make it our duty to enact neutrality laws, and to exert the whole power and authority of the executive branch of the Government, including the Army and Navy, to enforce them in restraining our citizens from interfering with the internal concerns of foreign States, can the obligations of each State and Territory of this Union be less imperative, under the Federal Constitution, to observe an entire neutrality in respect to the domestic institutions of the several States and Territories?"

These commotions continued. The excitement increased until insurrection, rebellion, and revolution stalked boldly throughout the Territory. Hear Governor Walker again, when he says:

"The professed object is to protect the polls at the election, in August, of the new insurgent Topeka State Legislature. The object of taking the names of all who refuse enrollment is to terrify the free-State conservatives into submission. This is proved by recent atrocities committed on such men by Topekaists. The speedy location of large bodies of regular troops here, with two batteries, is necessary; the Lawrence insurgents await the development of this new revolutionary military organization."

"You are aware that General Lane commanded the military expedition which made an incursion into this Territory last year, and that the officers of the staff are all leading agitators for the overthrow of the territorial government. The object of this last requisition is believed to be to mark for persecution and oppression all those persons, and especially free-State Democrats, who refuse to unite in this military organization. The purpose is universally regarded to be to establish a reign of terror."

"A few weeks since one of these conservative Democrats, who had committed no other offense than permitting the use of his name as a candidate for the constitutional convention, was abused and injured in the most shocking manner, and the most revolting atrocities were committed upon his wife by some of the insurrectionary party."

"It will be perceived that this military organization embraces the whole Territory, being arranged into four divisions and eight brigades." "I am well satisfied that a large portion of the insurrectionary party in this Territory do not desire a peaceful settlement of this question, but wish it to remain open, in order to agitate the country for years to come."

"August 18. The insurgent military organization under General Lane is still progressing. Arms are being supplied and his troops drilled for action. We are threatened with the seizure of the polls, at various points, by these insurgent forces. When it is remembered that the Topeka party claim to outnumber their opponents at least ten to one, the pretext for assembling these forces to protect the polls is evidently most fallacious."

But notwithstanding all factious opposition, the convention did submit the great and only distracting question of slavery to the popular vote.

Mr. Chairman, the responsibility of the submission of the constitution was wholly with the convention. It cannot be inquired into by Congress; and we have no right to intervene between the constituency of Kansas and their delegates to that constitutional convention.

It is claimed, however, that as a large majority of the people of Kansas did not vote on the 21st December when the constitution was submitted to the people under the authority of the convention, and the vote on the 4th January shows a very large majority against the constitution, Congress should desist and not force this constitution on the people against so large an expression of the popular will.

Mr. Chairman, this argument is more specious than solid. It rests on a radical mistake in the theory of our system of representative government. I argue that the popular will should govern, and that no government can be forced upon the people against their consent. But how is this will to be collected and ascertained? By popular outbreaks and tumultuous assemblies? No, sir; but by regular forms prescribed by law. The people begin the work of representative government by limitations on their own power not less than by restrictions on their agents. They limit themselves in their power of selection of representatives by requiring certain qualifications of age, residence, &c. Suffrage, which is the delegation of authority from each sovereign citizen of a community to his representative agent, is the foundation stone of our representative system. It is the channel through which power emanates from the masses. Suffrage itself is restricted and regulated by law. It is through prescribed forms of law that this inestimable right is guarded from force, fraud, and violence. It is by forms of law that this right is restricted to the time, place, manner, and mode of exercise therein prescribed. When all have spoken who are entitled to speak, their collected will under legal forms are certified to that power entitled by legal enactment to receive such certificate. Such return must be conclusive as the authentic and legally-prescribed mode of ascertaining the will of the people. Were it not so, the barriers placed by the people around their own institutions as a protection against faction, impulse, or fanaticism, would become mere ropes of sand, and we should be always in a state of anarchy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what right had the Territorial Legislature to direct a vote on the 4th of January? By what warrant of authority do they interpose between a convention called to frame a constitution and its constituency? The convention had directed a vote to be taken on the 21st of December upon the slavery clause of that constitution. They had ordained a State government by regular legal process. They had ordered an election of State officers under this constitution, to take place on the 4th of January; and the people, by a large vote for these officers, had acquiesced in this State government. I have already cited the case of Scott vs. Jones, (5 Howard, page 380,) to show that an act of the Legislature of Michigan, passed before her admission into the Union, was declared valid. The organic law of Kansas, upon its admission into the Union, would be of course treated as valid from its creation, and all the prior acts of the convention, or acts of the State Legislature under it, even before admission, would reach back to the period of their adoption. If the Lecompton convention be deemed a valid their recorded votes stated the fact that their constituents are unanimously against a State government, and in favor of a territorial organization? Do you not expect and require they shall sustain this Government, and become a part of it? If not, let us require their delegates to retire from this convention, apply to Congress for a territorial government, and exclude them from the State boundary. Gentlemen affect to believe that in taking a large extent of territory not represented here, and from which no opposition to our action has become known to us, we are doing a great act of injustice to that people, when, at the same moment, we have the direct protest against a State government of a portion of the territory here represented."

Mr. Chairman, I might go on and multiply extracts from those California debates, to show the irregularities and wrongs upon popular rights there perpetrated. Yes, sir, this immense boundary was included, by political legerdemain, and a government put over thousands who had never heard of this convention, merely to bring in this immense area of freedom, and shut it out from southern men. Sir, in the very early stages of the convention, eight out of thirty-six delegates voted and protested against a State government. Mr. Carillo said, (Debates, page 22:)

"He represented one of the most respectable communities in California, and he did not believe it to be the interest of his constituents that a State government should be formed. At the same time, as a great majority of this convention appeared to be in favor of a State government, he proposed that the country be divided by running a line west from San Luis Obispo, so that all north of that line might have a State government, and all south thereof a territorial government. He and his colleagues were under instructions to vote for a territorial government."

Yet, Mr. Chairman, California was brought in as a free State. Where then was the great solicitude for popular sovereignty of which we have heard so much in this debate? Why slept the ire of the opponents of Kansas, who then went for a free State under such irregularities and outrages? In vain did the South protest against so gross an injustice to her rights. California was brought in.

But gentlemen say that the constitution of California was submitted and ratified by the people. How ratified? It received some twelve thousand out of sixty-odd thousand votes, half of whom had never heard of the proclamation of General Riley, the convention, or the constitution! Yet gentlemen can take California, but reject Kansas because a few hundred people were not registered and represented in the Kansas convention; and when that failure was attributable, as has been abundantly shown, to faction. They can see California brought in over law, order, regularity, or precedent, with immense boundaries, included for the purpose of excluding slavery, and perpetuating the power of the North; and yet, when Kansas asks for admission, southern men who rejoiced over the admission of California are horrified at the want of an enabling act for Kansas, and at certain frauds alleged to have been committed at their elections in that Territory.

Mr. Chairman, no man entertains a higher personal regard than I do for the distinguished gentleman [Mr. CRITTENDEN] who in part represents the sovereignty of Kentucky in the other wing of this Capitol. He has been the recipient, for many long years, of the most distinguished honors which his native State could bestow, and his name prominently appears on the brightest pages of her history. Sir, that Senator is my personal friend. I heard him the other day, "more in sorrow than in anger," announce his purpose of ranging himself on this question with the anti-slavery hosts in this mighty hour of trial, when Kentucky and her southern sisters lie bound and helpless—their sovereignty and equality about to be crushed under the insatiate Juggernaut of abolitionism. Sir, that distinguished Senator was in the Cabinet of General Taylor, when the mighty injustice was done of dedicating the whole Pacific coast to freedom, in direct contravention of the rights of a large portion of the people of California, and under a protest from many of them against so gross a wrong! He was then for compromise. He rejoiced with his native State that patriotic counsels ruled the hour, and that the efforts of the great Commoner, backed by patriots from every section, had been successful in withdrawing from Congress the question of slavery, by leaving that question to be determined by the people themselves, and thereby becoming a second time prominent in preserving the bonds of our Union.

But now, when Kansas comes with a republican constitution, regularly ordained, through all the regular forms of law, because there is the semblance of slavery upon her brow, her request for admission is met with the slogan cry from the Republican ranks, "no more slave States." When the Senate Chamber is made to ring with the haughty and defiant notes of the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] that the controversy can "only be settled by the simple and direct admission of three new States as free States, without qualification, condition, reservation, or compromise, and by the abandonment of all further attempts to extend slavery under the Federal Constitution;" and ere the sound of these threatenings has died away, our Kentucky Senator deemed it proper to announce his regret at the repeal of the Missouri line—which he had looked on always as a measure of peace—and that he must still be allowed to entertain the opinion that it was constitutional, in despite of the decision of the Supreme Court against its validity.

Sir, the personal honor and high bearing of that distinguished Senator is above and beyond assault. Far be it from me to say anything unkind, or to impugn in the slightest degree the honest dictates of his judgment. He will pardon me, however, for asserting, on this floor, that these sentiments of his will find, in my judgment, no response in the hearts of a large majority of the people of Kentucky. Kentucky has played a prominent part in all the compromises which promised peace to the country and stability to the Union. The South has always adhered in good faith to every compromise. It was the North that has repudiated them. They refused to accede to the extension of the Missouri line to our Pacific possessions, and northern men have boasted that it was against the sentiment of the North that the Missouri line was ever adopted. A different principle was adopted by the compromise measures of 1850, which was itself a quasi repeal of the Missouri line; and when that principle came to be applied practically to Kansas, the North, for the first time, showed its respect for the Missouri restriction. We are now tauntingly told that slavery must find no foothold in any territory of this Government.

Mr. Chairman, no peans need be sung in behalf of Kentucky's devotion to the Union. From principle and from interest, she will cling to it as the noblest achievement for civil and religious liberty the world has ever seen. That Commonwealth knows no standard for the measurement of its value. But, sir, with the doctrines now advanced, the time for compromises of the Constitution have passed. Kentucky looks alone to the Constitution for safety. The day has already arrived when, behind its bulwarks, the true friends of the Union can intrench themselves for safety. Kentucky proves her devotion to the Union by the unanimity with which a large majority of her people, of all parties, are standing by the gallant Chief Magistrate of this nation, in his earnest and patriotic desires to preserve the guarantees of that Constitution by bringing Kansas in. Kentucky abhors sectionalism, and greets all with fellowship, from any portion of the Confederacy, who are willing to stand by the bond of that Union, and perform its requirements. She desires slavery to be forced upon nobody; but when a State presents herself with a requisite population, and a republican, though pro-slavery constitution, asking for admission; when patriots from the North and West are facing the storms of an angry fanaticism, bleeding at every pore, and periling their political existence in supporting the President in his noble efforts to extend to it a guaranteed right of admission, Kentucky insists that Kansas shall not be excluded upon flimsy pretexts, which have been disregarded over and over again, in the admission of free States.

Let not such a precedent be added to the powerful majority now held by the North. Do not permit fanaticism to justify itself, in its destructive warfare upon the Constitution, by citing this example, in support of further and still more alarming aggressions. Let Kansas be admitted. Localize this excitement by permitting the people of that Territory to settle these difficulties for themselves. Disarm the jealousy of our southern brethren, who have proclaimed that the rejection of Kansas would afford cause for a separation from the Union; and, by such united patriotic action, nerve the arms, and encourage the hearts, of that national organization of patriots of every party in every portion of the Union, upon whose strength and continuance rest the hopes of thirty million freemen.

Why keep open this strife? Why, by a refusal to settle this question, shall we afford to the enemies of the Democratic organization the weapons with which to weaken, if not destroy its nationality? If the majority in Kansas be as large as it is claimed, they will readily apply the corrective to all the alleged grievances. The period at which they have a right to change their government is a judicial question, with which Congress has no right to interfere. No free people yet, with a Legislative majority in accordance with the popular will, have ever yet failed to make the government represent that opinion. If wrongs have been committed, let the remedy be applied at the proper place, in the proper time, and by the proper parties. I deny to Congress any such power of interference in the affairs of a State. Admit Kansas, and the corrective for every injury will soon follow.

Mr. Chairman, the bitter strife which has resounded through this Hall for the past three months, betokens nothing of good to the perpetuity of free Government. For what purpose, and to what end, are these cruciminations and recriminations between representative brethren from the several sections of a great, glorious, and happy country? Their continued repetition must tend to weaken, rather than unite, the bonds of our holy fellowship. I was surprised to see in the printed speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MORRIS,] a total perversion of the position of the distinguished Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] on the power of the people of Kansas to change their constitution. I will not believe that this perversion was intentional; still, the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is scattered broadcast through the length and breadth of the land, with an utter misstatement of Mr. GREEN's true position. Though wholly unintentional, the injury is not thereby diminished.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, after combatting the position in the President's Kansas message, that the people of that Territory have a right to change their constitution, proceeds to say that the President's position is repudiated by the Senator from Missouri in the report for the admission of Kansas which he made in the Senate, and in support of this alleged repudiation the gentleman from Pennsylvania quotes the report, as follows:

"However grievous its provisions may prove to be, they cannot change without resorting to revolution until the year 1864."

This quotation would seem to support the text of the gentleman's speech, but the fact is not so. An examination of Mr. GREEN's report will show that this quotation does him the amplest injustice, and wholly misrepresents his true position. It will be seen that the quotation from the report of Mr. GREEN, as set out in the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, begins in the middle of a sentence, and thereby makes Mr. GREEN deny the right of the people to change their constitution until 1864, when, if the whole paragraph, and a few succeeding ones had been quoted, it would have shown that the Senator from Missouri was, in that portion of the report from which the quotation was taken, supporting the view of the President. I propose to make this manifest by the following quotation from the report itself, as follows:

"Many generous persons, who are quite indisposed to countenance the violence and contumacy of the Abolitionists sent into Kansas for the purpose of excluding therefrom all persons not pleasing to them and their abettors, urge that something might be done to lessen the hardships that will fall upon them in the event of the admission of Kansas into the Union with the constitution made at Leecompton; that, although it is true the Abolitionists violently opposed registration, would not vote at elections, held sham elections on days subsequent to those appointed by law, and even refused to vote against the establishment of slavery, at a time when they professed to believe their doing so would have excluded it, and thus have peacefully settled the question to their own satisfaction, yet they consider it would be too severe to compel such contumacious citizens, even though it is their own fault, to live under a constitution which, however grievous its provisions may prove, they cannot change without resorting to revolution, until the year 1864."

It will be seen that it is the last two lines of the

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Gilmer.

HO. OF REPS.

above paragraph that were quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It was not Mr. GREEN's argument, but that of "many generous persons." Mr. GREEN gives two answers to the paragraph quoted, as follows:

"To such, without resorting to the ready answer that Congress has no power to modify or alter a State constitution, and has expressly stipulated that the people of Kansas shall be permitted to form their own institutions, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, two replies may be given. The first one is this: the clause complained of in the Lecompton constitution, in this connection, is in these words:

He then proceeds to give the provision in the Lecompton constitution, and says:

"That this provision is not objectionable to the Abolitionists, in fact, and is now urged by them and their friends only for popular effect, is proved by the overwhelming fact that the Abolitionists of Kansas inserted in their 'Topeka constitution' the following more objectionable provision:

"Amendments to the Constitution.—Article xvi.

"SECTION 1. All propositions for amendments to the constitution shall be made by the General Assembly.

"SEC. 2. A concurrence of two thirds of the members elected to each House shall be necessary, after which such proposed amendments shall be entered upon the journals with the yeas and nays; and the Secretary of State shall cause the same to be published in at least one newspaper in each county in the State where a newspaper is published, for at least six months preceding the next election for Senators or Representatives, when such proposed amendment shall be again referred to the Legislature elected next succeeding said publication. If passed by the second Legislature by a majority of two thirds of the members elected to each House, such amendments shall be republished, as aforesaid, for at least six months prior to the next general election, at which election such proposed amendments shall be submitted to the people for their approval or rejection; and if the majority of the electors voting at such election shall adopt such amendments, the same shall become a part of the constitution.

"SEC. 3. When more than one amendment is submitted at the same time, they shall be so submitted as to enable the electors to vote upon each amendment separately.

"SEC. 4. No convention for the formation of a new constitution shall be called, and no amendment to the constitution shall be, by the General Assembly, made before the year 1865, nor more than once in five years thereafter."

And then Mr. GREEN proceeds as follows:

"The second reply is this: suppose the grievance real, and that it ought to be redressed, it is unnecessary for Congress to unlawfully interfere for that purpose, inasmuch as the Lecompton convention has provided a full, lawful, and perfect remedy for every conceivable grievance, and placed that remedy in the unrestricted hands of a majority of the people, by inserting in the constitution of Kansas the following distinct and unequivocal recognition of power:

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

"The Abolitionists of Kansas have thus far sought power by methods unknown to the law and by violence, and not through the peaceful agency of the ballot-box. Claiming to have a majority of the voters of the Territory, and therefore able to elect Legislatures and conventions, they yet ask Congress to wrongfully do for them what they may, at legal times and legal places, rightfully do for themselves, that is, change or abolish their constitution."

Thus it will be seen how an erroneous quotation, however unintentional, may do injustice to a gentleman's position, and how easily, by a true quotation of all the text, the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORRIS] is answered. By such arguments and quotations from his own manuscript the fate of the Senator from Missouri might be made to resemble that of Zadis in Voltaire's tale. A fragment of paper was found containing these verses, in his own hand-writing:

"By crimes of deepest dye
He's of the throne possessed;
'Gainst peace and liberty
An enemy professed;"

and these lines were construed into a seditious and traitorous libel against the reigning Prince. But as they were leading poor Zadis to execution, a parrot flew to the place with another fragment, which saved his life; for it exactly fitted the former, and on it were written other words, which entirely changed the complexion of the supposed libel. The whole read thus:

"By crimes of deepest dye we've seen the earth made hell;
He's of the throne possessed who all these powers can quell;
'Gainst peace and liberty love only wages war—
An enemy professed, and one we well may fear."

This effort to condemn the Senator from Missouri out of his own mouth, as opposing the President's view, signally failed. Thousands, however, throughout the land, who read the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, will go to their graves believing that the President, and the member on Territories who made the majority report, are in direct antagonism on the question of a power in the people of Kansas to change their constitution.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN A. GILMER, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. GILMER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have been an attentive listener to the arguments on this Lecompton question for three months. Whilst some of the speeches have been calm and considerate, I feel constrained to say that by far the larger number have been violent and extremely sectional, tending directly to weaken the respect which the North and the South should have for each other, and which is essential to the safety of the Union itself. I have heard and read speeches delivered both in this House, and in the other end of this Capitol, by gentlemen from the North and from the South, the true spirit and meaning of which is disunion.

True, most, if not all, profess to love the Union and the Constitution. Their speeches are filled with expressions of high veneration for the Constitution of our fathers. They indulge in patriotic strains. Their addresses are robed in the most beautiful habiliments, overflowing with professions and assurances most imposing. The spirit of disunion is, however, the core. It is presented, and perusal and handling secured, as you would an asp in a casket of beautiful flowers. The design is evidently to infuse the poisonous spirit of disunion where, for it, there could be no reception, were proper labels attached. Professions of patriotism are uttered in loud and eloquent tones, for peace and harmony, whilst the evident drift is to exasperate and make wider the breach.

With pain and regret am I forced to the belief there are gentlemen on this floor who, while they oppose the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, do really desire the bill to pass for the sake of certain consequences, disastrous to the peace and harmony of the country, which they expect to grow out of it.

On the other hand, I fear that, among other gentlemen advocating this measure, there are some whose regret is that the Lecompton constitution, and the manner of securing its presentation here, were not more odious to the people of Kansas and the free States, so that their ultimate object might be the sooner secured by a bloody conflict of northern and southern arms on the plains of Kansas, and, in case of a failure in this, such bitter sectional excitement shall certainly ensue as to produce a fusion of all political parties in the free States, combined as a purely sectional party, against a similar fusion of all parties in the slave States, by which disunion is made certain in the end. These speeches I will not particularize. They have unfortunately gone forth to the country—those of the North to be read in the South, that they there may have samples of how northern people hate and despise southern men, and those of the South to be read in the North that they may know how they are scorned and detested by the citizens of the South.

The designs and purposes of both sides, it is to be feared, are the same—to arouse, drill, and prepare for strife the minds of a great people now happy, with bright prospects for the future; and who, by their united energies in advancing the industrial and literary pursuits of the whole country, are doing much more for the true happiness and prosperity of us all.

Without intending to be offensive or personal, I must be permitted to say, I envy not the man who can look on our country as it is, and, with composure, anticipate its condition when severed and divided. The man who can contemplate that terrible day, when, by reason of civil war, our beautiful and growing cities, towns, and villages shall be consumed by fire; our manufactories razed to the ground; our commerce broken up; our lovely fields and gardens made the foraging grounds for ribaldrous soldiery; all international trade and communication cut off; all municipal and family peace destroyed; our sons dragged from their homes, amid the sighs and tears of affectionate mothers and sisters, to the bloody fields of civil strife; and all this growing out of a question as to how, when, or in what manner forty thousand people, ONLY, in Kansas shall settle for themselves their own domestic affairs; or, rather, how they shall soonest get clear of a few slaves—and get two "Free-Soil" Senators and one Representative in Congress; I say, such a man has no feeling in common with me, and none, I trust, with the great body of the honest yeomanry of this country, of all sections.

We have our troubles, I admit. We have had sectional troubles of a similar kind before. We have had, as now, disunion threatened, but thanks to the good sense of the people, they have never yet inclined to take the prescriptions of those who boastingly decline to sing peans to the Union?

England, from whom we derive our nature and many of the free principles of which we boast, had her troubles. She has had her dissensions—her white and red roses; her land has been tinged with blood in civil strife; and once the head of her King was brought to the block—but her people were attached to their Government and their constitution. The storm passed away. The political atmosphere again became pure and healthful; and the Government was maintained and improved. And it is my honest conviction that there is too much good sense in the people of these United States to be led away with the idea of disunion, on account of any difficulties growing out of this question, surrounded by such peculiar circumstances. I predict they will not, unless misled and deceived. But, figuratively speaking, they will bring to the block the political heads of all who shall insist on any such remedy for such complaint.

Mr. Chairman, it is not to be disguised that our southern people are anxious about appearances for the future. They see the free States, in number and in representation, already in the majority in both Houses of Congress, and this majority soon to be largely increased; that while the South falls into this minority, they have witnessed, for the last few years, among many people of the free States, an increasing spirit of bitter hostility to the South and her institutions. But let us, like statesmen, be calm, briefly trace the history of this thing, and inquire why it is. Though by the census, the actual figures show that the natural increase of population in the slave States has been equal to the natural native increase of the free States, yet the free States have excelled us in the settlement of new Territories and raising up new States.

In the first place, we of the southern States have been, and now are, the advocates of free trade, and many for direct taxes. We have opposed the policy of discrimination in favor of our own domestic industry in the old States, in regulating and raising revenue, and no more than enough to defray the expenses of the Government economically administered.

To this policy we have made in substance, successful opposition—thereby in a good degree cutting off much of the inducement that would have retained the industrious and energetic population in the old States, who, in consequence, have moved to the Territories, there settled, made new and free States, and became producers instead of consumers of the earth's productions.

In the second place, a majority of southern politicians have uniformly favored the policy of inviting, alluring, persuading, and, in fact, hiring emigrants—not only the citizens of the States, but of the whole world—to move and settle in our Territories. Homesteads, by way of preëmtions, in the Territories, are offered to all the world. The language of the whole policy is in substance "come ye all the earth and settle in our Territories; here you can become citizens, and without waiting to be naturalized, according to the laws of the Union, you can vote and hold office;" the result of which has been to run from the old States (slave and free) into the Territories, much of their population, and particularly that portion, though young, industrious, and worthy, who have, or take but little interest in the institutions of the South; and besides, we find growing out of this, that hundreds of thousands of foreigners are flocking to us every year; that foreign paupers are by thousands and thousands being set upon our shores. In fact, I find from the best official statements, that the number of foreign emigrants that came to this country from June 1, 1850, to December 31, 1851, was five hundred and fifty-eight thousand; for the year 1852, three hundred and seventy-five thousand; for the year 1853, three hundred and sixty-eight thousand; for the year 1854, nearly the same. The war in the East diminished the number, but I venture the prediction that between the years 1850 and 1860 there will have come to this country foreigners enough to place in each of twenty new States more population than is now in the Territory of Kansas. These foreigners make their way mainly to the Territories, or crowd into the free States, occasioning increased emigration from them.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Gilmer.

Ho. of REPS.

These facts being undeniable, I submit, how important it is for our southern politicians to turn their attention to them! While the people of the North were willing to dispense with and check this immense immigration among them, for reasons of a social character, to diminish their taxes, prosecutions, and the inmates of their poor-houses, jails, and penitentiaries, I respectfully ask, why should not the South, to a man, for reasons as well understood as expressed, have joined in this great movement? and if in the first movements and organizations any rules were adopted too strict or too stringent to be generally enforced, or too severe on the honest immigrant, to have given their potent aid and influence in modifying the same, so as to have carried most useful results to our beloved South? But it has been their pleasure to pursue a different course, and the results thereof have, in no small degree, contributed to the embarrassing circumstances that now seem to gather around us and swallow up our influence in the national council. The argument has been, "settle and populate the Territories," forgetting the fact that in the last seventy-five years our population has increased from three to some twenty-seven millions, ninefold, and if the same ratio of increase shall obtain for the next seventy-five years, the result will be nine times twenty-seven millions, showing how important these Territories may be (sold at reasonable prices paid into the Treasury) for the homes of our own posterity, and of honest worthy foreigners, who come to us as they did in former days, from a love of our free Government, and who are willing to settle among us, sure of being protected in all their rights of religion and property, and who are willing to wait until they have understood and become familiar with our people and their institutions before claiming the right to participate in their government.

These suggestions I have made to southern gentlemen here, and throughout the slave States, that on reflection they may determine whether they have not been remiss in failing to come to the aid of a cause quite material to southern influence and southern interests.

I was very much entertained, Mr. Chairman, by the speech of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. SANDIDGE,] and, if I had time, I should like to incorporate at least half of it in mine, to show, in addition to the millions that have already come, how many more millions of paupers are to come under our present system of inviting them to come here.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is it that we have been discussing here for the last ninety days? This discussion has been either intentionally or accidentally conducted so as to bring out the extreme sectional views of gentlemen from the South and from the North. It is only within the last eight or ten days that any conservative man has been permitted to address the House on this agitated question. It is said that this is a question whether any more slave States shall come into this Union, and speech after speech is made and sent to the South to tell the southern people that we are solemnly debating in the House of Representatives the naked question whether any more slave States shall come into the Union.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if that were true, if that were the only question here, it might have been settled within twenty-four hours after this debate commenced. If that were the only question, I take it that all our American friends would vote for it; every man from the South would vote for it; I know that our Douglas Democrats would vote for it; and I am inclined to think that the Free-Soil wing of the Democracy—these Buffalo platform men—could be got to vote for it, with a Green amendment. That is my opinion.

But, Mr. Chairman, is that the question? On what has this debate arisen? On the special message of the President. Does he say that whether there shall be any more slave States is the question? No, sir; that message, as I understand it, means these two things—and it means nothing more and nothing less—to the South, "come in Lecompton," and to northern gentlemen, "it is the surest and readiest way, and the only certain way, in which you can confiscate southern property and get clear of negroes in Kansas." I have listened to gentlemen here professing great regard for the interests of the South, and, while all of them have been eloquent on the first part of the picture, they have all, save and except a gentleman from the chivalrous State of South Carolina, passed over that portion as tenderly as sucking doves. [Laughter.] I will read from the President's message, in order that there may be no mistake about it:

"As a question of expediency, after the right has been maintained, it may be wise to reflect upon the benefits to Kansas and the whole country, which would result from its immediate admission into the Union, as well as the disasters which may follow its rejection. Domestic peace will be the happy consequence of its admission: and that fine Territory, which has hitherto been torn by dissensions, will rapidly increase in population and wealth, and speedily realize the blessings and the comforts which follow in the train of agricultural and mechanical industry. The people will then be sovereign, and can regulate their own affairs in their own way. If a majority of them desire to abolish domestic slavery within the State, there is no other possible mode by which this can be effected so speedily as by prompt admission. The will of the majority is supreme and irresistible, when expressed in an orderly and lawful manner. They can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure. It would be absurd to say that they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove. If they could do this, they might tie their own hands for a hundred as well as for ten years. These are fundamental principles of American freedom, and are recognized, I believe, in some form or other, by every State constitution; and if Congress, in the act of admission, should think proper to recognize them, I can perceive no objection to such a course. This has been done emphatically in the constitution of Kansas. It declares in the bill of rights, that 'all political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper.' The great State of New York is at this moment governed under a constitution framed and established in direct opposition to the mode prescribed by the previous constitution. If, therefore, the provision changing the Kansas constitution after the year 1864, could by possibility be construed into a prohibition to make a change previous to that period, this prohibition would be wholly unavailing. The Legislature already elected may, at its very first session, submit the question to a vote of the people, whether they will or will not have a convention to amend their constitution, and adopt all necessary means for giving effect to the popular will."

"It has been solemnly adjudged, by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Kansas is, therefore, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. Without this, the equality of the sovereign States composing the Union would be violated, and the use and enjoyment of a Territory, acquired by the common treasure of all the States, would be closed against the people and the property of nearly half the members of the Confederacy."

And then he concludes with this very cheering doctrine for southern men and southern interests:

"Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas, except by means of a constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be obtained so promptly, if a majority of the people desire it, as by admitting it into the Union under its present constitution."

The President points out the way in advance. He stimulates the Free-Soilers in Kansas to dislike the constitution. He requests this prompt means of getting slavery out of Kansas to be recognized in the bill of admission.

Here is the message. I submit it to the chairman, to the committee, and to southern men—suppose, that instead of having the name of James Buchanan attached to it, it had had the name of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, JOSHUA R. GIBBINGS at the end of it, I ask, if that name had been attached, whether it would not have been an entirely different case? We would pronounce it a rank abolition document. And yet, sir, our southern friends come up here and talk about associating with Abolitionists, and of hugging abolition doctrines as a sweet morsel! Why, Mr. Chairman, the whole thing in that message is, "in with Kansas—out with slavery in Kansas," and identically the same thing is in the Senate bill, that the South is called upon to rally as one man to the support of. I have asked many of our Lecompton friends if this Green amendment, which they have got in the bill, speaks the language of this message? Some say no, others say it does; and there is another class who give the answer the girl gave to her mother, when asked, if a certain gentleman was courting her; she replied, "it is a sorter so, and a sorter not so, and rather more a sorter so than a sorter not so." [Laughter.] Now, that amendment is a very little thing—only a few lines. There is not much of it, but I tell you I never read it over but it reminds me very much of the boy who was scolded for not making the potato hills on a wet morning large enough. "Well, dad," said he, "it is a fact that they are small, but I tell you they have got a darned sight of dirt in them." [Laughter.] Sir, if this is a pill gilded over to make it acceptable to some Green men, southern men ought to be ashamed of it. I know that this peculiar policy is practiced in our little electioneering scuffles in our country, and I suppose everywhere else, but I never supposed it ought to obtain in the Congress of our nation. Once when I charged a friend of mine with having said some foolish things in a speech which he had made, and told him that I thought he had hurt our cause, he said: "Ah, Gilmer, you do not know the folks as well as I do. A great many people are like a nest of young birds; if you tap the side of the tree, they'll open their mouths, and swallow the worm down." [Laughter.]

Southern men supposed that we had got something by the Dred Scott decision. I, for one, as a southern man, thought we had obtained something; I thought that we had got upon safe ground; that we had perfect equality in the Territories; that we could go there with our institutions and our property, and be just as safe there as the men who go there from any other section with any other species of property. But if this is the meaning, if this is the result of the Dred Scott decision, then those of us who go into the Territories with our slave property, have to run two chances—first that the people may exclude us when they come to form their constitution, and if they do not run us out at first, then whenever the majority of the people desire it, they may run us and our negroes out. And this is the doctrine upon which the South is to stand; this is the doctrine, mark you, which Alabama and other States are to go out of the Union on, if they cannot get. It is not from any objection to the constitution of Kansas, that I, as a southern man, oppose her admission. I would be pleased that we could fairly and properly get slavery permanently in Kansas. But I object to this doctrine, that we can be protected in our property while in partnership during the territorial state, but the moment we become an incorporation—a State—every man that owns joint stock is instantly liable by constitutional provision to have his property confiscated. And this is the doctrine which we have been told here, month after month, and day after day, that every southern man must stand upon; otherwise he is an Abolitionist and opposed to the interests of the South!

Mr. Chairman, what is the question which has agitated the country for the last four years? It is one that has taken up the entire attention of Congress. We have been figuring about it until, I believe, not only the country but the Government itself is upon the verge of bankruptcy. This question commenced with two faces—one for the Free-Soil Democrats of the North, and one for the South; and the same, identical double face is in this bill, and I will detain the committee only for a moment, while I refer them to some history of it. We had our troubles some years ago growing out of the discussion of the compromise measures. In January, 1851, the venerable fathers of the land, Whigs and Democrats, gathered together, with Henry Clay at their head, and drew up a pledge to the country that from and after that day their influence would be exerted against every man for office, State or Federal, who would refuse to stand upon the platform of the adjustment measures of 1850. The people rallied to that standard. The Democratic convention met in Baltimore in 1852; the Whig convention met at the same place, and they both bowed down at the same altar of peace upon this agitating question. They reaffirmed in substance what Mr. Fillmore said in December, 1851—that this compromise of 1850 should be a finality, and there should be no more agitation of the slavery question in or out of Congress. To that both of the leading parties were pledged to the country. They put their candidates upon that platform. General Pierce was elected. He was installed. Unfortunately, however, he, in a short time, made some injudicious appointments—he turned out the true Democrats of the North, men who I am proud to find standing in the same ranks they did then. Van Buren, Dix, Cochrane & Co., the Buffalo platform men, were then coming in, and the party was about to break up. Something had to be done. The Administration was going down. A prescription had to be made. It was given; and on the principle that you prescribe to one choked with a turnip—get him to swallow a pumpkin, and it would relieve him. [Laughter.] They went upon this Cincinnati platform. I am not going to detain the committee to show how our friends viewed it in the South. That is well known. I desire to show how the matter stands with the Administration, to show what the Democratic Free-Soilers said before, afterwards, and all the time. A few months before the Cincinnati convention met, a distinguished Free-Soiler wrote to the North. Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Woodbury, and all these noisy men of the Buffalo convention, began to give evidence that they wanted to return to their friends. Here is one. I give it as a fair specimen of their letters and speeches. It is the letter of Hon. C. C. Cambreleng to William H. Ludlow, Esq., dated Huntington, December 8, 1855:

HO. OF REPS.

"MY DEAR SIR: Even southern men in Kansas acknowledge that it will inevitably be a free State. THIS IS THE LAST STRUGGLE FOR SLAVERY; for the half dozen Territories remaining are already free, and will remain so."

"There would not have been half the trouble about Kansas, but for Atchison's struggle to get back into the Senate. As the question now stands, there ought to be no difficulty whatever in uniting the Democratic party for the principle of the Nebraska and Kansas bill—squatter sovereignty—whatever its origin, gives us every Territory belonging to the United States; and all we have now to insist upon is, that it shall be honestly enforced; that Kansas shall have fair play. Practically, there is no difference worth quarreling about."

"It appears to me to be perfectly absurd for us to be grumbling about 'squatter sovereignty' at the present time, when squatter sovereignty will make free every inch of territory now belonging to the United States."

"After the acquisition of California, with the prospect of the addition of more Mexican territory, when General Cass proposed the doctrine of non-intervention, it was an important question, as it might have led to the introduction of many slave States; but after the South had been completely convinced by California's declaration in favor of freedom, we had no reason to object to the doctrine of non-intervention, or squatter sovereignty. We have now, besides Kansas and Nebraska, New Mexico, Utah, Minnesota, Oregon, and Washington, making seven Territories, which will give us seven free States. Some think the fate of Kansas doubtful; but the invasion of the Missouri routes, independent of natural causes, will make it a free State. These borderers came over first to vote for pro-slavery men; the second time to vote against them in the location of the capital; and the third time to make a blunder under Shannon, plunder the people, and drink whisky."

"Under such circumstances I cannot conceive what we can possibly gain by resisting a principle which has hitherto excluded slavery from our Territories."

"The slaveholders will not get Kansas, and they are now deprived of the pretext of going into the Territories south of 36° 30', under that compromise. They generally opposed non intervention on that ground, and contended for carrying the compromise line to the Pacific ocean. It is certainly not for our interest now to have that compromise line restored. Why the South should have voted for its repeal is a question for themselves to settle. They all, at the time, admitted that Kansas would never be a slave State. I hope our friends will meet the issue boldly, and leave the question of State organization to the people of the Territory, who have the natural and best right to decide for themselves."

"Let the squatters settle—but insist that that principle of the Nebraska act shall be honestly carried out; that the squatters shall have fair play, and shall not be controlled by invaders from Missouri, or any military power whatever. As to more slave States, there are none in prospect; and it is useless to embarrass ourselves by anticipating questions which may or may not arise."

Now, sir, these two wings are standing to-day exactly where they stood before. Tell me, if you please, why these men you are hugging to your bosom on the other side, stand with you? these men who were, and now are, rank Free-Soilers?

Tell us why the Green amendment is admitted? Which would you rather have for your bed-fellows? I tell you the difference is very much like the slave's reply when asked whether Jim and Mose were not very much alike. He said, "Yes, very much alike, indeed; and particularly Mose." [Laughter.] It is not so much, I fear, that they care about getting negroes into Kansas, or getting them out. It is not any principle of this kind. It is, I apprehend, a mere contrivance by which jobbing has been carried on in this country to keep certain men in power. In fact this whole management and shuffling reminds me of what occurred in one of our North Carolina towns some years ago. A silly fellow declared himself a candidate for town constable. The boys had a circular printed for him. It was printed on both sides like this—with Lecompton on one side, and Green upon the other. On one side he addressed himself to the debtors: "Fellow-citizens, vote for me, and if I am elected constable, I will never force you to payment, even at any extremity." On the other side was an address to the creditors: "If you will come up and vote for me, and I shall be elected, I promise, upon my honor, I will have your money paid, in every instance, at the drop of a hat."

Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to detain this committee with a review of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case. All I have to say is this: that my views upon the constitutionality of the Missouri compromise were known long before that decision was made; and I thought that the compromise was not in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution. Although my opinion inclines to that of the Supreme Court, and did before the decision was made, yet, from the length of time it had been a compromise, I was disposed to look upon it as a compromise which had better be abided by. As in the case of two neighbors whose boundary line is in dispute—a boundary which can only be settled by the provisions of a deed; and no agreement they might make by parol would change the line fixed by the deed, any more than any agreement between two sections of the country by Congress could be changed. But when the neighbors have established a line by parol agreement, staked and chopped it off, and have lived in peace, harmony, and prosperity under it for more than thirty years, if they should come to me and ask my advice whether they should break up this old landmark—now the true line being ascertained by the deed—and go back to their rights according to law, I should say, as a man, a neighbor, and as a Christian, also, that they had better let the old landmarks stand, and abide by them, and by no means revive old disputes and quarrels. So with the case of this Missouri compromise. I do not believe the South is going to gain anything by its repeal, and I firmly believe that the only reward the South will ever get from its repeal will be to her injury, and anything but an advantage to her true interests.

But it is said that the only way to pacify the country is to admit no amendments to this bill; that it cannot be bettered; that in no way can it be improved; that it has got to be passed in the shape in which it is presented, even though a proposition should be presented, which, if carried out, would more effectually pacify and quiet the country, and settle the whole question. Why, say they, it would be intervention. Now, let me detain the committee a moment, to show how ridiculous that idea is. What is this thing of non-intervention? Why, is it intervention to leave the people of a Territory perfectly free and untrammelled to settle this, with all other questions, in their own way, fairly and properly, subject only to the Constitution of the United States?

Now, sir, do we consider it any intervention, in the case of a trial by jury, after the verdict is announced, to set the same aside, and grant a new trial upon affidavits which clearly prove and satisfy the judge that the verdict was obtained by fraud, by perjury, by deception, or by any malpractices? Is it any intervention for an honest and conscientious judge, after being satisfied of the facts by reliable affidavits, to say that he doubted whether the verdict had been fairly obtained, and in the exercise of the discretion which is vested in him, decided to grant a new trial, in order that justice might be done? Is that an interference with the right of trial by jury? And suppose a jury is empaneled to settle the question, and they come back to the judge, and one of the jury gets up and says the verdict is so and so, and another says it is not so, and the judge tells them, "gentlemen, you had better retire, get together again and consult, and agree upon your verdict, and, when you come in, it will be recorded;" is that any interference? I wanted to show how ridiculous this idea is. Is that intervention? What are GREEN's and PUGH's amendments? Let our northern anti-slavery men, of all parties, understand that the President of the United States has given a true construction to the Dred Scott decision, and you will never have any more fuss about this matter from them. The President says it means that when the people of any State see proper to get together in a legal way, to get up a convention sanctioned by law, a mere majority vote of their assembly Free-Soil, they may form a constitution and the negroes will all slope. That is giving the Abolitionists a new cue, and one which will run out the institution of my beloved section from all the Territories, certainly, and endanger it in many of the States.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to look upon this question without reference to any section, or how it will affect any body other than the general good and peace of the whole country. If no other plan can be devised and agreed on, I may feel myself constrained to vote for the measure, being urged by southern friends and sectional pressure. And if I do, the Green amendment stricken out, it will not be (and I say it here) a measure which my sound judgment can approve as the better plan. If I could, I would put the whole responsibility upon the Democracy, where it belongs; for I do believe if they would relax a little, and honestly set their heads to work with our southern friends and other conservative men in this House, this whole matter might be put upon a footing entirely satisfactory to the South, to the East, to the West, to the North; satisfactory to the people of Kansas, and without any compromise of any principle, substantially in the manner indicated by me heretofore.

I must say that when I hear it asserted here and everywhere, and the proofs strongly tending to show, that the government of Kansas was, in the first instance, ruthlessly snatched from the people, unconstitutional test oaths applied, by which the minority, who by fraud obtained the control of the government, and by which the majority were kept from participating in the government; when I am told, and the proof tends that way, that not more than one half of the counties of the Territory were permitted to be represented in the convention, I doubt the propriety of supporting the constitution framed thus. I dissent from the idea that a majority of the counties of any State can make a constitution that is binding on the minority of counties who did not have a chance to be represented in the convention. Why have you more judges than one? It is not simply for the sake of numbers, but that there may be conference, argument, interchange of views. We may be to-day all inclined one way, and to-morrow a greater and better mind than any of us, representing but one district, may make a suggestion sufficient to change the opinion of the whole Congress. We know that the election of the 4th of January was recognized by the Secretary of State, who gave instructions that that very election should be fairly held, and the votes fairly and impartially taken; that vote turns out to be over ten thousand against the constitution. We are told, too, and assured, that the Legislature of the Territory, representing the will of the people, are unanimously protesting against this thing; and we are also told that the whole constitution rests on fraud, deception, and violence. And permit me to say further, as a southern man, that, when I see my southern friends on the special committee in this matter declining to obey the instructions of the House, and shrinking from inquiry, it leaves the suspicion stronger on my mind that these reports are true. I hope that they are not. I hope that the deeds perpetrated there have not been so horrible as they have been represented; but when I see chivalrous gentlemen, from my own section of the Union, turning their back upon an investigation, and saying that we had better not look into these things, I take it for granted there is more in these assertions than I before supposed. But, sir, this special committee was directed to do another thing. That was, to tell us whether this Territory had within its confines ninety-three thousand inhabitants. Now, I ask every man here, on what figures, and on what evidence, he can satisfy his mind that there are ninety-three thousand in Kansas? What was the last census?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Twenty-three thousand.

Mr. GILMER. How long ago was that?

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Last June.

Mr. GILMER. Then where, I appeal to southern men, do you get the requisite ninety-three thousand population? But they come forward and say that the Republicans wanted to have Kansas admitted under the Topeka constitution, and therefore they are estopped. And they also say that at the last Congress our Democratic friends undertook to pass an enabling act, and therefore they are estopped. Well, that may apply to the Republicans, and may get them out of court. It may very well apply to our Democratic southern friends, and turn them out of court. But what are they going to do with the poor Americans? We say that the Republicans were mistaken, and that that was only a movement of intemperate zeal. We want to know what the facts are. I venture to say that there are not four individuals there to every single voter. The experience of this country shows that in a Territory where there are but few females, and few old or very young persons, the voters are in the ratio of not more than one to every three or four. Well, now, take the ten thousand voters, and multiply that figure by three, and you have but thirty thousand of population there. Multiply it by four, and you have but forty thousand. Multiply it by five, and you have but fifty thousand. Multiply it by six—what we all know is far beyond the ratio—and you have only got sixty thousand. And yet here are southern gentlemen—men who want to protect the equality of southern representation in Congress—coming forward here in hot haste, and denouncing as an Abolitionist every man who will not consent to allow the thirty or forty thousand quarreling people of Kansas to come in as a State, and to send here two Jim Lanes and somebody else like them to vote in the Congress of the United States; and that all for southern interest!

That, mark you, is advancing the great interests of the South! I know where is not a man here who can say that he has evidence that there is a population of ninety-three thousand people in the Territory of Kansas. The fact is not so; and the fact that our southern friends, having the control of the special committee, declined to inquire into that important point, proves that it is not so.

But, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say, in conclusion, that we are not left in the dark and without precedents as to the proper course to be pursued in a difficulty of this kind. Kentucky, after several attempts, was admitted into the Union, and allowed to frame her constitution subsequently, in her own way. So, I believe now that Kansas should be allowed to come into the Union, and that she should be allowed to settle this question and frame a constitution for herself. Do this, and Kansas will be satisfied, the House will be satisfied, and the whole Union will be satisfied.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. P. MILES,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MILES obtained the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask my friend from South Carolina to suspend until the Black Republicans have finished congratulating the gentleman from North Carolina. [Mr. GILMER.]

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on the subject of Kansas, I feel embarrassed by two difficulties, either of which might well be sufficient to deter me from addressing a legislative assembly. The first is, that the subject has been so long and thoroughly discussed in all its aspects and bearings—every fact, argument, and illustration pertaining to it has been so completely exhausted—that it seems next to impossible to say anything which has not already been said, and better said than I can hope to do it. The second is, that I feel—as every honorable member upon this floor must feel—that nothing which may be now adduced in debate can possibly change a single vote. The issue has been made up. The position of every one of us is fixed and determined. It merely remains to put the decision of this House formally upon record. But though this be so, still, on a great and important public question, involving momentous issues to the country at large, and grave as well as nice constitutional points, it is natural, as well as proper, that the Representatives of every constituency should desire to express their views, and record their convictions.

The question of the admission of Kansas into this Confederacy of States is a mixed question of expediency and of principle. Were we governed simply by considerations of expediency, it might well be doubted whether the condition of things in that unhappy Territory—the sparsity and character of her population, the general instability and uncertainty of her internal affairs, the violence, recklessness, and lawlessness which have long prevailed in her borders, to so great a degree as to tempt the most casual looker-on to exclaim, “Here discord reigns supreme!”—ought not to induce us, as the Representatives of civilized and dignified States, to turn from her application with disgust, and decline, at least for a season, to receive her into the bosom of the Federal family as a sister and an equal. Sir, I do not hesitate to say that the history of Kansas, since its erection into a Territory, has been revolting and humiliating—revolting, because exhibiting so many scenes of outrage against the civilization of the age in which we live; humiliating, because showing with how much difficulty a people who boast of their aptitude for, and experience in, self-government, can plant a colony on their very borders inaugurated upon that great principle.

We are prone to think that our race, and particularly our own people, have but to come together into a community, and straightway law and order and political system spring into existence from the masses who are supposed to be familiarized, saturated with them, like perfect crystals from the fluid which holds them in solution. The experiment in Kansas might well inspire a doubt of the truth of the belief which we have so fondly cherished, and somewhat shake our faith in what we have been wont to consider an irrefutable dogma. Greece spread her civilization through her colonies as readily as the gardener multiplies some cherished tree from twigs cut from the parent stem. It was but to find some spot of soil where the off-shoot might be planted, and lo! it took root, gathered and compelled unto itself its fitting nutriment, and budded and blossomed, and bore fruit, and in turn became the parent of like children. But in Kansas our cutting of popular government has not flourished—it is sickly and wilted. The perfect and shining crystal of constitutional liberty has not been formed. The waters have long seethed and bubbled. Various political alchemists have stirred them with their potent rods in vain. The last that moved the pool and dived into its depths, retired from it in disgust, covered with slime, but holding in his triumphant hand a nondescript sediment, which he has been protesting ever since is the true salt of popular sovereignty! I propose, before I get through, to analyze this Walker residuum, and see whether it be indeed the true substance wherewith the great rites of popular self-government are celebrated on the high altar of popular liberty!

But though as a matter of expediency under ordinary circumstances and in quiet times, it might well be questioned whether a Territory in the condition of Kansas was fit to come into our Confederacy as an equal and sovereign State, with a right to vote money from the common purse, and assist in the great council of senatorial ambassadors in shaping and annulling treaties; still, on the other consideration, namely, of principle, it does seem to me that there are cogent reasons for her speedy admission. The real question involved in the admission of Kansas is, “shall another slave State, as such, be admitted into this Union?” That is the issue now before us. It is not a complicated one. Slavery expansion and slavery contraction—we of the South naturally, earnestly desire the former; the Black Republicans, not so naturally, but quite as eagerly, desire the latter. Constitutional men of the North admit the right of the South to expansion. The lines of battle must be joined on the great issue presented. Neither special pleading nor microscopic political morality, which would ignore the great issue while it picks out flaws in a comparatively minor one, can conceal the fact which stares us all, which stares the whole country in the face, that the present struggle is to determine the question whether a State whose constitution recognizes slavery as a part of its social organization can ever again be allowed to enter the Confederacy. It is the opposition to slavery which lies at the bottom of the opposition to the admission of Kansas. My friend from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] shakes his head in dissent. But he must allow me to differ from him. I believe the anti-slavery sentiment at home unconsciously influences many members upon this floor, who themselves are not opposed to the admission of more slave States into the Confederacy. This, sir, is my honest conviction.

Look at the history of the admission of California, which my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON,] who preceded me on our side of the House, has so clearly and thoroughly traced out. Why was she so easily admitted, with a constitution so irregularly formed, so little expressing the will of the people of that Territory as to be a far greater “fraud” and “deception” than the Opposition can possibly paint the Lecompton constitution to be? Simply and solely because her constitution did not recognize slavery. I know that there are northern Democrats, I know that there are southern Americans, who vehemently deny that that is the issue now before us. I believe that there are some of them who conscientiously think that it is not. But with all due deference, I must say that they are taking a very narrow view when they make the question turn on any smaller pivot. The mind of the whole country has been long distracted by this slavery agitation. It has entered into every political question; and it is impossible to disguise the fact that it constitutes the very pith and substance of the contest in which we are engaged.

Sir, we have heard much about the “stupendous frauds” in Kansas. It is the burden of the song of the Opposition. From the holy horror which has been evinced in speaking of them, we might imagine that such things as frauds at the polls were utterly unknown in the existing States of the Confederacy; as if Kansas stood solitary and alone in this particular in her bad eminence. It would indeed be a matter of which, as a people, we might be justly proud were this so. But I ask any candid man on this floor if frauds quite as gross as those alleged to have been committed in Kansas do not habitually take place at every election in many parts of the country? Have we forgotten the recent election scenes in Baltimore, where, according to the testimony of many of her own most respectable citizens, hundreds of voters were practically disfranchised by violence and arms? Were there any scenes in Kansas comparable with them? Yet here we sit quietly, day by day, with honorable members who, in the judgment of large numbers of their constituents, have been forced into this great council of the States by frauds and outrages, compared with which the famous matter of the “Delaware Crossing” must hide its diminished head. How is it in all your large cities? Are there not, at every election, frauds glaring and innumerable? How many honorable gentlemen upon this floor are there who can say that there never have been election tricks, frauds, and false votes in their own districts? I imagine, sir, very few. It may be humiliating to confess it, but is not such the truth? The buying and selling of votes is, unfortunately, too common wherever men are found able to buy and willing to sell. However much we may deplore such a condition of things, however much we may discountenance and denounce it, it would seem to be an evil inseparable from universal suffrage. Not only so, sir; but inseparable from the exercise of suffrage, so far as the experience of any government has hitherto shown.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Miles.

How is it in England? The rotten borough system has, indeed, been swept away by the reform bill. The people at large have a far more potential voice in the choice of their legislators (who are their true rulers) now than in the time of Pitt and Fox and Burke and Sheridan. I will not pause to inquire whether they have, in consequence, more able, wise, and philosophical statesmen in their national Parliament. But, sir, what is the modus operandi of many a parliamentary canvass? Is it not notorious that money is freely used; that in some cases regular contractors have undertaken to return honorable members to particular seats in Parliament? Is it not notorious that "to stand for the county"—to contest a seat in the county—requires the outlay of large sums of money; sometimes to the amount of ten, twenty, thirty, even fifty thousand pounds? Are we to be told that the frauds in Kansas, then, are so "unparalleled," "stupendous," "unprecedented," that they shock the moral sense of freemen all over the civilized world, and that we must gather the raiment of our national purity closely around us and not allow our brethren in this new Territory to touch the hem of our garment, lest we be defiled in the eyes of the nations? It has been recently told me, that not long ago, at an election held in one of our northern cities, justly considered one of the brightest centers of intelligence and refinement, banners were openly displayed with this inscription, for the guidance of the popular sovereignty, upon their folds, "Vote early and vote often!" Is it not pharisaical for us to be affecting such scruples about irregularities in a frontier settlement, where the restraints of law and (what is more powerful than law) public opinion cannot reasonably be supposed to operate as forcibly as in long-settled and more civilized communities? I hope, sir, I shall not be understood as standing forward as the apologist for, much less the defender of, the frauds alleged and the abuses complained of. No one would go further, I believe, than myself, to purify the elective franchise, and make the ballot-box, which is the true exponent and only safeguard of popular liberty, the fair and unmistakable interpreter of the popular will. But I am not willing, with sanctimonious expressions of horror utterly disproportioned to the merits of the case, to decide against my own people—to join issue with my own party—in a tremendous contest involving principles, in comparison with which, the casual excesses which may have been committed in a wild and border Territory shrink into insignificance. Besides, sir, without either defending or apologizing for such excesses, (supposing them to have been committed,) may not something fairly and honestly be said in extenuation of them?

Much has been said about the "border-ruffians;" the vials of wrath of the Free-Soil presses have been emptied upon their heads; they have been arraigned before the bar of public opinion, and every effort made to cover them with infamy. Who were the border-ruffians? Men living in the adjacent slave State of Missouri, who naturally looked upon the virgin soil of Kansas as in some sort their peculiar heritage; who, so soon as it was erected into a Territory, passed into it with their negroes for the purpose of tilling the soil and making the earth yield its increase to the labor of their hands. They did not, perhaps, in every case, immediately become settlers, but, separated as they were from their homes merely by an intervening river, contented themselves with marking out such tracts of land as suited their purposes, with the intent to return, and there set up their household gods. But while thus engaged in taking actual possession, or preparing to do so, what do they behold? Band after band of armed emigrants from the distant Atlantic cities of the North—equipped and sent out by abolition emigrant aid societies—are poured into the promised land, with the avowed object of wresting it from the detested southron and slaveholder. They come—many of them the scum and refuse of the large cities—with Sharpe's rifles in their hands, and hatred and defiance in their hearts, openly declaring that their intention is forever to exclude the southerner from any share in the new Territory. They come, paid for the job by contributions from half-crazy women and political parsons and fanatical zealots, and insolently endeavor to forestall the Missourian in the occupation of lands to which he had already set up something of a claim. They come with the settled and offensively announced purpose of driving back southern civilization, and checking the natural and legitimate spread of the wave of southern expansion. Had it not been for this forced influx of a northern anti-slavery population, there can be no doubt that western Missouri would speedily and surely have overspread into the eastern portion of Kansas, (the only portion of any agricultural value,) and firmly established, in due process of time, the institutions of the neighboring and parent State.

Now, sir, was it not natural that the Missourians should resent this violent attempt to oust them from the wished-for Territory? Is it strange that they should take up the glove of defiance, and meet the invaders who came for the purpose of overturning their institutions with the same weapons which they themselves so ostentatiously paraded? They did so. They met, checked, and foiled them. Forthwith arose shrieks from "bleeding Kansas;" which a thousand pulpits, a thousand abolition presses, have in every tone of the gamut, been reechoing ever since. Then Missouri called upon her sister southern States to come to her assistance. She besought them to meet this practical issue for the strengthening of the institution upon which their whole social polity, prosperity, and strength are based. She urged them to send out settlers with their slaves if possible; or if the latter could not be spared, still to send out southern men to take legal possession of the disputed Territory, and hold it as a vantage ground for the South. Unhappily the South did not respond to these appeals as she should have done, and as I believe she would have done had she duly realized the importance of the issue involved. She ought to have sent out man for man and dollar for dollar in opposition to those sent out by the northern associations. Had she done so, Kansas would have been ours forever, beyond dispute. Her climate and soil are quite as well adapted to slave labor as those of Missouri, which, in these particulars, she very closely resembles. She would have been a wall of defense to this latter State on the one hand, and have tended on the other to restore the equilibrium of power between the slave and free States which is so rapidly being destroyed.

But, sir, to return to the consideration of the subject of the "frauds," and the objection based thereon, that the constitution of Kansas with which she applies for admission into the Union is not the expression of the will of her people. I have said, in general terms, that I thought undue stress was laid upon the fact (granting, for the sake of argument, that it be a fact) that at some of the elections there have been tricks, irregularities, and deceptions. When two great parties, in an excited contest, are straining every nerve to defeat each other, it must almost inevitably follow that such things will be. They spring from the innate frailties and passions of human nature. They are not, as we have seen, confined to lawless communities, nor exclusively indicative of them. But, in point of fact, so far as the election frauds in Kansas are concerned, I firmly believe that both parties there are equally implicated in them. If the conscience of General Calhoun, which, like Mohammed's coffin, in traditional story, has so long hung suspended between heaven and earth—between the truth, as he must have known it, and his hopes of a seat in the other wing of the Capitol—has at length "purged" the return by rejecting the vote of the Delaware Crossing, why, we may ask, has he not purged the Leavenworth city vote? How comes this vote in the recent election to be so much larger than on two former occasions, when the contest was fully as keen and spirited?

But, sir, I did not intend and do not intend to go into the wretched and petty details of the Kansas elections. They have been held up before us, by both sides in the course of this debate, and twisted and turned in every imaginable and unimaginable way. We have been treated to them ad nauseam. We have been surfeited with them. I, for one, am heartily sick and tired of them, and wish to see or hear of them no more. To a plain, candid, sensible mind, this whole branch of the subject lies in a nutshell. The higher law, anti-slavery, anti-constitutional party in Kansas have long set all law at defiance, openly unfurled the banner of treason and revolution, mocked at the authority of the President and of Congress, refused to enroll themselves on the registers intended to guard against frauds at the polls, refused to vote, and still persistently clinging to that off-spring of fraud and villainy, the so-called Topeka constitution, will listen to no plan of conciliation or pacification. They would not hear even the voice of Walker, the charmer, though he charmed (as he thought) never so wisely. To all legitimate rule, to all duly constituted authority, they cry, "Away with it! Away with it!" They still desire to have "Jim Lane"—the Barabbas!

On the other side, we have a party who recognize the Constitution and the binding obligation of the laws; who, in strict compliance with law, have formed a constitution (closely copied from the best models of the older States) which they hold up in their hands and present as their credentials while they knock for admission into the family of States.

Between these parties we must decide. Men of the South, you cannot hesitate between your own people and friends, and their bitter, uncompromising foes. Constitution-loving men of the North, who have stanchly stood by the South on the firm rock of the Constitution, while the mad waves of fanaticism have so often raged in vain at your feet, will you desert us now? I again repeat, that the question of frauds is a minor one; one, the testimony concerning which is so contradictory that we have, and can have, no reliable data upon which to come to a conclusion. I contend that these frauds have certainly not been confined to one party; that, moreover, the lawless, factious spirit of the Free-Soil party, and their open rebellion against all constituted authority, may be justly considered a fair set-off against the frauds alleged to have been committed by the other side; and that the true issue is between the rebellious, anti-constitutional Free-Soil party, with the Topeka constitution, and the constitutional party, with the Leecompton constitution, who have complied with all the requirements of law, and who have on their side all the sanctions and forms of law.

A great deal has been said, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of popular sovereignty as bearing on the question of the obligation of the convention to have submitted the constitution framed by them to the popular vote. It has been urged that no constitution is valid without such submission; and this, in view of the pregnant fact that usage as established in the case of a large number of the existing States of the Confederacy, is entirely against such an opinion. But it is contended the acquiescence of the people in such cases has been equivalent to a formal indorsement. In one sense this is true. The acquiescence of a people in any law marks their approval of it, but its binding effect is not derived from such acquiescence. If the law be unconstitutional, it can be set aside by judicial process in the mode provided by every constitution for testing the validity of legislative enactments. And this, though it be ever so popular and acceptable to the people. And so, on the other hand, a law which is not acceptable to the people may be changed by their legal representatives in a legal mode. But, in both cases, the law is valid and complete until set aside constitutionally, or legally repealed.

If this be true of a legislative enactment, a mere creature of the constitution and subject to it, then, a priori, the constitution itself—the fundamental, organic law, which is a law unto itself, supreme and having nothing higher than itself—must, from the moment of its adoption (just as in the case of a legislative enactment) be absolutely operative and binding until altered or abolished in the only legitimate and constitutional mode—that prescribed by itself. If it be not operative from the moment of adoption, when does its operative force commence in the cases alluded to, where the people, it is contended, give it its binding force and sanction by their acquiescence? How long are we to wait for the evidence of this assent? If this be the necessary seal which can alone authenticate it and stamp it as the organic law, what is its status, what its power to give life and consistency to the body-politic, pending the affix of the broad seal of the popular will? Sir, it is either a constitution from the moment of its formation, from the first day of its birth, or it is waste paper—a still-born child, into whose nostrils the popular aura can never subsequently breathe the breath of life. It cannot, by any force of imagination, be supposed to be floating in nubibus for some indefinite time, until called down to earth and made a real, living thing. I look, sir, upon a convention as the only practicable mode in which the sovereignty of a popular, representative government can exert and manifest itself. I say the only practicable mode; for, doubtless, were it practicable for the entire mass of the people to meet together, then you would have sovereignty itself which resides in the people. But as it is the very essence of popular government to act through representation, so also from absolutely physical necessity sovereignty, like all other powers, must, for practical purposes, be delegated and exercised through representatives.

To talk about sovereignty being "indivisible," "a unit," &c., is, in my judgment, mere metaphysical jargon. It is pure philosophical abstraction. As a philosophical abstraction, it is true, sovereignty is an undivided whole, it cannot be parceled out, or cut into parts; it is the life-giving power, spirit, soul, which quickens and informs the whole political organization. But it can only be known by its attributes and their exercise, and practically can only exhibit itself through agents, just as the life of a man can only exhibit itself by some external manifestations. It is undoubtedly one of the highest prerogatives of sovereignty to form and mold the constitution of the government, and to change and overthrow it at pleasure. But in the exercise of this unquestioned and inalienable right, it can surely impose restrictions upon itself. If this be not so, then a constitution is a mere empty nullity—a shifting vapor without substance or reality. A constitution is not simply an enumeration of rights and distribution of powers, but a system of checks. It is not the mere embodiment of the will and desires of a numerical majority of the people who meet in convention through their delegates to frame it. One of its highest and most sacred objects must always be to protect the minority; to set up barriers for the weak against the strong; to guard the majority itself against its own tyranny and excesses. A constitution which does not do this, is unworthy of a free people. It can never be relied upon to secure the blessings of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" which the wise founders of the greatest written Constitution which the world has ever seen, have declared to be inalienable.

I have heard, sir, with surprise and amazement, the light and almost flippant manner in which many honorable gentlemen upon this floor have spoken of changing and annulling constitutions, at any time and upon the least provocation, by a popular vote. Nothing but the fact that the tide of party feeling is running so high that its hoarse roar drowns for the time the quiet voice of reason, can account for the rash and hasty expressions of opinion to which I allude. Do those who contend so broadly for the right of the people, at any time, without restriction, to change their fundamental organic law at the instance of every temporary whim or caprice, realize the momentous consequences which may flow from such a dogma? What safeguard have the rights of property, always in the hands of the minority, if this doctrine be true? What is to prevent the masses, inflamed by the artful appeals of demagogues, from breaking down the barriers which hedge in property and capital and establishing a community of goods—inaugurating agrarianism? Beware, gentlemen of the North—especially you who live in large cities where millions are concentrated in the hands of a few, and where a hungry-eyed mob are ever scowling at the luxury which tempts while it mocks them; beware how you teach the laboring class, outnumbering your millionaires thousands to one, so dangerous a lesson. What you "teach them they may practice, and it shall go hard with you but they will better your instructions."

I have faith, sir, in the honest instincts and just intentions—the desire to do right—of the great mass of the people. If I had not, I would despair of the experiment of self-government which we have instituted upon a scale, and to an extent never before attempted. But if we desire that great experiment to succeed—if we do not wish to run into anarchy and popular despotism, if we would not become a reproach and warning to the nations—let us not flatter the people into believing that they can do no wrong, that they can put no bridle upon momentary starts of impulse and passion, and that they can at any time shatter the whole fabric of society at a single blow. No, sir! He is the true friend of the people—the real, constitution-loving, law-abiding people, in their sober second thought, will recognize him as their friend—who warns them against themselves, points out to them the danger which may arise from sudden accessions of popular frenzy, and urges them, in their calm moments, to put up something securely on the shelf in the inner adyta of the temple of liberty, against the gloomy day when the storms of faction and of anarchy may threaten to ravage the land. But it may be asked, "Have not the people the right to abolish their constitution, to sweep every vestige of it away; to tear down, if it seems meet to them, their entire political fabric, and erect on its ruins any—the most fantastic structure—under which it may please them to live?" Yes, they have this ultimate right—the right of revolution; the right to resolve themselves into the primordial elements of society; and form, without any restrictions, a new social compact. But it is a dangerous state of transition through which to pass—one too often marked by blood and fire. It should be extreme and dire necessity alone which would tempt them to pass to the blue heights beyond—fancy-painted too often—through a flood filled with swift whirlpools and treacherous quicksands. Still there are times when it must be tried—though successfully only then when cool heads and great hearts lead on, cautiously feeling and sounding the way.

Sir, I have been trained in a school that looks upon constitutions as sacred things, not to be irreverently handled or lightly changed, and, I repeat, I have been surprised at the little respect or regard which many gentlemen here seem to entertain for them. That a constitution, duly formed by the chosen delegates of the people, is, so soon as formed, and without submission to a popular vote, (especially where no such submission is required by the act calling the convention,) the supreme law of the land, I firmly believe. That this constitution cannot be amended, save in the precise form and mode prescribed by itself, I believe as firmly. That the constitution of Kansas, with which she now applies for admission into this Union, was duly formed by the chosen delegates of the people, with the strictest observance of the forms of law, has, again and again, been demonstrated. That it does embody the will of that portion of the people who were willing to conform with the requirements of law and erect themselves into a State, there can be no doubt. That the only portion of it which involved any vexed question was, by the convention which formed it, fairly submitted to the entire body of the people, is equally certain. That because any—however large a portion—of the people refuse to take part in the formation of the constitution, or refuse to vote upon the feature in it which involves the whole question which has so long distracted the Territory, that therefore Congress ought not to listen to, or treat with, those who have steadily and legally endeavored to form a State and enter our Confederacy, is an argument as unreasonable as the spirit which prompts it is factious. That the provision of the constitution which prescribes the vote of the Legislature necessary to call a convention for the purpose of amending the constitution subsequent to 1864, does, by necessary and inevitable implication, prevent a call of a convention by any vote prior to that period, is too plain to admit of cavil. The argument that because the provision says that after 1864 a convention can only be called in a certain specified mode and by a certain proportional vote, that, therefore, previous to that time it may be called in any mode, and by a bare majority, is, with all due deference to those who use it, in my judgment a species of special pleading little short of puerile.

Believing, sir, then, as I do, that the constitution of Kansas cannot be changed prior to 1864, I have been opposed to any proviso in the bill of admission which might seem to countenance in any degree the contrary supposition. And although it is contended that the proviso which has been inserted in the Senate bill does not imply such a supposition—expresses in fact no opinion on the subject—and is intended to put on record that Congress refuses to express any opinion, still, to every one of plain judgment it must be obvious that the very best way of avoiding an expression of opinion is to say nothing. But we all know very well that the words of the proviso have been inserted with a distinct purpose. The object was to gain the votes of northern Democrats by giving them a clause upon which they might hang their own conclusions; upon which they might go before their constituents and say: "It is true we advocated the admission of Kansas under the Le-compton constitution, which instrument, on the face of it, prohibits any amendment of itself (in other words, the abolition of slavery) for a certain specified number of years; but then we have taken care to have inserted in the bill of admission a proviso which, if it means anything, implies at least a hint to the people of Kansas (one which they will not be so foolish as to neglect) that if they desire to change their constitution tomorrow the assembled wisdom of the country considers it an open question which they can decide as they please without let, scruple, or hindrance." Is not that, sir, the plain history of the origin of the proviso? And is not the use to be made of it that which I have indicated?

Sir, what are we of the South to say to our constituents who are weary of compromises and concessions of all kinds; who desire to meet the question squarely as to whether the South shall be allowed to expand, and to bring into the Union more slave territory as a necessary increment to her waning power? We can only say, sir, that the proviso is merely a neutral-tinted phrase—words only of surplussage—intended as a sop to Cerberus, a tub to the northern whale. I dislike neutral-tinted phrases and soft, unmeaning platitudes. I prefer plain, direct language, which "he who runs may read," and signposts and directions so clear that the "wayfaring man, though a fool, may not err therein." I do not think it ingenuous, to say the least, in making a bargain or agreement, to use words which I understand in one sense and the opposite party in another. The issue presented to the country should have been the simple, naked question, "Shall Kansas be admitted with a constitution recognizing slavery?" With the right of the people of Kansas to change or abolish their constitution Congress has nothing to do; and to say anything at all on the subject is an interference uncalled for and unwarrantable. I was opposed to the insertion in the Senate bill of any proviso, and did, in conjunction with other southern State-rights men, protest against it, and I have reason to believe that our protest had some effect in modifying the proviso and making it less objectionable.

But now a caucus of the national Democratic members of this House has taken up the subject of still further modifying the proviso, so as to make it more palatable to hesitating northern Democrats, and Heaven only knows what they will make of it! For one, sir, I am becoming sick and disgusted with the whole matter. Since Calhoun, by his last coup of political legerdemain, has thrown the Legislature of Kansas into the hands of the Free-Soilers, I feel, as a southern man, comparative indifference to the fate of the bill. If Kansas is forthwith to become a free State, and send Free-Soil Senators and a Free-Soil Representative to Congress, what does the South gain by her admission? We are but striving to conquer a barren victory; we are contending for a withered crown, whose faded leaves will crumble in our grasp. In a more forcible and practical manner, the honorable member from Connecticut, [Mr. Bishop,] who spoke on our side the other day in advocacy of the admission of Kansas, expressed it, when he said, "the North will get the oyster and the South the shell."

But, sir, the issue has been made, the battle joined; and though it be on an abstract principle

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Miles.

HO. OF REPS.

which does not at present promise to result in any practical advantage to us, I am willing to stand by the guns and fight it out. There is at least one aspect of the question which makes it worth while for the South to press the Kansas bill through, even with the proviso alluded to, though in itself objectionable. It is this: if, even with a universal belief at the North that Kansas will speedily become a free State, and with a clause in the bill of admission intended to be employed at the North as an intimation that Congress does not think that there is any particular difficulty in the way of making it so, Kansas should still be rejected by northern votes, it will at least have the effect of opening the eyes of the southern people to the startling fact that they have no hope in the future of maintaining their equality in the Union. It will compel them to ponder the question whether they will choose subjugation or resistance, colonial vassalage or separate independence.

Mr. Chairman, I am no alarmist. I do not believe that, in this commercial age, in which "the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt which honor feels," revolutions can be lightly effected, or that they are apt to be effected upon merely abstract questions. The provocation to revolution is cumulative. Each step in itself may be a small and sometimes almost imperceptible advance, but it leads on steadily to the end. The concatenation of causes may not always seem to have a logical sequence and connection; but the fact, which actually puts in motion the popular will, carries with it a weight and momentum compounded from the whole train which preceded it. The South may not dissolve the Union on the rejection of Kansas; but such rejection would, assuredly, sever still another of the cords—rapidly becoming fewer—which the course of events has been snapping one by one. It is impossible for the most casual observer to have failed to see that the South has been becoming more and more alienated from her ancient attachment to the Union; more and more familiarized with the idea of dissolution; more and more reconciled to the necessity of, perhaps at no distant day, severing the copartnership, and commencing business on her own account. This may be considered a mean and homely mode of expression in alluding to so grave a movement; but it is a practical one, and the American people are preëminently practical—we of the South not so much so as our brethren of the North, but still sufficiently so to feel that when a Government, so far from advancing the material prosperity of a large proportion of the governed, tends rather to check and retard it; so far from strengthening and maintaining their constitutional rights, is tending steadily to weaken and subvert them, it is then the part of wisdom, as well as true patriotism, to weigh well the advantages and disadvantages of such Government with a view, if necessary, of reconstructing or abolishing it. And the South has been for some time weighing the advantages and disadvantages of the present Confederacy. She has seen the strength and security and dignity which it gave us among the older nations of the world during our infancy as States. She has not been insensible to the sentiment of expanded patriotism which a common heritage of revolutionary glory so naturally inspired. She has cherished a pride in our common flag; and wherever it has waved in sight of a foe, on land or sea, her arm has contributed to its successes, and her blood been shed in its defense. In the halls of national legislation, in the cabinet, in the executive chair, she has illustrated the history of our common country, and contributed in no small measure to develop its resources at home, and advance its dignity and reputation abroad. There is scarcely a bright page in that history on which the names of some of her sons do not stand in living letters of light. The South has been truly and devotedly attached to the Union, but she cannot worship it with blind devotion and superstitious attachment. In its practical operation, the Union has benefited the North at the expense of the South. Heavy protective tariffs have built up the labor of the North, fostered her industry, and furthered the accumulation of immense amounts of capital within her borders. What pecuniary benefit has the South derived from Federal legislation? As a purely agricultural people, her obvious policy is free trade—the least restriction possible upon the exchange of her raw products for the manufactures of the world. And yet such has been the preponderance of power against her, that in spite of her most urgent appeals and energetic remonstrances, she has always failed to have justice rendered her. Her interests have been uniformly disregarded when those of the North stood in conflict.

But I merely glance at this chapter of her grievances. It is not my purpose, nor is this the occasion, to open it up. It has been the theme which has often provoked the ablest legislative ability of her sons, and elicited their most cogent efforts of reasoning, and effective exhibitions of eloquence. South Carolina, through her Calhoun and McDuffie, has put on record many a powerful protest against the iniquitous tariff system which has so long enriched the North at the expense of the South. But the South, though at times restive and impatient, has borne all this; has submitted to an unequal and onerous taxation, which has swelled the Federal Treasury only that its overflow might fall into the lap of the North, (for it cannot be denied that nine tenths of the Federal expenditures have inured to the benefit of the North;) has submitted to see the rich spoils of wealth and place and power elude her grasp, and to behold them clutched by her stronger sisters. But when the question arises whether she will consent to occupy an inferior and degraded position in the Confederacy; to have a ban set upon her social institutions, which constitute the essential foundations of her prosperity, the very life-blood of her existence; to be excluded from further acquisition of territory, and hemmed within her present limits, while her co-States, already in a preponderance, are rapidly expanding and acquiring supreme and uncontrollable power, she would indeed be wanting in decent self-respect, would exhibit a suicidal apathy, were she not gravely to consider whether she can safely and honorably continue to live under a Government which is being perverted into an engine for her destruction. That the anti-slavery sentiment at the North is yearly increasing, no observant man, it seems to me, can doubt. The Abolition party in the presidential election of 1840 polled 7,000 votes; in 1852 it gave John P. Hale, its candidate, 157,296 votes; in 1856 Fremont received 1,341,812 votes. True, it may be said that all the votes cast for Fremont were not Abolition votes; but they were all undoubtedly votes opposed to any further extension of southern institutions.

But I need not go into any sketch of the progress of the slavery agitation in proof of the fact that the position of the South is becoming more and more critical every year. The northern man who affirms that the opposition to slavery is not deeper, more bitter and intense at this moment than it has ever been at any previous period, is either utterly blind or absolutely dishonest. The southern man who fails to warn his people that the political heavens are full of fearful portents; that the air is heavy with thunder-clouds; and that the mutterings of the coming storm may be distinctly heard, is either asleep upon his post, or a traitor to his section. In view of this condition of things, Mr. Chairman, can anything be more natural than that the South should begin to look about her; to count up her resources; to estimate her strength; to measure her capacity for taking care of herself, and of assuming, if driven out of this Confederacy, an independent position among the nations? Can she be reasonably blamed for doing so? And yet, whenever she looks this last contingency—certainly not an improbable one—calmly and boldly in the face, and begins to discuss it in its great and leading aspects, her ears are forthwith stunned with the cry of "treason!" "treason!" and the august and mighty shade of the Father of his Country is invoked to rebuke such an evidence of disloyalty to this "glorious Union." Sir, Washington, with his great, wise heart, and cautious judgment, and conservative nature, felt no compunctions at throwing off his allegiance to his King, and subverting a Government which oppressed his country. He, like all true patriots, loved his people more dearly—prized more highly their happiness and prosperity—than the mere form of government under which he had been reared, and which he had been taught to revere.

Revolution, sir, as I have elsewhere said in the course of my remarks, is a serious thing, a terrible thing. But to noble natures there are things more serious and terrible than revolutions. Tyranny and injustice are worse. The slow, undermining process by which the high spirit of a free people is sapped, their strength destroyed, their faith in themselves crushed out, their enterprise checked, their progress paralyzed, is far more appalling to the true statesman and patriot than the temporary, though critical, fever of revolution.

My honored colleague in the Senate [Mr. HAMMOND] has called forth many denunciatory comments upon his noble southern speech, recently delivered in his seat, because he has boldly considered in it the question of southern independence, and contrasted the relative resources and condition of the North and the South, in the event of a separation. Sir, the argument was as unanswerable as it was timely. Such views and considerations must address themselves forcibly to both sections of the Confederacy. They must make practical, reflecting men at the North pause and hesitate before they compel a disruption of a connection, the advantages of which are so greatly on their side. And they must make practical, reflecting men at the South, feel that they have a power and strength within themselves which ought to make them, in very shame, refuse to submit any longer to aggression. I desire to call attention to the following relative statement of the export of the free and slave States, as speaking volumes in itself as to the capacity of the South to stand alone and compete for (what is in this age the pabulum of nations) the commerce of the world. If it is true, as political economists teach us, that the wealth of a people consists in what they furnish to the markets of the world—in other words, the excess of their production over their consumption—then surely the South is rich; and riches again, in this age, are strength.

The total exports of produce and manufactures of the United States for the year ending 30th June, 1857, were $328,985,065. The six New England States (with a population of three millions) exported $30,887,853. The other eight free-labor States (with a population of ten millions) exported $142,963,068. The slave States (with a population of six and a half millions) exported $165,030,558. Of this amount, $131,575,859 is the value of the cotton exported; $20,662,772 the value of the tobacco; and $2,290,400 the value of the rice. These three staples alone amount to $154,429,031, nearly one half of the entire exports of the country. The slave labor produce exported from free ports very largely exceeds the free labor produce exported from slave ports. As an illustration, take the fact that the whole value of western produce, (not all, by the way, the result of free labor,) pork, lard, wheat, flour, corn, &c., exported from New Orleans during the period under consideration, falls short of $9,000,000; while the slave labor produce, in the shape of cotton, tobacco, and rice, exported from New York during the same period, amounts to nearly $13,500,000. Besides, in making such a comparison as we are instituting, we ought to take into consideration the exports from the free-labor ports of articles manufactured from slave-labor products. There was the export of over $6,000,000 manufactured cotton goods; $1,500,000 tobacco and snuff; nearly $270,000 refined sugar; $1,250,000 spirits from molasses; making an aggregate of over $9,000,000 of exports of manufactures dependent solely upon slave labor.

But, sir, I do not care to dwell on arguments of this kind. They have been often and elaborately set forth by far abler hands than mine. They are important and valuable; but it is not on a question of dollars and cents that the South would dissolve the Union. The history of long weary years of unjust and unequal legislation has sufficiently proved that point. But when it shall be proved to the South not only that the scepter has forever departed from her; that she can never, concurrently with the North, rule the common country, but that she must forever occupy an inferior and subordinate position; that she can never expand, never occupy her just share of the common territory; that her institutions and civilization are at the mercy of a sectional majority which tolerates them only to the end that her people, as

"hewers of wood and drawers of water," may minister to its prosperity—then, I believe, she will imitate the example of our revolutionary sires, and take her destinies into her own hands.

The South is often accused of an over-sensitiveness on the subject of slavery—of being morbidly irritable upon it. And, sir, would it be strange if she were so? Is she not perpetually taunted, reviled, sneered at, by hundreds of northern presses, northern pulpits, and northern orators? Is she not held up to ridicule and contempt, to scorn and execration, in every conceivable mode and on every possible occasion? But when a southern man, with a natural, and one would think pardonable, indignation, resents and repels with warmth these unjustifiable attacks, he is requested to "keep cool;" not to be "excited;" and dubbed "a fire-eater" if he cannot practice the injunction of philosophical equanimity! I come here as a new member, just initiated into public life, and what are some of the first things I hear on this very floor? I hear a man venerable in years, one of the oldest members of this House, one who has sat here year after year, and heard the calumnies against the South exposed and refuted—I hear him, upon whose hoary head the snows of many winters rest, and which should have softened his asperity and filled his heart with kindness and benevolence—I hear him, a man known to be tottering upon the brink of the grave, denounce his southern brethren with a bitterness and vehemence that seemed almost to be intended as an incentive to servile insurrection, and to fire the midnight torch of the incendiary. He tells us that the slave of the South has no protection; that his owner may scourge him to death with impunity. Sir, he ought to have known that this is not true. It was only this morning that one of my colleagues [Mr. BONHAM] mentioned to me casually in conversation, that he had himself, while State solicitor, convicted two men of the murder of their slaves, for which they had suffered the extreme penalty of the law.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman permit me for a moment?

Mr. MILES. If I have misstated the gentleman, and he desires to correct me, I will; otherwise, not.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I most respectfully ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he intends to deny the assertion which I made in regard to the safety of slaves? If he does, let him point it out, and I will convict him by their own record.

Mr. MILES. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is no protection for the slave in the South?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I understood the gentleman to deny the liability of a slave to be slain by his master. If the gentleman does deny that, I ask him to state it definitely.

Mr. MILES. I definitely and emphatically deny that with us a master can slay a slave with impunity. The fact I just stated is a complete answer on that point. But, Mr. Chairman, my time has almost expired, and I cannot yield further. Besides, sir, nothing that I can say could touch the gentleman's conscience or reach his reason. I was contending, sir, that in this great sectional contest—in this, as I believe, irreconcilable quarrel—it was natural that the South should be sensitive. Her honor is involved; and he who does not feel that the honor of States should be as jealously guarded as that of individuals, shows no more sagacity as a statesman than he exhibits ardor as a patriot. The great dramatist, who sounded all the depths of human nature, gives utterance to a sentiment as wise as it is noble when he makes Hamlet say—

"Rightly to be great
Is, not to stir without great argument,
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw
When honor 's at the stake."

Let the South then set her house in order, collect her strength, prepare for whatever fate has in store for her in the future, with faith in herself, and calm self-confidence. She is strong; let her be wise. She has many interests, not antagonistic; let her unite and harmonize them. She has untold resources; let her develop them. Let her cultivate fraternal union within her borders. Let past dissensions among her sons be forgotten. Let them ignore petty issues and stand shoulder to shoulder in her defense. With distracted counsels, she is at the mercy of her enemies. With a united people, she will be invincible. Possessing within herself every element of greatness, prosperity, and strength, with an immense territory and fertile soil, producing a staple which shapes, in no small degree, the commerce of the world, which the world can never again do without, and which it is scarcely possible that any other portion of the globe can ever successfully compete with her in producing; with such a relation between capital and labor as gives the best assurance of political conservatism and social stability, she is prepared to fulfill her mission and occupy a foremost place among the Powers of the earth. She may do this in the Union if allowed her due expansion and development. If necessity compels her, she can and will do it independent and alone.

AN APPEAL TO PATRIOTS.

SPEECH OF HON. A. BURLINGAME, OF MASSACHUSETTS, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BURLINGAME said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It has been shown, in the great debate which we have had, that the people of Kansas never authorized the Lecompton constitution; that they never made it; that they never ratified it; that it does not reflect their will. It has been shown that the first Legislature was a fraud; that the second was a fraud; that test oaths and gag laws were put upon the people, so that they could not vote; that then they were held responsible for the crimes of those who did; that when they were persuaded to vote, they were cheated; that when nobody voted, returns were made as if from populous regions. It has been shown that the honesty of the officers of the Government, who tried to stay the hand of these frauds, was considered an offense by the Government. It has been shown that the people have been menaced in their property and their lives; that armies were sent there to vote them down, or to shoot them down, and without authority of law. It has appeared that the men who did these things were held dear by the Government, and that they are its officers to-day. It has been shown that, through all this time, that devoted people has held itself in such an attitude as to win not only the respect of the people of the United States, but the respect of the officers of the Government who have been sent, from time to time, to persuade or to subdue them to the policy of the Government.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose here to-day to go over the history of Kansas affairs; that has been done, as the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] has just now well said, sufficiently. Every fact has been stated; every principle has been argued. Day by day we have urged our cause with all the zeal of men who know they are right. Every fact has been met on the other side by some daring and insolent assumption; every argument with scornful sneers which no man can answer. When we have offered to prove facts, the will of the people of the United States, as reflected by the Representatives upon this floor, has been baffled by parliamentary tactics. Yes, you who belong to the party that went behind the great seal of New Jersey, as my eloquent friend from Indiana [Mr. COLFAX] very truly said, you who go behind the certificates of the Governors of Ohio and Maryland, when the interests of a whole people are at stake and fraud is charged, you say you cannot go behind the record; you say that you are estopped; you say "it is so nominated in the bond;" you refuse to investigate, and propose speedily to force upon the people of Kansas a constitution never made by them. Yes, you who say, with us, that the people are the source of power; you, who say that power should flow forth from the people into practical government on the line of their desires; you, who shouted your great radical rule of Democracy in the ears of the country—Buchanan at your head—to be this: that inasmuch as the people are sovereign, inasmuch as that sovereignty cannot be alienated by them in such a manner that it cannot be resumed when the safety of the people shall require it, therefore it is for them to determine at what time and in what manner they will change their fundamental law; that was your radical rule of Democracy. It is now pronounced Dorrism by the Democracy on this floor. You planted your rule in opposition to the rule of the other great school of the country; which rule was stated most clearly by Mr. Webster, in the great Rhode Island case, to be this: he said that the will of the majority must govern; that it was as potent as the will of the Czar of Muscovy, when it was legally ascertained. But how will you ascertain it? said he; it must be ascertained by some rule prescribed by previous law. That rule, the fierce Democracy denounced as the rule of tyranny.

Well, sir, here we have a case where even the requirements of that rule have been met by the people of Kansas. Their will was collected legally, by a legal Legislature; and it appears that their will, by ten thousand majority, is against your Lecompton constitution; and yet, in the face of that declaration, you come forward as a party, and propose to force that constitution, in defiance of your own rule of Democracy, in defiance of the Federal rule, upon that people; ay, sir, worse than that—you declare, through the lips of your boldest and ablest leader, through the lips of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] through the lips of men upon this floor, through the lips of the gentleman who has but just taken his seat, if I understood him, that it involves a question of union or disunion. I agree with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. MILES,] who said that we might as well meet this question now. I, for my part, am ready to meet it now. I accept the issue which is tendered. I accept it the more eagerly in the presence of this menace. A Representative of the people would be craven, did he shrink from his duty in the presence of such a threat as that. What, you dissolve this Union because you cannot have your own wild will? You dissolve this Union because the Lecompton constitution, born of fraud and violence, is legally voted down in this House! Has your nationality no better quality than that? How will you do it? Who is to do it? Whose hand is ready to strike the first blow? Where is your army chest? Where your battalions to cope with the people of this country? You cannot do it. It would be wrong to do it. It would not be legal. It would not be safe to do it. I tell you, that on the banks of the Santee it would require no Federal Army to subdue rebellion.

The descendants of Sumter and of Marion, as their fathers struck down the Tory spirit in the brave days of old, would quell the spirit of rebellion to-day. We have heard this threat before. We have deemed it but the idle vaunt of idle men; but it comes now with an emphasis and an authority that it never had before. We find the fire-eater giving his will as the law of the great Democratic party. He has the right to rule it, from his courage and his activity.

I say it comes with new emphasis when the leader of the Democratic party gets up in the Senate of the United States, and with deliberation—not acting on an impulse—declares, and I heard him, that this Union is a myth; that he has calculated its value; that the people of Kentucky love it "not wisely, but too well;" and that this Lecompton constitution involves the safety of the Union; and when the gallant Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] accepted the issue, when he restated these points, the distinguished Senator from Georgia bowed his assent, and I saw him; and no member of the Democratic party in the Senate protested against that doctrine. I say, when such men express such sentiments, the time has arrived when the national men of the country should unite to rebuke such sentiments and vote them down here, and vote them down elsewhere. These are the men, are they, to taunt the loyal old State of Massachusetts with having legislated herself out of the Union, because she has declared, that of two given offices it is incompatible for one of her citizens to hold both of them? She has a right to pass such a law. No court has decided it to be unconstitutional. When the court shall so decide, Massachusetts, with her accustomed obedience to law, will submit. She simply says this: "if you desire to carry men 'back to old Virginia—to old Virginia's shore'—you must do it with your officers, and not with hers." That is all. But I am not here to-day to defend her; I am not here to plead for her. She denies the jurisdiction of this House. She is not responsible to it for her local legislation. I stand here upon the great doctrine, which I believe in, that the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed, must stand until it shall be constitutionally reversed; and so, so far as the threat which has been made is concerned, I—disdaining to argue in its presence—stand here, before the people of this great country, and trample that threat of disunion scornfully and defiantly down under my feet.

Why have you brought this sectional question here? Why do you seek to force a constitution upon a people whom you know abhor it? What are you to gain by it? Did not the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] very truly say that it would be a barren victory—that it would wither in your grasp? And he said, speaking more fully in the interests of the South than most of you, that he did not care now much about the passage of the Lecompton constitution. What are you to gain? Is your dogma, that there can be property in man, borne in the bosom of that constitution, recommended by such a course more warmly to the hearts of the American people? Will you more easily persuade them, at some future time, to be more willing to admit States from other Territories, where the system may be more congenial to the climate? Will not the people say, and with truth, that this system, which requires such means as these to strengthen and sustain itself, is dangerous to the peace and prosperity of the Republic? Will they not hate your system, because of your conduct in this case? What! will two Senators from that State, who must be fugitives from the State that they will pretend to represent—will that State, held down, as the gentleman from South Carolina said he would hold it until 1864—compensate for the ill feeling you have created? Will they compensate you for the alienation of the people which will take place? Will they compensate you for your party dismembered, broken, and lost? The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] gave us statistics of the last election. It is true, that with the suspicion that you would do this thing, we swept the North, and the East, and the West, with, as he says, more than one million three hundred thousand votes. We swept the great and populous States of the country with the mighty ten-wave of the people's enthusiasm. We brought down the victory into the very shadow of your malign system. If we did it then, what will now be your fate at the polls, when you go back to an indignant and betrayed constituency? You can no longer say you are for free Kansas; we will nail you to the record. You cannot say any longer that you are in favor of the great doctrine of popular sovereignty; we will nail you to the record. You cannot say any longer that we are mere freedom-shriekers, because there shall stand side by side with us the great chief of Democracy, the distinguished author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and he will tell you that you have betrayed your constituents.

We will summon clouds of witnesses from all the winds of heaven. We will summon them from the South, the East, and the West. We shall summon the gallant Wise, of Virginia, who desires that the State shall be slave, but who is too honest to cheat the people. We shall summon Walker, who has aided in bringing in a new empire to strengthen the South. We shall summon Stanton, and Forney, and Bancroft, and a host of others; and, above all, we shall summon those gallant Senators from Kentucky and Tennessee, the acts of whose lives, for a quarter of a century, shine along the annals of their country. We will call upon them, and they will tell you you have betrayed the people; that you are forcing upon the people of Kansas a constitution conceived in fraud and violence. And how are you to meet those charges? How are you to answer to a great and indignant people—for they will question you as with a tongue of fire? They will go back beyond your proceedings here; they will question you as to the doings and purposes of the Administration; they will ask you why you did not adhere to the doctrine of popular sovereignty;

why, after you had maintained that the people of a Territory could exclude slavery, you changed around, and said they could do it when they formed a State; and why it is that your popular sovereignty has vanished away into the Hibernian suggestion of the President, that the quickest way to make Kansas a free State is first to make it a slave State? They will ask you why you have substituted the dogmas of Calhoun for the doctrines of Jefferson? They will ask you how it is that the President of the United States, after having, in 1819 and 1847, held that Congress had power over the Territories, in 1857 expressed his amazing surprise that anybody should have ever held that doctrine? They will desire to know why it is that there was a complicity between him and the Supreme Court of the United States, by which, upon yonder steps of the Capitol, he was enabled to foreshadow what they afterwards announced as an opinion? They will ask you why it was that that court, wearing the ermine of a Jay, a Marshall, and a Story, when there was no case before the court calling for it, went beyond the line of their duty, and published political opinions? They will ask you why the Army of the United States have shot down American citizens in the streets of Washington, and why it was held in terror over the people of Kansas so long? And they will ask you, doughfaces of the North, why you sat still in your seats, and allowed men to call your constituents, because they toiled, mud-sills and slaves? You will have to answer all these things. You cannot do it, and we shall beat you like a threshing-floor. We shall hereafter have a majority in this House. We shall strengthen ourselves in the Senate, and we are to-day filling all the land with the portents of your general doom in 1860. And I say, in the presence of this state of things, that our first duty to God and our country is to devote ourselves to the political destruction of doughfaces who say one thing at home, and come here to vote another; and who fawn and tremble, and fall down, in the presence of the Administration. No wonder that you, southern men, call us slaves, judging us from these specimens of the people. But I tell you they do not represent the fire and flint of the grim and grizzly North. They are but our waiters on Providence, our Maccyophants; they are our Uriah Heeps; they belong with Dante's selfish men, of whom he said, heaven would not have them, and hell rejected them. I tell you, southern men, I am ready to strike hands with fire-eaters, and exterminate the race. It is becoming extinct. Look in their faces for the last time; they are fading away—fading away. Oh! for an artist to take their features, to transmit them to a curious and scornful posterity. Do it quickly, for the places which now know them shall soon know them no more forever.

I think it is the first duty of Republicans to extinguish the doughfaces; but I hold it also their duty to bear testimony as to the manner in which the Douglas men—and they will pardon me for giving them the name of their gallant and gifted leader—to bear testimony to the manner in which they have borne themselves. They have kept the faith; they have adhered to the doctrine of popular sovereignty; they have voted it in this House, and they have not fawned and trembled in the presence of a dominating Administration—in the presence of that great tyranny which holds the Government in its thrall at Washington. They have given flash for flash to every indignant look; and when a gentleman from Virginia, the other day, tauntingly told them that certain language which they used upon the floor of this House was the language of rebellion, they shouted out, through the lips of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DAVIS], "it was the language of freemen." I say that it is due to them that we should say that they have borne the brunt of the battle; and that they, whether from New York, Pennsylvania, or Illinois, have kept the whiteness of their souls, and have made a record which has lain in light; and if my voice can have any weight with the young men of the country where those men dwell, I should say to them, stand by these men with all your young enthusiasm; stand by them without distinction of party; they may not agree exactly with you; but they have stood the test here, where brave men falter and fall. Let them teach this tyrannical Administration that, if it is strong, the people are stronger behind it. Thus I would speak to the young men of the country. I differ in some points with those men, and I do not wish to complicate them. I pay also the high tribute of my admiration to that band of men who have been reposing outside of the boundaries of the great parties of the country as a patriotic corps of reserve, for the purpose, I suppose, of saving the Union, when it is endangered. When they saw this sectional issue made, standing, as they did, in a position to look fairly on between the parties, they saw who made it, and they instantly took sides, and, in the language of Mr. BELL, in his reply to Mr. TOOMBS, they accepted the issue of disunion. They accepted it; and when, sir, they saw that Lecompton was synonymous with "fraud, with forgery, with perjury, with ballot-box stuffing," then they trampled it with their high manly honesty under their feet. They have taken it in charge to preserve the ballot-box pure and open to American citizens.

Sir, it was a proud day to me, when I heard the speech of the venerable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] The melody of his voice, and his patriotic accent, still sound in my ears. I was glad to hear him denounce fraud; I was glad to hear him stand for the truth. As I listened, it seemed to me that the spirit of the Kentucky Commoner had come back again to visit his old place in the Senate. It seemed to me as if his spirit was hovering there, looking, as in days of old, after the interests of the Union. At that moment, the heart of Massachusetts beat responsive once again to that of grand old Kentucky; and I longed to have the day come again, when there should be such feelings as in the olden time, when the Bay State bore the name of Henry Clay on her banners over her hills and through her valleys, everywhere to victory, and with an affection equal to the affection of Kentucky herself.

I also felt proud to hear the speech of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL.] I was glad to hear their conferees on this floor, Messrs. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, GILMER of North Carolina, RICAUD and HARRIS, of Maryland, and DAVIS, with his surpassing eloquence, worthy of the best days of Pinkney and of Wirt; and I also express my gratitude to Mr. MARSHALL of Kentucky, who has labored so long to secure this union of patriotic men. I owe it to these men, and to myself, to say that I do not agree with them on the subject of slavery, and I know that they do not agree with me. Neither do I agree with the Douglas men; I take what I think is a higher position. I hold to the power of Congress over the Territories; they do not. But while I oppose the Lecompton constitution for one reason, and while the Douglas Democrats oppose it for another, the South Americans may oppose it for still another. God knows we have all cause of war against it, and against the Administration. And we have come together here as a unit, not by any preconceived, not by any trade among leaders, but by the spontaneous convictions of our own honest minds. I trust that this may be an omen of what may happen in the future. As to what may happen, it is not for me to prophesy. Let time and chance determine. We come together, not in a spirit of compromise, because we compromise nothing, but in a spirit of patriotism. And, acting in that spirit, I, for one, am prepared to sustain the substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. After first voting to reject the bill, I will vote for that substitute, not because I would vote for it as an original measure; I will vote for it because I think that it will make Kansas a free State. The Administration says it is a slave Territory to-day—the Lecompton constitution makes it a slave State. I feel that the Lecompton constitution, without this substitute, would pass in its naked form, and that Kansas would be a slave State under it; and if I forego this opportunity to make it a free State, the opportunity will be lost forever. And how could I meet my constituents, and say that, because I desired to appear consistent, I would not vote for that substitute, and give the people of Kansas one more chance for freedom. If there were only one chance in a hundred, I would do it. But it is not a chance; it is a certainty. Doughfaces will undoubtedly feel very sad about my vote, and complain that I am not consistent. That word "consistency" is a coward's word. It is the refuge of selfishness and timidity. I will do right to-day, and let yesterday take care of itself. That word "consistency" is what has lured many a noble man to ruin. It has stopped all generous reform. When I am ready to adopt it, and to depart from practicability, I will join the immovable civilization of China, and take the false doctrines of Confucius for my guide, with their backward-looking thoughts.

These are my reasons, these are the reasons that animate my associates among the Republicans. And I tell you, the common enemy, fairly and openly, that our cause is just, and our union is perfect. We Republicans will place to-morrow our united vote upon the record in favor of the substitute. Our great chieftain here, [Mr. GRIDGINS,] with his white hairs, who has stood for twenty years the great champion of Liberty, we will bear with affection to the record—to this determination he has come, after much thought. At last, he felt that his principles required him so to vote, and, obeying the impulses of an honest and patriotic and not fanatical heart, he points the way of duty and victory. The member from South Carolina, [Mr. MILES,] if he knew him better, would find his heart to be a loving one; and I will tell that member that his interests and the interests of South Carolina are safer to-day in the hands of that good old man, than they are in the hands of the most malignant of doughfaces. I say our Union is perfect. We will put our votes on record to-morrow in favor of the substitute, not as a choice of evils, but because it is the good thing to do; it is the only thing for honest men to do, if we wish to have Kansas a free State.

Mr. Chairman, a great many thoughts suggest themselves to my mind, to which I would like to give utterance. I am told that my time is about to expire, and therefore will not prolong my remarks to greater length. I say, for our party, that we are ready. We seek no postponement of the question. All that men could do, we have done. We have argued the question; we have implored; we have voted; we have done everything to secure our triumph; we have been baffled by parliamentary tactics; we have been sometimes betrayed. The President has given way; the Senate has given way; but, thank God, the tribunes of the people, standing here in this House, have not yet betrayed their trust. They stand firm, and my high hope is—I do not know why, looking to our past conflicts here, I should have it—that on the great to-morrow, when the sun shall sink behind the hills of our own loved Virginia, this Lecompton constitution will be defeated, Kansas will be saved, and the whole country repose in good will, and peace dwell in all our borders.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. F. K. ZOLLICOFFER, OF TENNESSEE,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Upon this Kansas question I had intended silently to cast a vote for the admission of the new State, without troubling the committee with the particular reasons controlling my action; but, finding that I am compelled to separate on this question from some of my most respected political friends, and perceiving that among the friends of the bill, as well as its opponents, there has been a great diversity of opinion upon different points of the argument, I have concluded that it may be better for me to state the facts and reasons which have had most weight in determining my vote, that none may misunderstand them.

I must say that it is with much regret that I find my political friends divided on this important question, and with regret that I find some of the friends of the bill giving it support upon premises that I have no sympathies with. This, however, seems to be counterbalanced by the fact that the bill is opposed for almost all sorts of conflicting reasons.

I will endeavor to present my own view of the question. Kansas is before us asking for admission into the Union, with a constitution regularly adopted in accordance with the principles guaranteed in the Kansas-Nebraska bill—a constitution republican in form, and adopted by her people under all the sanctions and formalities of law. The question has been raised, is this constitution in accordance with the will of the people? If the will of the people is to be ascertained by the popular vote cast at the regular legal elections, it certainly embodies the will of the people of Kansas. And if we are not to regard the expressed will of the people at the ballot-box, where all are free to vote, I am unable to discover where else we are to find a test—a reliable test, by which safely to determine what is the popular will. We are entirely at sea, if this is not a test. If not now, neither would it be a test if you were to submit it to another vote. How can you have a reliable test, if, when the people come up to the ballot-box and fairly cast their suffrages, and none are restrained, as I will presently endeavor to show was the case in this instance, we are to be told that this shall not be regarded as an indication of the sentiment of the people? If, then, the constitution is republican, if it has been legitimately adopted, and if it contains no provision plainly in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, it does seem to me that it is the privilege of the new State to ask for admission, and that it is our duty to receive it into the Union, without looking further into the instrument itself to see whether its provisions are in all respects just such as we would have made them.

In acting upon the question of admitting a State in the Union, Congress should not receive or reject the State upon the mere ground of like or dislike of provisions in the constitution. Another State might never be admitted if this were the rule. But were I permitted to decide this question upon what I find in the constitution, I must frankly say that I find in this instrument that which highly commends it to my regard. I find at the very foundation of it the great American principle that none but citizens of the United States shall be permitted to vote in the elections, or otherwise control the political destinies of the State. For this, and for other provisions, American in their character, incorporated in it, I heartily return to its framers my sincerest thanks. My belief is, however, that if the provisions I refer to were not to be found there, other things being right, it would be my duty to vote for the admission of the new State. I find in it another striking feature—and it is that upon which almost the whole question, unfortunately, is made to turn—the recognition of the institution of African slavery. There can be little doubt that it is on this account that a violent and relentless war has been waged upon it by a majority of its opponents. The great mass of those who oppose the admission of Kansas into the Union, oppose it because it comes with a proslavery constitution.

Many of them have, indeed, gone so far as to pledge themselves never to vote for the admission of another slave State into the Union. What a spirit is this! in a Union of States such as ours, formed originally between slave States and free, and in which they are still of nearly equal numbers.

That I should sympathize with such feelings, or in any way coöperate with those who enter the contest animated by so deadly a spirit of hostility to the people of fifteen States of the Union, will not for a moment be expected by any who know me.

By a brief recurrence to historical facts, I will now endeavor to show what I regard as the main point—that this constitution is certainly the result of the deliberate action of the people of Kansas, regularly passing through the various stages of legal action to its final adoption.

In 1854, Congress passed the Kansas-Nebraska act, organizing a temporary territorial government for Kansas, in which it was declared that "the legislative power" of the Territory "shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act." Among the "rightful subjects of legislation" alluded to, was doubtless that of proposing, at the proper time, for taking the sense of the people of the Territory upon the question of adopting a State constitution. This is apparent from the nineteenth section of the act, which, after declaring the territorial government to be "temporary" in its character, looks to the future admission of Kansas into the Union as a State, expressly providing that, "when admitted as a State, or States, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time." We have heard much said lately about the necessity for an "enabling act;" this is a modern necessity that I attach very little consequence to. I see no more necessity for enabling acts now than there was in the earlier days of the Republic, when they were unknown and unrequired. But if one is now thought to be needed, here is an enabling act; and I quote the language of the organic act to show palpable authority to the Territorial Legislature for taking the initiatory step in preparing for a constitution, and for admission into the Union as a State. The legislative power of the Territory extended to "all rightful subjects of legislation," consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of the organic act. The legislative step, submitting to the people the question as to whether they would frame a State constitution, was not only consistent with the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of the organic act, but was expressly warranted in this nineteenth section, which defined the "temporary" character of the territorial government, and looked forward to the formation of "a State, or States."

In accordance, therefore, with this recognition of its right and duty, the Territorial Legislature, in July, 1855, passed an act providing that a poll should be opened for taking the sense of the people upon the expediency of calling a convention to frame a State constitution. This vote was directed to be taken at the general election, to come off in October, 1856. Thus they gave ample time to consider this question. When the day came, the people voted; they voted without interruption. I have never heard that there was fraud charged in taking that vote; and a very large majority of the people determined that they would change the form of their government, and for that purpose call a convention to adopt a constitution. At a subsequent session of the Legislature, in February, 1857, some months after this result had been ascertained, an act was passed providing for taking a census of the people, for making a registry of the voters, and for the election of delegates to the convention. This was all regular. The census and registry were taken, except in certain counties, where it was resisted and prevented by the violence of the Free-Soil party; and when the day appointed for the election of delegates came, which was the third Monday in June, 1857, the delegates were chosen by popular vote, and on the first Monday of September they assembled in convention, and, after due deliberation, adopted the constitution which is now before us. I know of no fraud charged in connection with this election, or with this result; except that the very anti-slavery extremists, who prevented a full census and registry, now have the effrontery to complain of the failure to take a full census and registry.

There was one great and only question which had divided the people of the Territory. Every gentleman knows, whatever may be his position upon this issue, that there was but one great question dividing the people, and that was the question of slavery. The convention had inserted in the constitution a slavery clause; but as it was doubtful whether a majority of the people preferred that the State should be a slaveholding State, they very properly submitted that question, and that question only, to the popular vote.

I maintain that in no other way could the sense of the people have been so clearly ascertained upon this most exciting question. There were doubtless some minor questions upon which the people differed in opinion; but if they had complicated this question with other and minor issues, there would have been great uncertainty as to what the sense of the people was upon the question of slavery; I think therefore they pursued the proper course. This vote was appointed to be taken on the 21st of December, 1857, and was legally cast; when it was found that a very decided majority of the voters had recorded their votes in favor of retaining the slavery clause in the constitution. Thus the whole work was finished, and the constitution was adopted.

It is said that the convention ought to have submitted the whole constitution to a popular vote. It appears to me that this was not at all necessary. The people had already twice voted—once upon calling a convention, and secondly upon the election of delegates to form the constitution—in which they had a fair opportunity of electing, and did elect, delegates reflecting and embodying their will. They had the right to instruct those delegates, had they seen proper, to frame a constitution and submit it to them for ratification. But they did not see proper so to do. On the contrary, the delegates were expressly instructed to “frame a constitution and State government” “for admission into the Union,” without a word as to submitting it to the people. This was well understood at the time the delegates were elected; and this mode was adopted upon the well-established theory that the people can as legitimately make a constitution through their delegates, clothed with full power to carry out their will, as by a direct vote of the whole people. Such mode had been pursued in the adoption of the first Constitution of more than one half of the States of the Union. It was the republican mode, and that which is most compatible, perhaps, with the common usages in a representative government. Whether it is the better mode or not, unquestionably it is one of the most stereotyped processes known to the institutions of our country.

Indeed, in the organic act of Kansas, Congress had pledged itself to leave the people “perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.” If they have chosen a way of their own satisfactory to themselves—the instrument being republican and not violative of the Constitution of the United States—what right have persons, outside of the Territory, to object to it? What right has Congress to interpose, and prescribe to the people of a State a mode different from that they themselves select for forming for themselves a State constitution? What right to say to the people of Kansas, “True, you have adopted a constitution under the full sanctions of the organic law, without violating either the principles of that act or the Constitution of the United States; but you have not proceeded in the mode we think preferable, and therefore we say to you, your work shall be done over again.” It is conceded that this representative mode, adopted in Kansas, has been pursued in a majority of the States without complaint—and who can doubt that but for slavery in this case, this objection would not now be heard.”

It is argued that a large number of people did not vote either upon the question of calling a convention, upon the election of delegates, or in the decision of the question as to whether it should be a free-soil or a slaveholding State; and that, therefore, this constitution does not embody the will of the people. The fact cannot well be doubted that those who did not vote were mainly a mass of German and native anti-slavery extremists—many of them aliens—followers of Lane, and adherents to the revolutionary Topeka constitution, who, from the beginning, have counseled resistance to the government established by authority of the United States, even, to use their own language, “to the bloody issue.” If there were those who were entitled to vote, and did not vote, it is certainly because they refused to vote; denying, as they did, the validity of the territorial laws, and openly resisting the authority of the established government. I propose, in this connection, to give some glimpses of history throwing light upon the uniform conduct of such men as refused to vote; and I appeal to gentlemen if, after contemplating such facts, they can conscientiously feel that they are in the line of their duty in standing by this body of law-breakers against the whole mass of law-abiding citizens of Kansas.

Senator DOUGLAS, who now opposes the Lecompton constitution on the ground that it does not embody the will of the whole people, himself traced, in able reports in the Senate, in 1856, step by step, the disorderly movements of these law-violating men down to the adoption of the revolutionary constitution at Topeka, and their traitorous resolves that they “owe no allegiance” to the Territorial Legislature—that the territorial “laws have no binding force” upon them—that “every freeman among us is at full liberty, consistently with his obligation as a citizen, and a man, to defy and resist them (the territorial laws) if he choose so to do”—that “we will endure and submit to these laws no longer than the best interests of the Territory require, as the least of two evils, and will resist them to the bloody issue as soon as we ascertain that peaceable remedies shall fail, and forcible resistance shall furnish any reasonable prospect of success—and that, in the mean time, we recommend to our friends throughout the Territory the organization and discipline of volunteer companies, and the procurement and preparation of arms.”

Mr. DOUGLAS then informs us that “those who were opposed to allowing the people of the Territory, preparatory to their admission into the Union as a State, to decide the slavery question for themselves,” “finding opposition to the principles of the [Kansas-Nebraska] act unavailing in the Halls of Congress,” resorted to “the machinery of emigrant aid societies.” “The plan adopted,” he adds, “was to make it the interest of a large body of men who sympathized with them in the objects of the corporation, to proceed to Kansas, and acquire whatever residence, and do whatever acts might be found necessary to enable them to vote at the elections, and through the ballot-box, if possible, to gain control over the legislation of the Territory.” “When the emigrants,” said he, “who had been sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company and their affiliated societies, passed through the State of Missouri in large numbers, on their way to Kansas, the violence of their language, and the unmistakable indications of their determined hostility to the domestic institutions of that State, created apprehensions that the object of the company was to abolitionize Kansas, as a means of prosecuting a relentless warfare upon the institutions of slavery within the limits of Missouri.” These men entered Kansas in large numbers, followed by pro-slavery men, who came in to settle or counteract this Abolition influence; and, says Mr. DOUGLAS, “disputes, quarrels, violence, and bloodshed might have been expected as the natural and inevitable consequences.” At the first election held in the Territory, in November, 1854, for a Delegate in Congress, the pro-slavery men were triumphant. Whereupon the emigrant aid men loudly complained that the Missourians had invaded the Territory and controlled the elections. But, says Mr. DOUGLAS, this charge was made “in the absence of all proof and probable truth.” In March, 1855, the elections were held for members of the Legislature, when the pro-slavery men again succeeded in electing a large majority. Frauds were again loudly alleged by the emigrant aid, or Abolition party; but Mr. DOUGLAS tells us that Governor Reeder “having adjudged them to have been duly elected, accordingly granted them certificates of election,” &c.

Soon after this, Governor Reeder was removed; and Mr. DOUGLAS notes the fact that “a few days after Governor Reeder dissolved his official relations with the Legislature,” the incipient step was taken in the Topeka movement to form a revolutionary State government. He shows that their first open declaration was that “the people of Kansas Territory have been, since its settlement, and now are, without any law-making power.” He traces them through their various steps of attempted revolution, shows that they had organized a secret military legion, had pledged themselves to “make Kansas a free State,” were backed by “a powerful corporation, with a capital of $5,000,000 invested in houses and lands, in merchandise and mills, in cannon and rifles, in powder and lead;” and that they decided on “repudiating the laws and overthrowing the territorial government in defiance of the authority of Congress.” It will be well remembered what noisy boasts they made of the efficacy of their Sharpe’s rifles. Such are the men who have failed to vote in the elections determining the constitution with which Kansas applies for admission into the Union; and I have chosen to draw these facts from the statements of one whom the opposition to admission will hardly question. Many of those men, I learn, are foreigners—Germans and others—who have not been naturalized, who are not entitled to vote, and who know as little of the principles of our constitutions as they do of the virtues of law and order. But they were not the less noisy followers of Lane and Topeka. This revolutionary Topeka movement has been kept up until within the last few weeks. On the eve of the lawful election of delegates to the Lecompton convention, it came near producing civil war; and Governor Walker hastened a dispatch to the State Department, announcing that “the most alarming movement proceeds from the assembling, on the 9th of June, of the so-called Topeka Legislature, with a view to the enactment of an entire code of laws,” and predicting that such a result “would lead to inevitable and disastrous collisions.” Soon after the election of delegates to the convention, we find Governor Walker writing to General Harney to send him a regiment of dragoons to put down a rebellion at Lawrence, “involving an open defiance of the laws, and the establishment of an insurgent government in that city.” The next day, the Governor informs the Secretary of State that this was “the beginning of a plan to organize insurrection throughout the Territory.”

A few days after, it was found, says Governor Walker, that General Lane was organizing, under the sanction of the Topeka convention, “the whole so-called free-State party into volunteers,” and “taking the names of all who refused enrollment,” with a view “to terrify the free-State conservatives into submission,” as is “proved by recent atrocities committed on such men by Topeka-ites.” Again, just on the eve of the assembling of the convention at Lecompton to frame a State constitution, Governor Walker informed the State Department that “General Lane and his staff everywhere deny the authority of the territorial laws, and counsel a total disregard of these enactments.” And again, immediately before the vote was to be taken to determine whether the constitution should recognize or ignore slavery, acting Governor Stanton wrote to the Secretary of State that he “had become satisfied that the election ordered by the convention could not be conducted without collision and bloodshed.”

Thus it is apparent that a regular system of disorder, rebellion, and terror was attempted to be kept up during the whole time the constitution was in the process of adoption. Those turbulent men would not vote themselves, and endeavored to deter others from voting. What guarantee, then, have we that they would now vote, if forty opportunities were given them? I, for one, confess that I do not feel the slightest disposition so to humor such men. The fact should be borne in mind that the Lecompton constitution is the work of those who have ever been true to the properly constituted authorities of the Government, while those who have stood aloof have all the time endeavored to resist the law by force and violence. Is such a fact of no moment?

But, say the opponents of the bill, “frauds” have been perpetrated in accomplishing the adoption of this constitution. I think this is a mistake. I do not see that the charge has been sustained by evidence entitled to respect. Gentlemen should not blend with the constitution frauds in elections having no connection with the constitution. The charge in this case is based upon the bare assertion of partisans of the law-violating faction in Kansas, and there is an absence of proof to sustain the assertion. Two men, Messrs. Babcock and Deitzler, who had no official connection with the returns, and who offer no proof of what they allege, state that there were spurious votes given on the 21st of December, when the question was taken upon the slavery clause. And thereupon the outcry is raised that there were frauds. It is well known that even if what they say was true, still a large majority of the legal votes at that election were cast in favor of retaining the slavery clause. But I cannot permit my judgment to be influenced by this unsupported statement of Messrs. Babcock and Deitzler; there is strong circumstantial evidence against it, in the fact that the pro-slavery vote on that occasion was actually smaller than it was a few days after in the election of State officers. In the elections last fall, for a Territorial Legislature, there is evidence of fraud; and there appears to have been fraud, to some extent, in the election on the 4th of January. But these elections, it must be remembered, had no connection whatever with the adoption of the constitution; and in the latter case, particularly, there is reason to believe that the frauds are as likely to have been committed on one side as on the other.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Parrott.

It is curious to observe how ready certain gentlemen are to believe any charge of fraud against the law-abiding men of the Territory, and how slow they are to see that the law-resisting, revolutionary men, who have committed so many outrages, have ever winked at fraud. Why, sir, this cry of "fraud" was commenced by the anti-slavery men here in Congress on the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and it has been kept up ever since. That bill was itself called a fraud. When the first Territorial Legislature was elected, it, too, was declared to be a fraud, though no proof was ever offered to show it; and Governor Reeder himself even certified to the correctness of the returns. Indeed, the census taken at the time shows that there was a large majority of southern voters in the Territory, and no necessity for fraud on the part of the pro-slavery men.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact, that at that point of time there was a majority of southern men there by the official census of the Territory.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the gentleman how he ascertains that?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I understand it from a passage in the report of the Republican investigating committee at the last Congress. It quotes the census taken a month before the election.

Mr. BLAIR. That there was a majority of pro-slavery men there?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. That there was a majority of southern men there.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, that is a very different affair.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I think there are very few men from the South such as the member from Missouri.

Mr. BLAIR. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. Then, if it is a matter of opinion, you need not have interrupted me.

When the congressional Delegate was elected, when the second Territorial Legislature were elected—in short, in all elections, except those held without authority of law, or under the Topeka constitution, this cry of "fraud" has been kept up, until there are really honest and good men who have had their minds misled with the belief that the constitution was carried by frauds. I think there is no evidence of this that ought for a moment to shake our conclusions upon this question.

The assumption that the vote on the 4th of January, taken under a so-called law of the Territorial Legislature, upon the ratification of the constitution, is evidence that a majority of the people are opposed to the constitution, is quite erroneous. That law was itself a nullity, and the Legislature that enacted it had no authority whatever to intermeddle with the constitution. The election was conducted alone by the Free-Soil party, and we have no guarantee that a large number of the reputed ten thousand votes cast were not spurious. A comparison of the number of votes cast with those cast at the same precincts, at other elections, strongly indicates this. There is reason to suppose that many of those voters were Germans, who are not citizens of the United States. I have heard it said that there are fifteen hundred or two thousand German aliens there, who are not entitled to vote, but who are among the most noisy of the men that follow Lane, and sustain the Topeka movements of those who are disturbing the peace of the Territory, and endeavoring to run honest men out of it. But the constitution had already been adopted, and the whole work finished, before this vote was taken. Every step had been regularly taken. The sense of the people had been ascertained, by ballot, in favor of a convention; the convention had been called and the delegates had been elected by the people, with instructions to make a constitution; these delegates had accordingly made a constitution. The only question which had produced division had been submitted to a popular vote, and settled according to law; and the time, and all the circumstances, had transpired, when, according to the letter of the instrument itself, "this constitution shall take effect and be in force." How, then, could a Territorial Legislature subsequently interpose a process to annul the constitution? If that Legislature could do so, so could those which may come after it; which assumption places the Legislature at all times above the sovereign power, which is competent to make and unmake constitutions. Such an assumption would at any time place it in the power of the Legislature to deprive the people of a constitution by a mere accidental legislative majority; and, if put in force in the State governments, would soon render our durable written constitutions as changeable and uncertain as the statutory laws.

It has been objected that, in the final vote upon the constitution, on the 21st of December, the voters were required to swear that they would support the constitution, when adopted. This, it is said, was a great hardship upon the free-State men. I do not so understand it, if they were really law-abiding men. They were then themselves deciding the question, by their votes, whether it was to be a free or a slave State. If they held a majority, they could make it a free State, and cheerfully support it. If they had not a majority, and it were made a slave State against their votes, still, in justice, they should have been willing to support it. It was at least as hard upon one side as upon the other. As to Lane's men, who had so violently resisted all government but that inaugurated at Topeka, it was but just that they, too, if they voted upon the constitution, should be required to swear to support it when adopted. Their past conduct had made this eminently proper.

Complaint is also made that the schedule to the constitution provides that all who are in office shall hold their offices, and all laws in existence shall continue in existence, until changed by laws enacted under the State constitution. Yet such a provision as this is almost universally incorporated in the several States, on the adoption of a new constitution; and it is wisely done to guard against any derangement, incident to a fundamental change of government.

The truth is, that when gentlemen say they will never vote for the admission of another slave State into the Union, they do but lay bare that leading sentiment which prompts a majority of those who oppose this bill. They are wholly unwilling to give to the institutions of the South a fair and equal chance in the Territories which belong in common to all. When the South agreed, in 1820, to the drawing the line of 36° 30' for the sake of peace and compromise, the North did not become satisfied; but the very next year, by a majority of her Representatives, voted to violate it. From that day to this, there has never been an instance in which a slave State has asked for admission into the Union, whether north or south of that line, in which northern men have not opposed it on account of slavery regardless of that compromise—a compromise that prohibited slavery north of 36° 30', and gave no security for its establishment south of that line. The North was unwilling to extend that line to the Pacific, or to give the South any respite from the struggle to restrict slavery south of the line where it has been established. Hence, in 1850, southern men began to ask themselves, is this fair? Then it was that Henry Clay said in the Senate: "I put it to gentlemen of the South, are they prepared to be satisfied with the line of 36° 30', interdicting slavery north of that line, and giving them no security for the admission of slavery south of that line?"

Mr. Clay stated that, in considering a plan of compromise in 1850, "the idea of the Missouri compromise, as it has been termed, came under my [his] review, was considered by me, [him,] and finally rejected." And he added:

"It was high time that the wounds which the Wilmot proviso had inflicted should be healed up and closed; and that to avoid in all future time the agitation which must be produced by the conflict of opinion on the slavery question, the true principle which ought to regulate the action of Congress in forming territorial governments for each newly-acquired domain is to refrain from all legislation on the subject in the territory acquired, so long as it retains the territorial form of government."

This "true principle" having been applied, and the anti-slavery restriction line having been removed in 1854, those northern men who had been unwilling to give the South peace while that line was established as a compromise, suddenly discovered that they were greatly outraged by its repeal. They have kept up the agitation ever since. With or without a compromise line, under any and all circumstances, they have never been willing, and will never be willing, to admit new slave States into the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I confess that my sympathies have been strongly with the gallant men in Kansas, who, under an almost overwhelming combination of adverse circumstances, have bravely maintained the rights, and stood by the institutions of the South. When the unconstitutional restriction line was broken down, its adherents said it should do the South no good; for the North had the population and the power to make Kansas a free State, and immediately they began to put their emigrant aid societies into requisition. Many of the friends of the Kansas bill said there was no chance for, or they had no hope of, establishing slavery in Kansas. Politicians and newspapers all through the South, particularly those opposed to the bill, have ever since held such language on this subject as was calculated to teach the people of the South to believe that there was no hope for establishing slavery there. During all this time, too, the free-State men have been boastfully claiming a majority in Kansas. But during all this same time, and against all these adverse circumstances, the pro-slavery men in Kansas have been bravely standing their ground, and most frequently carrying the elections. But what might they not have accomplished had not hundreds and thousands of the southern people been deterred by such unreliable statements, prophecies, and boasts, from moving into the Territory with their slaves, for fear they would be emancipated or run off by the Abolitionists? My strong belief is, that but for the teachings which have been more or less successfully impressed upon the southern mind that there was no chance to establish slavery in Kansas, the question would long since have been practically settled, and Kansas would by this time have been a slave State in the Union. If admitted with the present pro-slavery constitution, why should she not continue to be a slave State? I, for one, feel that the chances are about equally suspended in the balance, and I cannot, will not, vote against her admission.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. M. J. PARROTT,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PARROTT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I need not apologize for venturing to avail myself of the indulgence of the committee to submit what I have to say respecting the affairs of Kansas. If any apology were necessary, I might find it in the fact that a Delegate from a distant Territory [Mr. LANE, of Oregon] has seen fit to go beyond his own sphere of action, and assail my constituents, in order to promote the welfare of his own. This is the short road to Executive favor. I refrain from characterizing that speech as it deserves, only because I cannot do so consistently with the proprieties of the place. In undertaking to present the case of Kansas, I shall not pursue that intangible, impalpable, and somewhat protean political quantity, called "popular sovereignty," through the intricate mazes of theoretical inquiry, but shall rather seek to unfold its practical workings as developed in the chosen theater of its operations, in the trials of some years. The standpoint from which my views of this subject are taken is not identical with that occupied by any other person on either side of this Chamber. I belong to no political organization recognized here. I have no party to serve, and none to fear, in treading this ground. Sectional parties alone exist in Kansas. No others could exist, because the great paramount issue, framed and submitted to the people for their decision by Congress, in the passage of the organic act, was a sectional question—the question of slavery. Sharing in this struggle, I have striven with my whole heart and all my strength for the supremacy of that class of domestic institutions which experience has demonstrated to be best calculated to foster, ameliorate, enlarge, and improve the condition of the free white laboring men of the country, and thereby to strengthen the stability of republican institutions, of which this great interest is, in my opinion, the main stay. Although chosen as a representative by those who favor this system of government, subsequent developments have greatly enlarged the number of those for whom I claim to speak.

The sectional issue which has heretofore obtained, is swallowed up in a still greater issue, precipitated upon us, and upon the whole country, by the presentation here of the Lecompton constitution. When I stand here in my place to plead for the inherent right of the people of Kansas to frame their fundamental law, I may claim, without exaggeration, to speak for the whole people of Kansas, irrespective of their party predilections.

The Kansas act guaranteed to extend to all who should settle under its provisions certain definitive political privileges, as well for their protection as for their guidance, whilst the country should remain in a state of pupillage. This act was characterized by a declaration of the doctrine of non-intervention by Congress with the subject of slavery in the Territories, "leaving the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

It will appear by an analysis of this general declaration, as found in the details of the bill, that the people were to have the right of representation in this branch of Congress, the uninterrupted choice of a local Legislature, and the supervision of their local and municipal affairs. The Constitution of the United States was extended, in terms, over the Territory, as indeed it would have been without words to that effect—thus beyond doubt securing to citizens the added privileges flowing from that instrument, of a higher and more inviolable kind than those conferred by simple statute law.

These rights, combined, made up the aggregate or sum of political power pledged to the people of the Territory. No one will deny that these were promised, or that the faith of the country was pledged for the fulfillment of them. Yet do they stand to-day recorded on your statute-book, and plighted pledges of the nation, broken, disregarded, dishonored, but not disclaimed. These popular rights and privileges, in support of which the honor of the nation was concerned, have been all, without exception, without the authority of law, but in defiance of it, even without the apology of provocation, wantonly and continually violated.

Voiceless in this House, and borne down by a usurped Legislature within its borders, the Territory has languished under a dreary despotism, imposed by foreign domination, and maintained by the direct intervention of the military arm of the Government. All lawful resistance, as well as all appeals for redress, have been stigmatized by epithets alike odious and untrue.

Without rights of any kind, we have been without remedy for wrongs, however flagrant. A most merciless and persecuting warfare has been carried on against us. The hard earnings of our industry have been swept away from us by the hand of robbery; our homes filled with fear by the ceaseless oppression of ruffians invested with the color of law; our lives at times seriously imperiled, alternately by the periodical incursions of a foreign foe, or the no less remorseless process of judicial proscription.

The many have been ruled by the few. The invaders dominated the inhabitants. Those who should have had all the political power have had none; and those who should have had none have had all. With occasional intervals of quiet, but for the most part through scenes of violence, bloodshed, and war, this state of things has gone on until it has culminated in the Lecompton constitution; and upon this, they who have supported this scheme now make a stand, demanding a reinforcement of power wherewith to prolong, and, if possible, to make permanent, the vassalage of the people. Of this constitution I have to say, that it was vicious in its origin, that the convention which framed it was fraudulently constituted, and that the plan of its pretended submission was fallacious, and contrived as a cheat by which to circumvent the people. In support of this view, in the first place let me recur briefly to some antecedent events in our history, because I submit that no comprehensive, intelligent view of this question can be arrived at without keeping constantly in sight the relation which this particular measure sustains to the precedent legislation of the Territory. There never has been any territorial government in Kansas. The organic act failed to secure one, for two reasons: first, the intrusion of non-resident voters; and, second, the improper intervention of Federal power.

Prior in point of time to the passage of this law, but in anticipation of it, a secret political society was organized in the western counties of the State of Missouri. The object of this society was to forestall the domestic institutions of the yet unborn Territory by unfair means. Through the mischievous machinations of this association, working by means of secret signs, oaths, and rituals, a most formidable power was concentrated and disciplined for the destruction of popular rights in the Territory, on the first available occasion, by the exercise of physical force. An occasion soon occurred. A census of the inhabitants and voters, preliminary to the election of the first Legislative Assembly, as a basis upon which to apportion representation, having been completed and returned to the Governor in the spring of 1855, that officer, after regulating the details, such as defining the districts, appointing judges, &c., fixed the election for the 30th of March, 1855. Every intelligent man in the country knows what took place in Kansas on the 30th day of March, 1855. I shall not repeat details that are familiar. I only say this—that the secret society unloosed its folds on that day, and poured its emissaries into the Territory, with the avowed design of bearing down the real population, and taking possession of the polls. Every precinct in the Territory but one was carried by the invading horde. In this manner and by such means was the right of the people to choose their own local Assembly wrested from them, and the power incident thereto lodged in the hands of irresponsible invaders.

Being now securely entrenched behind the awful powers thus usurped from the people to whom they rightfully belonged, the invaders met in the month of July, and proceeded to enact their guilty designs into the forms of law. Whatever else may be said of these laws, it cannot be denied that they are well adapted to promote the object for which they were designed. That object, of course, was the retention of the ill-gotten power of the 30th of March in the hands of its then possessors. To that end, it was becoming that they should seek to destroy all the great aids by which public opinion is generated and expressed. They buried the ballot-box beneath infamous or impossible conditions; invidious test oaths were skillfully contrived, by means of which the elector should either be thrust as a recusant from the polls, or be debauched or demoralized by the act of submission to the test. Freedom of speech was stifled; the ball and chain, the collar and the lock, the halter and the scaffold, were prescribed penalties for the violation of that salutary provision of despotism, that none shall call in question the title of the "powers that be." The press muzzled and the people gagged, the far-reaching influences of literature were next assailed.

The imprimatur of the usurping Assembly was made a condition precedent to the circulation of any printed matter of a political kind. The lessons bequeathed by the fathers, as well as the best approved doctrines of our Democratic cotemporaries, were alike cut short in this procrustean bed. The Assembly trampled down the prescriptive rights of the people to municipal officers of their own election, and imposed upon them creatures of the invading class, with a prohibition of popular election for two years. In short, they stretched across the whole field of popular rights, as Congress had defined it, a net-work of perfidious legislation, with which to ensnare and finally enslave their adversaries. Now, let me inquire what the people, thus outraged and despoiled of their rights, had to say to this business? On the 5th day of September, shortly after the adjournment of the bogus Assembly, a convention was held at Big Springs. It was the first public assemblage of the real citizens of the Territory, to consider the aspect of public affairs. After reciting the facts as they transpired in respect to the manner of the election of the Legislature, they repudiated its enactments, and declared themselves released from any obligation to acknowledge or respect its assumed authority. An issue was thus made up on the validity of this legislation. Those who maintained the legislation were now reinforced, in this behalf, by a new and powerful ally—the President of the United States. Already within the spell of that fatuity which hurried him rapidly downward through every gradation of sentiment, until, from the pride of the nation, he became its shame and reproach, he struck out boldly with the military arm of the Government in behalf of this great wrong. Instructions were given to the territorial executive to enforce the laws. They were rapidly reduced to practice, and a state of war supervened.

In the month of December, twelve hundred men recruited in the State of Missouri, in response to the call of the Governor, appeared in Kansas, and were enrolled as Kansas militia. They were led against a village of the interior, the nucleus of the New England settlement, on the specious plea that its inhabitants were hostile to the pretended laws. For some time, this infuriate force invested the devoted town and ravaged the adjacent country. On this occasion the first innocent blood was spilled. The first victim fell by the hand of a Federal office-holder, then, as he is now, a recipient of the confidence as well as the patronage of the Administration. The power of the President was interposed, after he had been indicted, to shield him from any accountability for this dreadful crime. Amid the gloomy forebodings of this excitement, we entered on the year 1856. The coordinate branches of the local Government vied with the Executive in prostituting their functions in this unholy cause. The most powerful branch—the one more powerful than all the rest beside, the subtlest engine always and everywhere, when prostituted to base purposes, that can be brought to bear against the liberties of civil society—I mean the judiciary—was particularly conspicuous in its infamous zeal. The chief justice had, in fact, already violated propriety as well as his oath of office, by deciding, in advance of any case, in favor of the validity of the laws.

Now, he ruled that a refusal to acknowledge the binding character of the local legislation was treason against the United States. This judicial solecism was practically applied. Grand juries, packed for the purpose by the United States marshal, flooded the country with indictments. Scarcely an honest man escaped. The process of the court went forth to arrest the multiplied offenders. New mobs, levied from foreign States, cruised about the Territory, under color of the United States marshal's posse comitatus, destroying printing-presses, burning hotels, sacking towns and villages—in short, in a general career of rapine and robbery, in the name of law and order, as defined by the chief justice, whose edicts they enforced, and by whom they were in their turn upheld in the commission of incalculable villainy. One instance, which fell under my observation, I will give, as an illustration of the infinite inhumanity, the varied and outrageous cruelty, commonly practiced under the pretext of serving writs, as well as of the writs themselves.

A charge of treason was trumped up against two men. They were forthwith seized by a deputy marshal and his posse, their limbs loaded with heavy iron chains, and themselves dragged, literally dragged, along the earth a distance of more than fifty miles. Bail was declined, and they were committed to prison. Term followed term, yet no indictment was found. After many months of weary confinement, sick and impoverished, they were reluctantly discharged, no one appearing to prosecute them. This instance will serve to show that the process of the court was a mere pretext to get possession of the persons whose influence the Government had reason to fear. The President of the United States cheered on this diabolical business, with special proclamations, with money, with arms, and with men. The surveyor-general's office, under the auspices of Calhoun, was used as a recruiting station, and the Government funds to pay the recruits. A system of espionage was instituted in the post offices, the mails habitually ransacked, and offensive matter not unfrequently pillaged and published. Batteries of cannon on the banks of the Missouri river, the ordinary route to the Territory, effectually closed it to emigration. The route through Nebraska, the only practicable one left, was guarded by squadrons of dragoons. Trains of emigrants, irrespective of their character or intentions, were stopped, and both persons and property seized and detained. Meantime, a rendezvous was opened at Oxford—since so prolific of election returns—to recruit a militia force from Missouri, with which to desolate the obnoxious settlements of the Territory, while in this enfeebled condition, beyond the hope of recovery. This army, when, after several weeks, it took up the line of march for the interior, numbered twenty-seven hundred men, well armed, and fortified with eight pieces of cannon belonging to the State of Missouri.

About this time, August, 1856, the most frightful scene of all our history occurred—the sack of Leavenworth. A mob, under the lead of a Federal office-holder, (he is still one,) assisted in the command by other persons, who have since, by virtue of their services on this occasion, been rewarded with lucrative places under the present Administration, took possession of the city. Innocent men were butchered by daylight in the open streets, women and children were forced, at the point of the bayonet, to fly from their homes; larger numbers of citizens were constrained to leave the country in order to save their lives; the stores, warehouses, and private dwellings of the city were forced open, and their valuable contents distributed among this ruffian band. Some persons, with their families, sought shelter in a United States garrison, close at hand. They were shortly ordered away. It may be well imagined with what feelings of mortification this little band of sufferers turned away from the flag of their country, ample indeed to protect an American citizen from indignity in any part of the world, save his own. The whole country was infested with roving bands of ruffians. Manifold and most foul murders were committed. Long afterwards the bodies of missing men were found unburied where they fell. This desperate condition of things forced the rural population to abandon their homes, and seek safety in fortified camps. The industrial interests of the country paralyzed, want became wide-spread. I have not time to note particularly the many affecting and deplorable incidents that mark this reign of terror. It was protracted through many months, abated somewhat to meet the exigencies of a pending presidential election, but renewing itself with more or less fury, after that motive for modified action had passed away.

These occurrences, which I have rapidly glanced at, make up what the President, in his annual message, is pleased to style "the alarming condition of Kansas at the time of my (his) inauguration." Twelve months have rolled by since he ascended the seat of power, and what is the condition of Kansas now? How have we profited by the change? Have we less of the corrupt and profligate crew of Federal officials, whose presence has so long cursed the country? Not only do the old offenders remain, but new appointments have been made, if possible, more insulting, intolerable, and outrageous than the preceding ones. No other test of fitness has been sought for or applied, save a clear complicity with the crimes that have characterized the career of the Administration party in the Territory. Most of these appointees are in this city to-day, fugitives from the aroused vengeance of the people, hiding here in the shadow of the White House. One of these appointees, at the time of his appointment, stood indicted for murder and other heinous crimes. This fact was notorious; the President knew it. The appointment was made, and then the law officer of the President promptly stepped forward and entered a "nolle prosequi" on the bill. Thus, a second time, was interposed the hand of authority to save a criminal from the consequences of his crime. Has the army been withdrawn? It is well known, that under this, as under the last Administration, it has been used to support all the reckless and desperate schemes of the pro-slavery party. Did not its bugle sound the charge of ruffians on the ballot-box in the elections of December and January last? It will hardly be denied. And the judges, whose fame for corruption has passed into a proverb—where are they?

Still on the bench, to darken and degrade the highest offices of human intellect; to fulminate decrees inspired by passion, and shock the conscience of Christendom by an open prostitution of the law, punishing the innocent, but screening the guilty. Such is the alarming condition of things now, not less than a twelvemonth ago. Nor this alone. In this twelvemonth, an intermediate work of most fearful augury has begun. The Lecompton constitution has been framed. The President sends it here, as the finale of the Kansas troubles. It will be observed that I do not present that constitution, although I am the organ of that people upon this floor. That blow at their rights cannot be stricken through me. On the other hand, in the course of my duty, I have had occasion, from time to time, to lay before this House much pertinent testimony against it; protests from the people by their conventions; protests from the people by their Legislature, indicating the indignant and almost unanimous disapproval of it by those who are falsely said to have framed it, and for whose benefit it is with still greater falsity said to be intended. The law to which this instrument is referable was enacted in February of 1857. The Legislature in which it originated consisted of a Council, chosen on the 30th March, 1855, still holding over, and a House of Representatives, chosen in October, 1856, under the operation of the test oaths. I shall be told that Congress has pronounced this Legislature valid, and their laws binding. It may be so. This assumption is in fact the groundwork of all the assaults against the cause of popular rights in the Territory. But I deny that such action on the part of Congress can estop the people of Kansas from pleading the facts of the case.

Congress cannot change truth into falsehood, nor falsehood into truth. These qualities are inherent in the essence of things; they are indestructible, unchangeable, and eternal. The people of Kansas will maintain, doggedly if you please, the truth of their history, though every Congress, for a century to come, should vainly seek to falsify it by short-sighted attempts to enact right into wrong.

The usurpation of the 30th March, 1855, is a persistent truth. It cannot be forgotten; it must not be ignored. It taints with its pestilential touch every subsequent act of the territorial government, from the day on which it was seized to the day when the last ballot-box was stuffed, and the last return forged to complete a simulated showing in behalf of this Lecompton constitution.

Although I deny that the conditions of valid law are to be found in these enactments, or that they were entitled to more attention than the people, from motives of convenience or policy, might choose to render them, yet, for the sake of this discussion, I am willing to yield what gentlemen on the other side claim on this point. From it let them defend this constitution if they can.

I assert, in the first place, that the Legislature contemplated the commission of a gross fraud when it passed the act to provide for the convention. The evidence of this is apparent from reading the law itself.

The first section provides that it shall be the duty of the sheriffs of the several counties of the Territory, and they are hereby required, between the 1st day of March and the 1st day of April, 1857, to make an enumeration of all the free white male inhabitants, citizens of the United States, over twenty-one years of age, and all other white persons, actually resident in their several counties, &c.

Section two provides, that in case of a vacancy in the office of sheriff, these duties shall be performed by the judge of probate, &c.

The third section provides that it shall be the duty of this officer to file in the office of probate judge, on or before the 10th of April, a full and complete list of all the qualified voters in their respective counties on the first of April, 1857, which list shall exhibit, in a fair and legible hand, the names of all such qualified voters.

Section seven provides for an apportionment on the basis of this returned list.

Section eight provides that no person shall vote unless his name appear on the corrected list.

The nineteenth section districts the Territory as follows: Doniphan county shall constitute the first election district; Brown and Nemaha, the second; Atchinson, the third; Leavenworth, the fourth; Jefferson, the fifth; Calhoun, the sixth; Marshall, the seventh; Riley, the eighth; Johnson, the ninth; Douglas, the tenth; Shawnee, Richardson, and Davis, the eleventh; Lykins, the twelfth; Franklin, the thirteenth; Weller, Breckinridge, Wise, and Madison, the fourteenth; Butler and Coffey, the fifteenth; Linn, the sixteenth; Anderson, the seventeenth; Bourbon, McGee, Donn, and Allen, the eighteenth; Woodson, Wilson, Godfrey, Greenwood, and Hunter, the nineteenth.

Four other counties—to wit: Clay, Dickenson, Washington, and Pottawatomie—are not so much as mentioned in the law. What I wish to call particular attention to is the fact, conclusive of fraud by the Legislature, that fourteen of the counties thus enumerated were without any county organization, and of course without a sheriff or probate judge; and therefore destitute of the only machinery provided by law for taking the census and registration. This appears to have been done deliberately, as no provision is anywhere made for such a thing as an unorganized county. Fifteen counties were thus wholly excluded by the Legislature from any possible participation in this proceeding. In addition to this, it appeared, on the returns being made, that in the counties of Anderson, Franklin, and Breckinridge, (organized counties,) the officers had failed to take a census and registration. Here, then, we have fourteen counties named in the act, but with no provision whatever for a census and registration, and four counties not named at all, and of course excluded, making in all eighteen counties deliberately disfranchised by the Legislature. To this is to be added the three counties in which the officers were delinquent, and the aggregate of disfranchised counties amounts to twenty-one—that is, more than half the whole number into which the Territory is divided.

This plain statement must settle this point—it cannot be further controverted. In order, however, to diminish the force of this objection, it is said that but few people were living in these counties; not enough, as the argument runs, to have materially influenced the result. Let us see whether this is true, in point of fact. In the election of October last, the aggregate vote of this disfranchised district, under a law prescribing a six months' previous residence, amounted to nearly three thousand. Now, it will be observed, that every one who was entitled to vote in October would have been a voter at the election of delegates to the convention, if his name had been registered. So far, then, from the voting population of those counties having been insignificant, it is quite certain, on the other hand, that, if this vote had been polled, as we are bound to presume it would have been, if an opportunity had been afforded, it was of sufficient strength to have changed the complexion of the convention. If we take into consideration the fact that three quarters and more of this vote was cast in October, on an issue involving this very Lecompton constitution, against that instrument, as I shall presently show, it may be reasonably inferred that the exclusion of it made the political complexion of the constitutional convention what it was—pro-slavery.

In regard to the other counties in which the census and registration were pretended to be performed, I have only to say that there was well-grounded complaint. The registration was partial, imperfect, and to some extent fraudulent. The aggregate of registered votes was nine thou sand and upwards. The election was held in June, uninterruptedly, so far as I have heard. The convention received less than two thousand votes. But the question is frequently put, why did you not vote? For two reasons: first, we considered the whole scheme to be a conspiracy, with which it was dangerous to be complicated; and, secondly, we relied on the distinct and emphatic pledge of the President, given through Governor Walker, that we should be protected in our reserved right of voting for or against the instrument, when it should pass from the hands of the convention. A large majority of the people, beyond doubt, were lulled into indifference or deluded into inaction by this pledge of the President, authoritatively rendered them.

The convention organized in September, but adjourned to await the issue of the October election. For the first time in the history of the country, both parties met at the polls, after a long yet peaceful canvass, in the full enjoyment of the right of suffrage. The result undeniably indicated public opinion. The free-State party bore off the victory by five thousand majority. No issue of the canvass was more widely discussed and better understood than that which pertained to this convention. The so-called Democratic party indorsed it, and their candidate for Congress openly declared that he would, if elected, advocate the admission of the State under it, whether it was submitted to the people or not. On the other hand, the free-State party, through their Representative, declared the convention to be a fraud to the bottom, from which nothing could originate that deserved their respect; and that the constitution, if submitted to the action of the people, should be trampled down; and if not submitted to the people, they had the pledge of the President that Congress should reject it, or at least his influence to that end. This popular monition was not thrown away on the convention itself. When they met again, it was under the protection of the United States Army. Henceforth its sessions were thus protected. On the 7th of November, the convention finished its work and adjourned. The constitution they had framed was not submitted to a vote of the people for approval or rejection—nor was any substantive part of it thus submitted. A proposition relative to the future importation of slaves was submitted; but the disposition of that, whatever it might be, could in no manner affect the status of the negro under the future State government. Slavery was thoroughly tingrafted in the instrument. For these reasons, the people despise and abhor this constitution.

This fact cannot be doubted. It was proven by the election in October last; it was demonstrated by the joint resolutions of the representatives of the people assembled in the Territorial Legislature, which I have had the honor to present to this House, and which now stand on your records; it was demonstrated last, and best of all, by a specific vote to that effect on the 4th of January last, under a law of the Legislature, when more than ten thousand votes were given against it. On the other hand, the Lecompton party has, with characteristic recklessness, perpetrated the most gigantic frauds on the ballot-box, in order to fabricate a showing of popularity for their scheme. At the pretended submission of the constitution, in December, there were for the constitution with slavery six thousand one hundred and forty-three votes; for the constitution without slavery, five hundred and sixty votes—in all, about seven thousand, of which a majority of five thousand five hundred was in favor of the slavery proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to obtain from the gentleman a statement of fact to which my attention was particularly called, in the course of my remarks yesterday. The gentleman has referred to the vote of ten thousand majority given by the anti-Lecomptonites at the election on the 4th of January. I wish the gentleman to give us the benefit of his knowledge as to the fraudulency or the fairness of that particular vote. How many, if any, of that vote have been ascertained subsequently to the vote to be fraudulent? I should be glad to ascertain the fact as to the genuineness of that vote.

Mr. PARROTT. I shall be very happy to furnish the gentleman from Kentucky with all the information which I have on the subject. I have not heard any person in the Territory, and I do not now recollect that I have heard any person here, charge that any of these votes were fraudulent. I remember having been present when a discrepancy was supposed to have been discovered between the vote cast in the city of Leavenworth in October, and the vote cast in January. I refer to a discussion on this point in the Senate Chamber. The discrepancy is easily accounted for. No person could vote in October, except such as had previously resided six months in the Territory; while the qualification in January was, if I am not mistaken, merely a bona fide residence at the time. That sufficiently accounts for the discrepancy; for between the 1st of April, 1857, and the 4th of January, 1858, I should say (speaking without a precise knowledge, however) that the voting population had almost doubled itself. I may say, therefore, that I do not know, nor do I believe, that any portion of that vote was fraudulent.

Mr. PEYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARROTT. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. PEYTON. I see, from the minority report made in the Senate by Mr. DOUGLAS, that in the eighteen counties registered there were nine thousand six hundred votes polled against the constitution on the 4th of January; that the census showed nine thousand two hundred and fifty votes on the 21st of December. The pro-slavery party polled six thousand seven hundred votes for the constitution. So that the vote polled against the constitution on the 4th of January was four or five hundred more than the whole number of registered voters. Now, I want to know if these six thousand seven hundred voters, who voted for the Lecompton constitution on the 21st December, turned round and voted against the constitution on the 4th of January, or are there sixteen or seventeen thousand voters in those counties?

Mr. PARROTT. I would say to my friend from Kentucky, that I am coming to that point. Undoubtedly, there are not so many voters in the registered counties. A commission, appointed by the Legislature of Kansas, composed of most reliable men, have had this subject under investigation. It appears from their report, based on the testimony of the judges and clerks of some of the election precincts, that, of the six thousand votes and upwards cast in December, nearly one half were fraudulent. These fraudulent votes, too, were discovered mainly at three precincts. Of the votes cast, or pretended to be cast, on the 21st December, nearly one half—three thousand and twelve—were obtained at the precincts of Oxford, Shawnee, and Kickapoo, in this proportion: Oxford, one thousand two hundred and sixty-six; Shawnee, seven hundred and twenty-nine; and Kickapoo, one thousand and seventeen. A recent census of these precincts shows the whole number of white inhabitants in Oxford to be forty-seven; in Shawnee, one hundred; and in Kickapoo, not to exceed three hundred. It is safe, therefore, to say that, of the whole number of votes cast, or pretended to be cast, on the 21st December, not over two thousand were polled by actual citizens of the Territory. This will account for the apparent surplus as to the registered vote.

I may be allowed to say further, in this connection, that the very valuable labor of the commission to which I have adverted discloses the precise manner, in some instances, in which this vote was gotten up. It was forged. The names of those who committed the crime are in the evidence. No candid man who reads that testimony can have a doubt left in his mind of the unscrupulous character of these elections.

What is said of the election of the 21st of December is also applicable to the election of the 4th of January. By such flagrant frauds as these, the impression was sought to be made upon the country that there was popular support given to this constitution in the Territory.

Mr. PEYTON. In the election of State officers, how did it happen that they polled only four thousand votes in the same counties where they polled nine thousand six hundred votes against the constitution?

Mr. PARROTT. The gentleman is in error as to the number of votes polled for State officers.

It was over six thousand, I believe—less by several thousand, certainly, than the vote against the constitution. This is explained in this way: the regular convention of the free-State party decided not to contest the election. Some gentlemen, dissatisfied with this policy, or the manner of the decision, or both, took the responsibility of putting a ticket in the field. It was generally denominated "the bolter's ticket." I mention this fact to show that it did not secure the united vote of the anti-Lecompton men, and hence fell below the vote cast against the constitution on the same occasion.

I have gone far enough into this matter to show that this constitution, so far from having any support among the people, is in fact abhorred and repudiated by them. It is branded with the ineffaceable badges of fraud in its inception, progress, and consummation.

Now, I appeal to you, representatives of the people, to know whether, with the evidences of fraud standing thick upon it, you can give it the sanction of your support? If you do, you will force the State into the Union against her wishes; and such a union, without harmony or affection, will breed immedicable distempers in the body-politic.

You may pass this constitution, but I respectfully submit that it is beyond even your power to make a government under it.

It is but repeating an axiom of our political theory, to say that there can be no government without the consent of the people. Yes; you may pass this constitution, but the people who are thus perfidiously betrayed will never allow it to stand between them and the inestimable rights which they have been taught to defend at every sacrifice, not excepting that of life itself. Can you expect that American citizens will tamely submit to such a despotic measure?

"At one of the last councils which Charles held, a remarkable scene took place. The charter of Massachusetts had been forfeited. A question arose, how for the future the colony should be governed. The general opinion of the board was, that the whole power, legislative as well as executive, should abide in the Crown. Halifax took the opposite side, and argued with great energy against absolute monarchy, and in favor of representative government. It was vain, he said, to think that a population sprung from the English stock, and animated by English feelings, would long bear to be deprived of English institutions. Life, he exclaimed, would not be worth having, in a country where liberty and property were at the mercy of a despotic master."

Substantially, that question is reproduced here to-day, after the lapse of two centuries, touching the government of a distant dependency of the United States—not now in the Cabinet of a tottering King, but in the Council House of the American people, long accustomed to vaunt themselves the freest on the globe. Life, indeed, I may say, with that eminent English statesman, in this country, is not worth having, where liberty is at the mercy of one despotic master, though that master be the President of the United States. Where the voluntary principle of Government ends, there should revolution begin—not the right of revolution only, for that is inherent, but the exercise of that right. Such a case may be made by the business before us, presenting the alternative of revolution or a submission to the inextinguishable shame which the passage of this measure will entail upon us and our children after us.

Better, far better, would it be, in my opinion, that the sunny slopes of our magnificent mediterranean Territory should be stricken with the waste of the desert, or smoke with the blood of our people, than that they should blossom, fructify, and yield their increase to the hand of servile labor, whether white or black. Knowing something of the great spirit of that people, steeled as it has been to suffering by years of patient fortitude, I declare my confident conviction, in this presence, that they cannot be dragged into a tame compliance with this great wrong.

"Easier were it
To hurl the rooted mountain from its base,
Than force the yoke of slavery on men
Determined to be free."

Most wonderful of all is it that this measure should be mistaken for one of peace. Peace from injustice! peace from oppression and fraud! peace from the destruction, in fact, of the great principle of popular government, the enjoyment of which can alone render peace honorable or even tolerable to an American citizen!

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Niblack.

Ho. OF REFS.

So far from bringing peace, I submit that this is a measure of unrest. A government is proposed, of which coercion is to be the motive power. Coercion is war. What has the coercion of years past accomplished? Not a government; but a necessity only for further coercion, or for a return to the right rule of law. I marvel much to see the South, illumined by the historic halo of good deeds done in the name of Freedom, rich in the treasured fame of the pure and lofty men she has freely given up to the cause of the Republic in all times of peril, cherishing not unfairly lofty conceptions of honor, and a zeal not accustomed to calculate in the cause of truth, now moving forward in solid column, lowering her crest, and with averted eyes joining battle for a cause that has nothing of right, and still less of favorable interest to her institutions, involved in its proposed success. I say to her, respectfully, that there is perfidy in this business, and such perfidy as will return to plague her when too late to retrace the step she is now taking. When the spoils of the victory are told, she will exclaim—

"For Banquo's issue have I fill'd my mind."

Put rancors in the vessel of my peace,
Only for them."

You who ask, and justly, too, that your constitutional rights shall be respected, can with ill grace, I submit, afford to deny that boon to others, under any pretense, however specious. Beware how you sow infirmities in the spirit of your adversary!

The President has seen fit, in his annual and special messages, to stigmatize the people of Kansas as rebellious and revolutionary in their conduct and opinions. In his annual message he says, "it is to be regretted that all the qualified electors had not registered themselves;" and again, that "a large proportion of the citizens of Kansas did not think proper to register themselves, an opportunity to do so having been afforded," &c. I have already shown that it was never contemplated by the act that the people, or any part of them, should "register themselves;" on the other hand, it is made the imperative duty of certain municipal officers. Again, I have shown that no fair opportunity was given to the people either to register themselves—a thing not contemplated—or to be registered by others officially assigned to that duty; and there I leave this unfounded insinuation. But these charges are based mainly on two specifications: 1. That the people sought to subvert the territorial government; and 2. That they set up the Topeka constitution in defiance of the General Government, and with a view to form an independent State.

Now, as respects their position to the Territorial Legislature. It cannot be denied, and least of all by me, that they have been persistently hostile to that body, while it was an imposed and usurping assemblage. Knowing it to be the creature of fraud, they could not recognize it without becoming accessory after the fact to the great crime charged against it. But this opposition has been limited to a non-recognition of its validity—to action of a negative kind merely. On the other hand, this Government is indebted to the loyal forbearance of the people for its existence so long. They could have swept it from their soil long ere this, had they chosen.

This is all; and if this be revolution, rebellion, or treason, I own my participation in it, without fear and without shame. But the Topeka constitution! Is there treason lurking in its folds? What are the facts in relation to it? The people met, framed it, and petitioned Congress to admit them under it. It was a petition for a redress of their grievances. They were in the strict line of precedent—indeed others had gone further without reproach—in setting up a constitution and State government on the authority of the people alone.

It was framed and held in strict subordination to the will of Congress. The convention which framed it sent it here with a memorial for admission. The first Legislature under it, at its first meeting in March, again at its meeting in July, and yet again at its meeting in January of the next year, and still again in July, memorialized Congress for its recognition. Since the formation of the Topeka constitution, no Legislature or convention of the people has met without reiterating, in some form or other, their entire dependence on Congress for the vitality of the instrument. Since I have had a seat here I have presented many petitions to that effect, one alone signed by four thousand voters. I have also presented the joint resolutions of the Legislature to the same effect; and now, after two years industriously employed by the friends of this constitution in piling petition upon petition before Congress, and in presenting the accumulated evidences of its acceptability to the people, again there comes, and from the Chief Magistrate of the Union, this stale imputation—something the worse for age—of rebellion and treason, to terrify the timid, to embarrass the uninformed, to prejudice the public, and thus to bolster up the fortunes of a falling cause. It should be set at rest.

The loyal people that I represent, discouraged by the persistent deafness of Congress to their petitions on this subject, have at last, of their own motion, discarded the Topeka constitution and its government. I speak these words in justice to its memory, and in vindication of the motives of those who so long sustained it.

I should like, if time permitted, to draw a parallel between these two constitutions—Topeka, the child of popular sovereignty, and Leecompton, the illicit offspring of popular violence and presidential intervention—a wretched bastard pretender, "scarce half made up," that now stands with brazen mendacity at your bar, a candidate for the honors which belong to legitimacy alone.

The former confessedly sprang spontaneously from the people, asking the restitution of their rights; the latter is the vile spawn of usurpation, emitted by spurious legislation; and so far from having any support from the people, it slinks away, like a convicted felon, from any submission of its pretensions to the judgment of a popular verdict.

Mr. CLEMENS. Do I understand the gentleman from Kansas to contend that the Topeka constitution is either legal or legitimate; and that he, a Delegate of the people of Kansas, maintains, in the discharge of his official duty, that constitution in preference to the Leecompton?

Mr. PARROTT. I said, a moment ago, that the people of Kansas had virtually withdrawn their application under the Topeka constitution. In answer further, however, to the gentleman from Virginia, I say I do, in the discharge of my official duty, give the Topeka constitution vastly the preference. In every point of view, it is incomparably superior to the one framed at Leecompton. I was going on to say a word of the attitude occupied by the friends and framers of the Topeka constitution, in relation to the territorial government. Those who made and upheld this constitution whilst it was a living measure, so far from subverting the territorial government, have, in reality, rescued it from the odium and imbecility beneath which it was prostrate; they have lifted it from the ground, poured oil into its wounds, and infused into its veins the newness of life, through popular support. Nay, more; they are the only defenders of it against those who were its worst enemies, while they enjoyed it by usurpation; and its only ones, now that they can no longer wrest it to their unlawful ends. But, alas! with the departure of the ruffian usurpation, has fled also those charms which once captivated the affections of the executive bosom. The President no longer upholds this government.

Enough has been said on this subject to show you that the specifications on which the President grounds his charges against the people of Kansas are palpably erroneous, as illustrated by the records of Congress, as well as otherwise.

The people of Kansas have borne and forborne much for the sake of the Constitution and Union, which they revere. I could, if my time permitted, point you to some instances where they have suffered outrages at the hands of the Federal authorities, rather than adopt the dreadful alternative of resistance to its process. On the 21st day of May they suffered a band of drunken blackguards, because a United States marshal, in abuse of his authority, marched at their head, to overrun and desolate one of the fairest and most cherished towns of the Territory. Again, in the same year, on the 4th of July, what do we see? That is a sacred day. Partisan spirit, however rampant, is generally exorcised by the shades of the immortal patriots that are evoked by the stirring memories of that anniversary of our national freedom. It did not happen so on this occasion. The people had assembled to commemorate the day, and to exercise the great constitutional right of consulting about public affairs.

While engaged in their pious purposes, the sun in the meridian, the rattle of sabers is heard, then the tramp of armed men, and the assembly is dispersed by a regiment of Federal dragoons. Yet we are told that the people of Kansas are revolutionary, when these flagrant acts of tyranny have been submitted to, sooner than raise an arm against the colors of our country. Who is the President of the United States, that he should dare to libel and insult any portion of the people, threatening them with ostracism if they do not bow the head and bend the knee in servile compliance to the dogmatic arrogance of his demands? But for his infidelity to two noted pledges, this constitution would never have vexed the peace of the country. The first was given in the presidential campaign, and was to the effect that the people of Kansas should be left free to form their domestic institutions; and the second was his pledge, through Governor Walker, that the right of passing on their constitution should be sacred to them. The infraction of these pledges has brought division and dismay to the ranks of his followers, and distrust of his designs to the country at large.

One word more of the people of Kansas. They are the peers of the President—they are not surpassed by any people in this country, or any other country, in respect to those qualities which elevate and ennoble the character of communities in the scale of social, moral, or political worth. Their misfortune is their merit—constancy to the cause of freedom. The struggle is now over; they have won a new empire of inexhaustible fertility on a remote frontier; to them belongs the imperishable honor of the achievement. They know the value of a good government none the less for having tasted the bitterness of a bad one.

The settlement and growth of Kansas in a material point of view, taking into consideration the discouraging circumstances that have embarrassed her career, constitute one of the noblest passages in the great epic of modern civilization. I am proud of her past and sanguine of her future. The chrysalis is just bursting into full life, buoyant, elastic, and full of strength to accomplish her high destiny. Her resources, her climate, and her position, show that nature has put it in the power of her people to make her a shining example among the States of the Confederacy—a radiant gem, sparkling in the geographical center of the country. When she is prepared to come into the Union, which will be ere long, it will be with a constitution anointed, sealed, and sanctioned by the free suffrages of the people, in which no doubt or shadow of suspicion will linger, as to its perfect acceptance. Coming thus gently into the sisterhood of States, full of prosperous and pleasant auguries, she will add another link to that chain which binds us in fraternal harmony; another example of the capacity of the American people to sustain the principle of self-government.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. E. NIBLACK

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. NIBLACK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was not my expectation, sir, when I came here, to participate during the present session, at least, in the general debates of this House. It is not my expectation to do so still. What I have, very briefly, to say is rather by way of personal explanation.

When the President's annual message was communicated to this House, at the commencement of the session, it received, as a whole, the approbation of my judgment. So far as the policy of the Administration upon this vexed Kansas question was foreshadowed in that message, I could not see how the President could have taken any other view of the question in reference to the legal points involved, than he did. The case, then, not being fully made up, however, and the question not being before Congress for its immediate action, I felt it my duty to suspend my opinion, so far as was practicable, until the question came regularly before us, and until it was seen what new and different phases of it might be presented. In the mean time I was exceedingly anxious, in view of the division of sentiment here, as well as elsewhere, amongst those political friends with whom I am accustomed to cooperate, upon the propriety of admitting Kansas, as recommended by the President, that direction might be given to the question which would enable those friends to unite in their action upon it. In this feeling I was not actuated by any distrust of the correctness of the President's policy in my own mind, but by a desire to consult, as far as was practical and proper, the views and feelings of others whose cooperation I very much desire.

Sir, when the President's special message was delivered to this House transmitting the Lecompton constitution, I unhesitatingly indorsed both the premises and conclusions of that message. I felt reassured that my first impressions of his Kansas policy were correct. I would have been willing to have stood upon the doctrines and recommendations of that message alone, and to have relied upon both for my vindication. While I had seen so much to condemn and so little to approve in the action of the people of Kansas, I felt then, as I do now, that the sooner this unfortunate Territory was organized into a State, the better for it and the country.

But there were those here who, professing not materially to disagree with the President, insisted that as so much had been charged about irregularities and frauds in the formation of this constitution, some investigation ought to be had by some committee under the order of this House; and as I feared no legitimate investigation upon this, as upon all other public questions, and as I was willing to concede something to what seemed to be an honest difference of opinion, I voted to refer the message to the select committee, with instructions, under the substituted resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS.] Sir, I did so with the hope that, when the smoke and dust which then enshrouded this question should be cleared away, as I felt confident would soon be done, those gentlemen here who seemed only in doubt as to some mere collateral questions would come forward in the same spirit and concede something for the sake of united action in bringing this controversy to a close. Whether those hopes shall be disappointed remains yet to be seen. Upon all matters, however, which I considered a fair test of the real positions of members, I have thus far steadily voted with the friends of the Administration on this question, and I expect to do so, sir, still, to the end of this contest.

Whatever may have been said to the contrary, I insist that the select committee to which I have referred, has been fairly constituted. It was the message which was referred. The instructions were only incidental to this reference. It was proper, then, and in strict conformity with parliamentary usage, that a majority of the committee should be friendly to the recommendations of this message. Nothing to me seems clearer than this. I think, too, the report of the majority of this committee ought to be satisfactory to all here not predisposed to complain. I regard it as one of the ablest things yet published on this subject. With those who desire to pursue the investigation further, and to go into everything connected with the history of Kansas for the past two years, not affecting the validity of the Lecompton constitution, I have no sympathy. Such a course could only serve to render more infamous the names of many persons who have already brought disgrace upon that fair Territory, and to get up a second edition of Kansas troubles, which might serve as a text-book for professional "freedom-shriekers" in the approaching political campaigns. For such purposes, my vote cannot be given. Sir, I will not go into the merits of this controversy. The subject has already been more than exhausted. Anything I might now say, could be little else than a stale repetition of what has already been said by others. I think the President's position has been greatly strengthened by the discussion here. Many of the objections first urged against his policy have already been abandoned. The remaining ones have lost their original force and plausibility. With all due deference to the opinions of other gentlemen to the contrary, it does seem to me that the policy of the present Administration, in the affairs of Kansas, is but a continuation of the same policy inaugurated by the late Administration of Mr. Pierce, in relation to that Territory. How often have we all on this side of the House, both here and elsewhere, defended this policy? Who of us does not feel himself thoroughly committed to it? Why shall we now recede? For one, I will not, whatever may be the consequences, unless some better reasons be given than any I have yet heard urged.

Sir, I am admonished that I am assuming a fearful responsibility in the course I have felt it my duty to pursue, in consequence of the divided condition of public sentiment on this question throughout the country, and particularly in the great Northwest, from which I come. I feel as keenly as any one the force of this suggestion. No one is fit to be here, sir, who is not willing to assume some responsibility when the occasion demands it. I will not shrink from the discharge of what seems to me to be a plain duty on this account.

Whatever may have been the first impression as to the present phase of this Kansas question before it was fully before the country, I have the confidence to believe that a large majority of those who sent me here already acquiesce in the views of the President, and that this feeling is fast ripening into one of warm indorsement. I cannot believe that any very large number of persons in my district can be found willing much longer to give aid and comfort to those who have so long distracted the peace of this unfortunate Territory.

At all events an opportunity will soon be afforded to those I represent of expressing their views upon this now all-absorbing question. I cannot feel otherwise than mortified if I find I have mistaken those views. I desire them, however, to speak out plainly upon this as well as upon all other questions of public policy. I hold, sir, that the most candid relations ought at all times to exist between a Representative and his constituents. I desire, therefore, that my position here shall be fully understood. To the people of my district, and to them alone, I acknowledge my responsibility. Whether I have mistaken my duty or my allegiance, a brief period of time will determine.

Mr. GILMAN. I desire to state to the committee that it was my purpose to have addressed the committee, or the House, in reference to the Lecompton constitution; but the question has been so fully and so fairly discussed, that I have deemed it proper not to address the committee on this occasion; but I will, on some future occasion, indicate my views in regard to several propositions presented by the President of the United States in his message.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. J. THOMPSON, OF NEW YORK, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. THOMPSON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: He who mingles in a conflict in which the fanaticism of passion has been awakened on the one hand, and the fanaticism of interest on the other, each forgetful of its opponent's rights, and is just enough and bold enough to tell only the truth, without coloring or abatement, occupies a post at once of responsibility and of peril; he is sure to satisfy neither party while he rebukes both, and, like a peacemaker in the heat of battle, may fall under the shot of both lines, of which he is deemed to be equally the enemy.

Week after week have we listened to moral lectures on the evils of slavery from one party, met by a recital of its blessings, its Divine authority, and threats of disunion if its political influence is abated, from the other party. Each accuses the other of designs to subvert its rights. The North fears she is to be subjugated by the South; the South fancies she is to play the part of conquered provinces chained to the chariot wheels of northern aggression. Higher and higher rises the cry of warning, remonstrance, and intimidation! Sir, is this fanatical game to go on unlimited and unre-buked? Is no man bold enough to step between the parties, and, as a "day's man," lay his hand upon them both? Shall each swell the waves of excitement from the North and the South, until, as the wild surges meet on this Capitoline Hill, this structure of strength and beauty (emblematical of the institutions it symbolizes) is swept away, leaving not one stone upon another, and time's latest and best empire prove, after all, the frailest? God forbid!

Though coming from the Empire State, and representing a district second to none in patriotic loyalty and political intelligence, it is well known I am no political Abolitionist, nor desirous of meddling with the domestic institutions of the South, wherever they lawfully exist. As a statesman, I have no right here to intrude even my advice, because it may exasperate where it cannot cure. When they desire my counsel, they will probably ask it, and it will then be time enough for me to express my sentiments as a Christian, or philanthropist, upon this creature of local law. As such it doubtless has its rights, under the provisions of existing laws, as well as security in the States where it is established. This institution, however abhorrent to northern sentiment, is the growth of a century, and a century may elapse ere this Republic, under the wisest, calmest counsels, may witness its extinction. But for the interference of party politics, four, and perhaps five States where it now exists, would have abolished it, after the example of their sisters at the North. It is not necessary to say what I would do, should this or that case arise in the developments of Providence, and in the history of my country. No wise court pronounces judgment on a case not before it. Enough that I feel bound to stand by the law of the land and the compromises of the Constitution. So much on the one hand.

On the other, I am no slavery propagandist. I do not see in this thing that expansive element that is in danger of becoming straitened for room, and is casting about for new fields of enterprise, lest it should be driven in upon itself, and perish by a sort of spontaneous combustion! On the contrary it existed at the Declaration of Independence in all the thirteen States of the Union. It has been dying out at the North instead of expanding; it cannot live in a northern atmosphere; it perishes by the side of free labor, where ideas of social equality and equal political privileges so extensively prevail; it was ejected, not simply from humanitarian motives, but from those of economy to the master, and of vigor to the State, which is always weakened by the existence in it of a helot race. Where every gentleman is a working man, and every working man a gentleman, there is no need of involuntary servitude. Labor is dignified, as well of the hand as of the head; and the toiling millions, who form the substratum of the social edifice, toil freely, cheerfully, for themselves and their children, and in the next generation stand on the topmost round of the ladder. Our "sills," at the North are of granite and marble, and not "mud," and are therefore capable of being wrought into polished shafts and capitals, to adorn even this national temple with gracefulness and beauty.

We may speculate forever upon the superiority and inferiority of races, and upon the adaptation of color to climate. Sugar, tobacco, and cotton have a vigorous grasp, which northern and European consumption strengthens and tightens. We have no right to be impatient, denunciatory, or meddlesome. God only can solve this problem, which elongates its shadow beyond human ken; and in the mean time the master should remember that he is responsible to his servant and his Maker for every ray of intelligence he withholds, and every social and religious enjoyment he denies to this creature, whose body and soul are alike in his keeping.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

HO. OF REPS.

At the North, the physical condition and moral elevation of the free people of color are not yet what philanthropy had hoped; and, moreover, a fearful diminution has taken place in their numbers, by disease, by poverty, by thriftlessness, by the social pressure of the white upon the negro, of the superior upon the inferior. That population is disappearing, until, a few years hence, they will, by an inevitable law, which seems to enfold them and the Indian alike, pass out of the vision of the northern eye. With a different climate and relation as to numbers with a white population, emancipation would have been more tardy, and its results an unsolved problem.

However political parties may fight against it, the population of the Territories will be ultimate judges of what institutions they will establish, and Congress will admit them under the provisions of the Constitution.

Up to this hour, more than one hundred speeches have been made upon this floor, in reference to the affairs of Kansas; those who urge her admission doing it on the ground, chiefly, that a majority of her legal people ask such admission under the Lecompton constitution; that it will allay the slavery agitation of the country; that it is necessary to give to that institution a wider area; that the balance of power between the North and the South can be only thus preserved; and that, without this, there is imminent danger that several, if not all, of the southern States will withdraw from the Union! On the other hand, it is urged that the people of Kansas have from the beginning been circumvented and overborne by a foreign domination; that they are opposed to the permanent and constitutional establishment of slavery among them; that the adoption of this constitution will create wider and fiercer agitation, resulting in civil war; that the idea of a balance of power in the General Government between the two thirds and one third is an unjust and obsolete idea; that power must follow population; and that greater peril to the Union will result from the admission than from the rejection of this Territory with this constitution; these, with many auxiliary and minor points, have been urged with great talent, zeal, and sincerity.

I regret that honorable members, in the heat of debate, have sometimes indulged in the language of menace and intimidation—language always unsuited to the discussion of topics so grave and interests so momentous. It is not by threats or taunts, upbraidings or insults, nor by invidious comparisons, that we are to work out a solution of this difficult theme. To my mind there are presented questions of greater immediate interest than whether Kansas shall be admitted with a constitution establishing or recognizing slavery; for no man who knows anything of the tough hardihood and grit of the American character and will, can be doubtful of that issue, whether the knot is eventually cut by legal or martial weapons. If we do a great wrong to Kansas, she has power enough, material and moral, to right her wrongs, and the will to do it. From her position, environments, climate, population, educational and industrial forces, her State policy must eventually be a free policy, as well as that of Missouri, by her side, and no constitutional barriers or Federal armies can prevent it. If not stamped upon her institutions in their inception, for any cause, that policy will work on, repressed, yet omnipotent, until it leaps forth, like smoldering fire, to consume its fetters; and bathe the whole landscape in its light!

But, sir, in the rapid unfoldings of this drama, it has constantly gathered in importance, and assumed aspects more portentous, becoming not simply a question of free or slave policy in a Territory, but one deep, broad, vital as the foundations of popular government, underlying the entire fabric of our national institutions, and to determine, in its issues, whether the popular will is to be respected; whether government is no longer to derive its powers from the consent of the governed; whether fair dealing or fraud shall be the rule; whether our Chief Executive is a public servant or a despot; whether our Government is one of law or of force; whether the people shall govern themselves, or be ruled by a standing army in time of peace; whether the open and shameless violation of all the decorum and decencies of political institutions, promising the people that through the ballot-box their voice shall be heard, and falsifying it by the double crime of forgery and perjury, shall terminate in success, or in detection and defeat? These are questions now looming up before us, and soon to receive a practical adjustment; for, if our free institutions are prostituted to despotic ends; if men in office can defy the popular voice, and triumph; if history can be falsified, facts perverted, violence and cruelty meet with approval; if a President, or party, or both, can defy and trample upon the people's rights and come off victorious—then indeed have we fallen upon evil times; then is this whole fabric of civil government, for which so much blood has been shed, so much treasure expended, so many prayers offered, and with which humanity's progress and the world's hopes are linked, suffering disaster and derangement, and imperiled by shocks it cannot long survive.

In view of these questions, it is comparatively immaterial what the Lecompton constitution proposes to establish, whether servitude or a millennium; its precedents, its surroundings, its authors and abettors, write all over it the record of its condemnation. Yet it has been twice recommended by the President for adoption by Congress, as the basis of admission. It has been published; it is before us and the country; a document so singular and anomalous in its provisions, so pregnant with the doublings of political trickery, so fortified against abrogation or amendment, so hedged about by test oaths and double entendres, so prodigal of grace in one direction and so niggardly in another—that we ask involuntarily, is this the spontaneous expression of a free people? And we are answered by their Delegate here, by their public meetings and prints, by their legislative expressions and protests, in a voice we cannot mistake, pronouncing it a spurious document, not emanating in any sense from the people of Kansas; an outrage and a sham, in its inception, progress, and consummation; a stupendous swindle upon popular rights and sovereignty; a fraud not only upon every principle involved in the ordinary mode of originating and perfecting State constitutions, but equally so upon the peculiar creed and pledges under which it is pretended to be framed.

I.—THE ORGANIC ACT CONFERRED NO POWER UPON THE TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE TO CALL A CONVENTION.

Sixty men, calling themselves the Lecompton convention, framed this constitution. From whom did they derive their authority? from the Territorial Legislature? What authority resided in this Legislature to originate such a convention? Was it conferred by Congress, whose special agent, with limited powers, this Legislature is? No such authority can be shown; and the settled doctrine, both as it respected Arkansas and Michigan, was, heretofore, that all such exercise of power to originate a constitution, was, in the language of James Buchanan, in 1820, "nothing but usurpation!" To make it legal, to give it the form and show of a regular procedure, the power must emanate from Congress; for to Congress is the government of the Territories alone committed; and, unless somewhere in the organic act the Territorial Legislature were authorized to set on foot measures to originate a State constitution, it is as much a usurpation to propose one for Kansas, as if this same convention had proposed one for Arizona or Utah! It has been contended, by gentlemen on the other side, that by the twenty-fourth section of the Kansas-Nebraska act, the legislative power of the Territory is declared to extend "to all rightful subjects of legislation," and that the authorization of a convention is one of them. But by what rule is this act made one of them? Being a Territorial Legislature, its functions are purely territorial, and cannot reach beyond those subjects which are strictly such. Who gave it power to originate acts which contemplate its own extinction? No legislative body can do that indirectly which it cannot do directly. Could it lawfully pass an act terminating its own existence? Such an act would be essentially revolutionary—not in pursuance of, but hostile to, the purposes of its creation. So far from being in the Territorial Legislature, it is not even in the people of Kansas, who are under the wing of the General Government, and can exercise no powers of a political character not conferred upon them by the laws of the United States. If such a constitution is presented, it is of no higher force or authority than a petition; it binds no one, it concludes no one; it is no estoppel upon the people to remonstrate; it is no pretense in the face of objection for Congress to act. I know it is said that it has not been deemed material heretofore how a State constitution originated, provided the people were agreed. But while this is true, it in no way impairs the force or validity of the objection to this constitution, that it comes from a source entitled to no consideration as a duly-constituted body with power to originate it.

Says the President, in his message:

"The convention to frame a constitution for Kansas met on the first Monday of September last. They were called together by virtue of an act of the Territorial Legislature, whose lawful existence [not power] had been recognised by Congress in different forms and by different enactments."

Well, suppose this to be all true, may not a Territorial Legislature exist, and perform all its functions as such, in carrying on the machinery of territorial government without at the same time possessing any power to originate or initiate proceedings, by convention or otherwise, which are to result in the extinction of the legislative body? Their power is, ex necessitate rei, bounded by lines which keep them from suicide—self-annihilation:

"A large proportion of the citizens of Kansas did not think proper to register their names," says the President, "and to vote at the election for delegates; but an opportunity to do this having been fairly afforded, the refusal to avail themselves of this right could in no manner affect the legality of the convention."

It is now clearly evident that the President was misinformed on this subject; it being ascertained, not only that the citizens had no agency in the registration—which was omitted designedly by the officers having that in charge—but that in nineteen counties there was no census, and in fifteen counties there was no registry of voters, including some of the oldest, most populous, and best organized counties; and in which counties, therefore, not a vote could be given. But however this may be, I inquire if the Territorial Legislature had no power to authorize a convention to change the organic law, how could the convention bind any one to vote, or abstain from voting, and by what right are the original privileges of citizens curtailed or defeated, because they refuse to accept such an empty boon, and go through the parade of such meaningless forms? Voting, or not voting, the "legality of the convention" is not affected! It would have possessed no legality had they voted, and it has none now. Not having power to authorize a convention, the Legislature had no power to prescribe the means and processes of calling it into being; the one falls with the other.

II.—THE SCHEDULE AN ILLEGAL LEGISLATIVE ACT.

What has this convention proposed, apart from the constitution, in a most extraordinary paper called a "schedule," forming no part of the instrument necessarily, but dictating the mode of its adoption, and revealing to the people what they are permitted to do in regard to it? It is claimed by the President that it intends fairly to carry out the provisions and spirit of the organic act of May 30, 1854; and that the convention proposed this schedule because "the act of the Territorial Legislature omitted to provide for submitting to the people the constitution which might be framed by the convention."

Sir, I again inquire by what authority did the convention draw up a schedule dictating to the people of Kansas what they might or might not do, in reference to this notable achievement, by ordering an election on the 21st of December last? The President graciously tells us "the convention framed it, because the Legislature did not;" or, in other words, Congress gave no power to the Legislature; and if it did, it has failed to exercise it, and therefore the convention have done it themselves. Is this legal? There was no necessity for it; the convention were to meet on the first Monday of September, 1857, but the Legislature doubtless supposed they might be a long time in deliberation, and that it might be safely left to a future Legislature to prescribe the mode of its submission to the people. Sir, this schedule, in respect to this election, is an assumption from beginning to end. It is nothing more nor less than an act of legislation by a single body, claiming to be of popular origin, but unapproved by any Governor, and having none of the features of ordinary legislation; an oligarchic ukase or decree, as worthless and inoperative as a falling and withered leaf; it binds no one, it unbinds no one. The people may regard or disregard it, with equal impunity; and so it has been looked upon by the Territorial Legislature who postponed the election of the 21st of December—ordered by the convention on the constitution—to the 4th of January, 1858, at which time the only legal expression of the popular will was had upon it, resulting in its rejection by over ten thousand votes. Under this territorial law, the election of the 21st of December was a nullity, and so regarded by the people. But it is claimed that the Legislature had no power to alter the time appointed by the convention. No power? Why not? All the legal power of the convention was derived from the Legislature; and can the creature say to the creator, "I am sovereign?" Is there any question of contract or vested rights involved? Can a legislative body denude itself of its plenary powers over its creatures and agencies, and that, too, by implication, so that they are held in abeyance until resumed by permission of the agency? What novel doctrine is this, and to what consequences would it lead?

STRANGE AND INEQUITABLE PROVISIONS OF THE SCHEDULE.

Look at the substance of this schedule in other respects:

1. It tenders a ballot with one hand, and with the other presents a test oath to support the constitution, if adopted, under the pains and penalties of perjury.
 2. It submits only a single clause to the choice of the voter, and he must swear to support that for which he cannot vote, before he can vote at all upon this solitary clause.
 3. It provides that all male inhabitants over twenty-one, in the Territory on the day of election, may vote; thus inviting back the hordes who overran it in former times, and who promptly responded to this invitation, in place of the quieter forces drawn from the Cincinnati Directory—spiritual voters, dispersed by the stroke of the Governor's pen.
 4. The places of holding elections are not designated, nor the mode of canvassing or returning the votes, but all delegated to three commissioners, named, not by the Governor, nor by any responsible officer, but by the president of this convention, who in this schedule violates the solemn pledge, made before his election, in writing, to submit the whole of this constitution to the people.
 5. The State election of January, 1858, was to be conducted under the auspices of the same set of judges; and we have seen the result of this.
 6. No amendment of the constitution can, by the terms of it, be initiated before 1864, nor be perfected short of 1870, and then only on two thirds of the members of each House concurring; "but no amendment shall ever be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." And after reading all this, the president adds, "that in the provisions of the schedule providing for the transition from a territorial to a State government, the question has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people."
- Sir, I take issue with him on all points of his allegation. Fairly referred, when a test oath bristles in the forefront of the whole proceeding? Fairly referred, when a single point only is submitted, and an oath exacted to support the rest of it, on which he has nothing to say? Fairly referred, when a stranger may vote who has not been there one hour, and may never be there again, only inhabiting pro tempore? Fairly referred, when one man—and such a man!—has the whole power virtually of ordering the polls at inconvenient and unusual places; and is only to count the names returned on the poll lists, without any comparison of them with the ballots, and may carry the fate of this people in his pockets, as he has done, for months? What idea has the President of fairness, if this be the standard he adopts? Sir, I almost admire the daring of this "Rump Parliament" of Lecompton. They felt, evidently, that the people were not to be trusted with political power; they grasped hold of all the functions and prerogatives of government; they rolled the Governor's head in a basket; they bound and hampered with restrictions and restraints the free exercise of the elective franchise; they cut off the people virtually for twelve years from the power of change. "They had," the President tells us, "an angry and excited debate," and graciously concluded, by a majority of two, to submit a single clause of their labors to the people! Benevolent legislators! Condescending Democrats, to confer such a boon! The "factious majority" of Kansas ought to accept this bounty on their knees, or we should abuse them for mutiny and madness in its rejection! One step more would have rounded out the picture. Like the French Chamber of Deputies that inaugurated the "reign of terror," they should have declared their sittings perpetual, organized a standing army for its protection, calling it a "posse comitatus," by way of euphony, and to harmonize with modern nomenclature.

Do we read aright, when the message says, "the convention was not bound by its terms to submit any other portion of the instrument to an election except that which relates to the domestic institution of slavery?" Sir, who gave to this convention power to arrogate to itself the decision of this question of submission or no submission? This sounds very much like the language of imperialism; it hath an arrogant and kingly tone; it comports only with the state and prerogatives of an unquestioned supremacy. No body of men, dealing with the first principles of political science, as understood and administered in a representative Republic, have a right to use it. No body of men, if authorized by the clearest sanctions to "propose, form, put in a shape," a constitution, can wisely use it. Why not bound to submit it? Sir, they were bound to submit it—every letter and every line of it. If this convention had any show of authority, it was a special agency to do a specific act; and that act done its power ceases. There is no pretense that, in the organic act forming the convention, the Legislature bound the people to accept any and everything they might do, or fail to do, and that, in advance, their decrees should be deemed the voice of God, like the ravings of Brigham Young. I deny, indeed, that any Legislature of State or Territory has any power to delegate legislative functions to a convention or committee, and bind the people in advance to their observance; and so thought the Kansas Legislature, who refused to recognize this assumption of the convention, by ordering the election of the 4th of January, 1858.

WHAT INSTITUTIONS ARE DOMESTIC.

Yet the President tells us that this submission of a single clause carries out the spirit of the organic act, and that the convention was not bound to submit the whole constitution, because "nothing but slavery is a domestic institution." Well, sir, owing to his Excellency's want of experience in the field of domestic relations, this criticism might be overlooked, if it did not involve issues and rights of the gravest import. I had supposed that the domestic institutions of a people, in their corporate character as Territories or States, and which they were "to form and regulate" in the exercise of political sovereignty, were all the institutions of the State, in like manner as the rules and regulations of the household are the domestic institutions of home, whether they relate to agriculture, finance, internal improvements, charitable endowments, railways, or the terms and conditions of human servitude; and doubtless the power conferred in this principle covered all these matters of national concern, every one of them full as important as the last. So says Webster: "Domestic—the affairs of a State considered as a family, in contradistinction from foreign." But by the President's criticism the domestic institutions of Kansas are only "the right of regulating their domestics." Why are all others ignored, and sought to be fastened on a people without their consent? Why are they to be cheated by the empty parade of a principle, every advantage of which is denied them? Is any reason given for this? Is it true that no difference of opinion exists on other topics? How do we know this? Was not the first constitution proposed for Wisconsin, with its hard-money policy, sent back to the people on that issue, and voted down by them? and did not Congress embody the principle of submission in the Minnesota territorial bill, and has it not become a rule and precedent in like cases? Is this the finale of the doctrine of popular sovereignty? Does it culminate in denying them all opportunity of choice, and must they take such institutions as their masters choose to give them for twelve years unaltered, because they are not "domestic?" Was it for this that the pledges and peace of thirty years were violated and broken up, and bitterness and heart-burning spread like fire-brands through every part of this wide Confederacy? Was ever such price paid, such hazards incurred for such a boon? But gentlemen say here it would have been voted down if submitted. Is not this a confession of the whole iniquity? Why would they vote it down, but because all men see that in the only point pretended to be submitted there was a trick and cheat? because important provisions were contained in the constitution not submitted, relating to banks, the State capital, county seats, the fugitive slave bill, upon which the people desired to be heard? because the entire machinery of the State government, which the people had elected, was stricken out, and a virtual dictatorship instituted in its room? because it was the consummation and culmination of all those foregone acts of tyranny which had ground that people in the dust for years? But I need not recount all the difficulties in the way of the people of Kansas, to prevent their swallowing this document whole, for the privilege of voting on the slave clause.

THE PRESIDENT WANTS "PEACE AND QUIET."

He tells us all other matters are of trifling consequence, and that Kansas has for some years occupied too much of public attention. Sir, the Chief Magistrate of this Republic ought to remember that no peace or quiet can come to a nation unless justice and equity prevail in her councils; that there is no free American heart but will beat fast and fiercely under insult and wrong; that resistance and redress dog the footsteps of oppression; that government without representation is tyranny, however disguised; and that deep down, hidden among the earliest maxims the men of Kansas drank in from their mothers' lips is this—that resistance to tyrants is obedience to God. While we oppress, they will agitate, though soldiers sentinel every doorway, and bayonets gleam in every city; agitate, though every school-house be converted into a barrack, and every temple of God, like the "Old South," of Boston, stables the war-horse of the invader! This agitation is not aggressive, but protesting and defensive. Tread upon the worm, and when it squirms, complain of agitation. Open a sore, closed and healed by the political surgery of 1850, and when the body politic shrinks and trembles as the knife goes down through marrow and nerve, call this tremor agitation. Etna may as well complain, while her boiling surges work in fierce convulsion, that the landscape above is not quiet; while the fires are raging the earth will respond, and if this agitation ceases, they must first be put out. Think you this young giant of the West, stretching his lusty limbs, and conscious of his mantling powers, can be crushed into quiet by the might of the Federal arm, called by the President a "posse comitatus?" What features of similarity does the President find between the standing Army and a "posse comitatus?" Who does not know that the power of the country, its citizens acting in aid of its own officers, is as widely different from the standing Army as the poles? In fact, the army was sent there to overawe and put down the people and their "posse." The Army is not of the people, but acts in obedience to a central and imperial will.

"When legal process is executed by the artillery and bayonets of a standing Army, Liberty is dead. As well confound the lettres de cachet, of the old French régime, with the writ of habeas corpus, as the standing Army of the Republic to the posse comitatus."

However desirable "peace and quiet," they can be purchased at too great a sacrifice. A pure despotism is the most quiet of all governments. Better, far better, that the initial processes that make the foundation stones of empire be laid in tempest and hurricane, if justice and equity preside over the ceremony, and they lie upon the rock, than to imbed them beneath a clear sky and unclouded sun, if they rest upon the sand. The way to restore peace and harmony, is to permit the people of Kansas to frame their domestic institutions in their own way.

"THE PEOPLE MAY CHANGE THIS CONSTITUTION IN A BRIEF PERIOD."

But, says the President, with wonderful adroitness:

"If this constitution is displeasing to a majority of the people, no human power can prevent their changing it within a brief period."

Does this look like a desire for peace and quiet? to have the Federal Legislature hang fetters about their necks, because no human power can prevent their breaking them off? Has the President well considered what struggles and convulsions, what strifes and excitements, such a change embosoms; what fierce elements it awakens in the conflict, of wrong with the show of legitimacy on the one side, and of right with the appearance of revolution on the other? What is this but sowing the wind to reap the whirlwind? And in how short a time can this be done? It cannot be initiated until after six years, if we accept the assumptions of this instrument—one fifth the average duration of a human generation! Is this statesmanship or time-serving? Tell the exile that in a brief period he may again tread his native soil, and look upon the faces of his friends, and when his eye lightens with hope, say to him, after six years, and he will curse you for a mocking fiend! Tell a free people, now ripe for empire, and capable of forming their own institutions, that you will fasten upon them a constitution they abhor and a policy they despise, and if they are not content they can change it in a "brief period," and what must they think of your wisdom and sincerity? Sir, in this "brief period" this constitutional upas tree may entwine its roots and fibers into every fissure and crevice of State institutions; it may lock and hold with its banded strength every stone and buttress of this young member of the Republic, mingling itself with every interest, and diffusing its poison through every avenue, until the very capacity of resistance dies out, or until men, so tantalized and abused, shake off the dust of their feet upon a soil tainted and defiled, and leave this fair portion of God's heritage to wither and perish in the folds of an influence that spares nothing it can grasp. Sir, this "brief period" is about as long as the revolutionary war. No freeman born on American soil will endure it. You may push power so far, and defer hope so long, as to provoke instant resistance, and exasperate to open defiance without compromise or delay.

I have thus noticed the absence of all legal authority on the part of this quasi Lecompton convention to prepare and send this constitution to Congress for ratification or rejection; that in any event the people of Kansas are not to be subjected, like a conquered military province, to the rescripts of a central power, in respect to the form or principles of their constitution; that the Administration is not consistent with its own avowed creed in forcing a constitution upon them without their own free expression upon the whole, and upon every part of it; that domestic institutions in a State are something more than those regulating household domestics. I have exposed the fallacy of the President's criticism upon language, as well as his reasoning upon affairs of State; I have shadowed out the uselessness and danger of pushing a free people beyond the point of endurance, and have tried to show that justice and fair dealing is the only safe policy of nations; and yet, sir, I am admonished, by the history of the past few years, that all this may be in vain. Step by step, as with the crushing omnipotence of fate, has the policy which now rules the Executive been advancing upon us, extending its Briarean arms until it enfolds every important interest of the Republic in its grasp. No man, as Governor or Secretary, has been found stern enough to do its behests upon the soil of Kansas. One after the other falls under the executive guillotine, because he cannot quiet the throes of this modern Enceladus, that shakes the earth each time he moves within his tomb. It is keen, active, versatile, tireless—it molds and manages every national expression to a single purpose and end—it builds up year by year, beneath the calm surface of affairs, foundations of empire and aggrandizement, until by a sudden recession of the tide they stand revealed to the amazement of every eye. It has a logic as intuitive as it is sure, and according to which everything has followed in its order; no purpose balked, no prophecy of friend or foe unaccomplished, but the end is not yet. "Logic," says Lamartine, "is the vengeance of God." Those messages have awakened a thrill of indignation in thousands of bosoms which no prior act could move; they have rolled the scales from many an eye which, once opened, nothing again can darken. Great masses of patriotic men have read them in sadness, and arose from their perusal as if an eclipse had covered up the sun. They have broken party ties and party entanglements, rendered imperative a new mustering of forces, and already the hosts are selecting their position, and the hour of preparation draws on. Sir, let it come. I care not who is leader. It is a conflict of great principles, now meeting face to face. There is no neutrality, no side issues, through which to escape the responsibility of their direct encounter. And yet, say gentlemen in an agony of laudation, "the message is transparent." Well, sir, I think it does begin to be transparent, riddled like a drooping flag run up from the White House; the big rent in the center shot through by the first gun from the Senate, which, traversing yon avenue, went point blank to the mark. It begins to be a transparency, the most transparent thing I ever saw, and we can now see stars, not on it, but through it.

"NON-INTERVENTION."

But, sir, the principle of popular sovereignty, it now seems, has a new phase for the occasion, "non-intervention." It is now gravely urged that Congress is not to look behind the presentation here of a constitution by the Lecompton convention or its agents, but accept it as the valid expression of the popular will, and so pass it on the principle of non-intervention; on the ground that the doctrine of State sovereignty, carried to its logical and legitimate results, denies to Congress the right of interfering with inchoate, incipient States, when taking the steps for emerging from the condition of Territories, precisely in the same manner as they have denied its right of interference in the organized States themselves. This doctrine is as ridiculous as it is wicked. Congress is bound to scrutinize and review all the proceedings of a Territory in asking for admission, to see to the fairness of every step; that no oppression is attempted, no undue advantage obtained; that the constitution proposed is the fair and honest expression of the popular will, and will promote peace and harmony. Congress has no right to separate the science of government from ethics, nor encourage the dangerous suggestion that governments are not strictly bound by the obligations of truth, justice, and humanity. On this non-intervention principle, it is a question of superior speed, or of more adroit lying, in the messenger; the fleetest horse and the boldest front wins the day. A whole directory of names may be returned by a corrupt commissioner, and the Governor is to certify it by non-intervention. It goes to the Legislature, and they look only to the imprimatur of the Governor, and it passes along by non-intervention, and a Delegate comes here, never chosen, by non-intervention. And so of this constitution. If the votes, or their results, on the 21st of December, are as false as those rejected by Governor Walker, and every member of this House knows it, provided they are certified by this roving constitutional-ballot-box, Calhoun, that is an estoppel upon Congress, and no man can say nay. The argument so often made here, that a majority of the new States did not first submit their constitutions to the people, cannot be urged by any one who approved of, or participated in, the repeal of the Missouri compromise line; that act was repealed to assert a principle—popular sovereignty. How can its authors after that force a constitution upon a new State, upon the whole of which the popular voice has not spoken. They are estopped from asserting and repudiating the same principle in the same breath.

BRIEF HISTORY OF KANSAS.

Kansas has a brief but bitter history, of misrule and Federal despotism. She was organized as a Territory, May 30, 1854; the organic act providing for a Governor, Secretary, district attorney, marshal, and judges, to be appointed by the President. By section twenty-two, the legislative power is vested in the Governor, and a Legislative Assembly, composed of two Houses—a Council of thirteen, chosen for two years, and a House of Representatives of thirty-six, to continue for one year—an apportionment to be made of these among the several counties; and, "previous to the first election, the Governor shall cause a census of the qualified voters to be taken"—every free white male inhabitant being a qualified voter. This first election, under Governor Reeder, was to take place on the 30th of March, 1855. The qualified voters went to the places designated to vote; what did they find? In every Council district, and in every Representative district but one, an armed mob from an adjoining State in possession of the ballot-boxes, and voting for members of the Territorial Legislature; four thousand nine hundred of them doing this treason to the rights of the people of Kansas, and usurping the government over them. The Governor was appalled by this invasion, and attempted to correct it, but had not the means of reaching the evil. Members, actually elected in some districts, to whom he gave certificates, were rejected by the creatures of the four thousand nine hundred invaders. This quasi Legislature opened its sittings, and assumed to pass a body of laws, which would not be credited, had not paper and type immortalized their infamy with that of their authors—a Draco code, more infernal than the bloody and barbarous edicts of the tyrants of eight centuries ago.

The actual voters of Kansas, having no voice in all this work of the invading hordes, peaceably assembled, and in convention framed a constitution; submitted the whole of it to the people, by whom it was approved, and asked for admission under it into the Union. They were rejected, because the Federal Government, in the face of all the facts to the contrary, assumed that the government of the invaders was a legal government. The President became particeps criminis to this outrage upon popular rights, and then commenced that series of measures, unparalleled in the history of this country, to force a government upon an unwilling people. The standing Army was summoned from every accessible post, and bayonets thrust at the throats of freemen, to compel them to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. Unwillingness to submit to a gang of marauders was denominated treason, and shooting and hanging were freely threatened to those who desired fairness and freedom in matters which concerned only themselves.

After the failure of several Governors to reconcile a free people to this combined local and Federal usurpation, Governor Walker was chosen, as peculiarly fitted, first, to legalize the fraud in the eye of the people, if possible, and if not able to do this, then to bring the Territory into the Union as an Africanized Democratic State. His own letters to the President, as well as his instructions from that functionary, abundantly prove this. Two years had passed away in bitterness and broil—two years of misrule, tyranny and usurpation. A law was passed by this ruffian Legislature, authorizing the election of a convention to frame a constitution, ignoring the one already rejected by Congress. The people insisted on an organization of the election districts, and a registration of legal voters, before going into another election. This was denied them, and they could not, therefore, vote. Not one ninth of the voters in the Territory did or could vote. That one ninth elected the members of the Lecompton convention—Calhoun and his associates pledging themselves, on paper, to submit the whole constitution to be framed by them to the people. This pledge is shamefully violated, and the President indorses it—quibbling about domestic institutions. An election is held upon the slave clause—the people indignantly refusing to participate in the farce, but condemning the whole of it by the authority of the Legislature, on the 4th of January, 1858. Directories are copied to furnish a show of voters on these occasions, and even Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, presidential pets, are guillotined for declining to indorse the frauds.

A last farce in the Territory is enacted in the election, under this pretended constitution, of State officers, by an apportionment based upon the fraudulent and spurious votes of non-residents in the Territory. And even this farce cannot be played out without forgery and perjury—one thousand four hundred votes being certified as given in two precincts, more than there are residents there; and, finally, the denouement of the whole is dug from beneath a wood-pile, and now forms the last plank in the platform of the present Democratic party, every man of whom must indorse all this unblushing wickedness and usurpation before he can vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

And this complication of wrong and outrage, perpetrated under the protection of Federal bayonets, is called legal! and gentlemen here, who would scorn to do a private wrong, call this result of infamy a legal government! God forbid. Call it anything but legal. It is revolutionary, tyrannous, despotic, forcible, fraudulent; anything but legal. What! a paper stating that five hundred and forty-two votes were given, when forty-two were cast, a legal paper! or a forgery and fraud? Do not desecrate the law by subsidizing even its forms to such mocking rascality; on this principle a counterfeit note is legal.

HOW THE PRESIDENT DESIRES TO LIVE IN THE AFFECTIONS OF THE PEOPLE.

Why is this constitution pressed with such vehement importunity? The more emphatically the people condemn it, the more fierce is the Executive persistency. The most unblushing frauds upon the ballot-boxes are detected and exposed, yet their shameless perpetrators lose none of their influence or regard. Governors and Secretaries who yield to the popular will are promptly rebuked and decapitated.

The military power is retained in Kansas, for the avowed purpose of keeping down the people, and compelling submission to a government they abhor. And yet the President says he has "no other object of earthly ambition than to leave his country in a prosperous and peaceful condition, and to live in the affections and respect of his countrymen." Live in the affections and respect of the American people—when the popular will is trampled on or disregarded, and legal quibblers resorted to for the purpose of reconciling them to a despotism until they can shake it off! Live in the affections of the American people—when every western breeze comes laden with the cry of executive oppression, which, if perpetrated by a King of Great Britain, would cost him his crown and his head! Sir, I wish the Executive would remember that no man can live there who plants the foot of power on the neck of freedom, who throws the sword into the scale in the contests of the ballot-box, and brings all the machinery of governmental influence to bear upon subjecting an unwilling people to the despotism of his will.

What has any portion of our country to gain by such tyranny? Will it satisfy the North? The throb of the great northern heart is that of sadness and indignation; the recent defenders of the President there are silent, and those who do not eat his bread are dumb. Will it satisfy the East? The stamp act and tea tax of a foreign ministry were a feather in the scale, beside the grinding and insulting oppression of this measure. They fought, and we fought with them, for a principle; but here a principle has ripened into a crushing fact; they fought for that principle with the standing army of a mighty empire encamped at their doors. Is the East less patriotic now, and will she trample on a foreign foe and bow tamely to a domestic tyrant? Will it satisfy the South? No, sir! I think I know something about southern sentiment and southern honor. The history of our country blazes with the record of heroic achievements, patriotic loyalty, and devotion to our national flag, which her sons have exhibited on every battle-field and in every council hall, from the day when Morgan's riflemen followed the daring Arnold through a northwestern wilderness to Quebec, through all the strife and sufferings of the revolutionary era to this hour. How her chivalric spirit responds to what is upright and true; how danger has been defied, peril encountered, and sacrifices welcomed, if they contributed to the strength and glory of our common country. I remember her Washington and Jefferson and Madison, her Sumter and Pinckney and Marion, their deeds of renown—our common heritage; their fame—national and immortal; the voices of her Clay and Preston, yet resounding through the arches of these Halls, and never raised but to testify their devotion to the institutions they honored and the country they loved. Sir, the great southern heart, fervid and valorous as it is, will scorn to do a wrong. No temporary exasperation will satisfy its calm conscience, when memory holds up the record of an evil deed. To a generous heart, the sting of a wrong inflicted is keener than of a wrong endured. Will it satisfy the West, those young and growing empires, just emerged from territorial pupillage, and already mightier than most of the old thirteen States? Will they approve of a policy to which they would have scorned submission, and stand tamely by, while the foot of Federal oppression is planted on the neck of a friend and brother? Will it satisfy anything but a dogged fanaticism of purpose, formed against the dictates of sound reason, and persisted in, in defiance of the remonstrances of nine tenths of the nation?

Would that the President and his counselors would remember that the path of empire is glorious only when illumined by the luster of virtue and justice. The efforts of nations, age after age, to settle upon permanent foundations, have failed—signally and uniformly failed—because power was not wielded by principle; because public ambition was venal and selfish; because the hand that swayed the scepter, and the tongue that ruled the will, were pledged and prostituted to craft and crime; and so man could not attain happiness because he was not free; and he was not free because the wielders of governmental power brought its whole enginery of intimidation and corruption to bear so heavily upon his personal, social, and political being, that not only the desire, but the capacity to use and enjoy liberty was crushed out of him. It was only a few heroic hearts here and there that, like solitary altars, sent up the flame unquenched and unquenchable. Asiatic Governments, in all their phases, never presented the true idea—they were unmixed despotisms. The Greek and Roman illustrated it in caricature and distortion, but it grew in England under a free Bible and a free press. It flickered here and there under the throne of the first Charles, until it broke forth in wide display in the trumpet tones of Hampden, Russell, and Sidney; in the lofty strains of Milton, ringing like a superb anthem of "hallelujahs and harping symphonies;" in the iron tramp of Cromwell's legions, and in the solemn utterances of Puritanic prayer; and on the breath of that prayer it was wafted in the Mayflower across the Atlantic.

Look into the rotunda of this Capitol, and see Robinson, Bradford, and Miles Standish, and those pioneers of liberty on their knees, before they embark. But even here in the howling wilderness, the hand of oppression lay heavy upon them; and as colony after colony grew up, the stern patience, the heroic fortitude, the overcoming faith, that battled with a savage foe and conquered him, that struggled with a sterile soil and subdued it—these virtues, so grand and so ennobling, were rewarded by imposition, tyranny, and wrong, until patience became criminal, and acquiescence a deadlier evil than revolt.

The declaration of our independence followed—not a mass of "glittering generalities," composed and finished up for school-boy declamation and rhetorical effect, but every letter and line of which was burned into the souls of those who composed it. Sir, it was not only an announcement of eternal principles, founded in the nature of man, on his equality, on his intelligence, on his responsibility, but it was an indignant protest against the galling fetters he was determined no more to wear, and the blighting humiliations to which he had resolved never again to submit. Every word leaped forth from the living experience of men freeborn, who felt that humanity owned a common brotherhood and merited a kindred destiny; and now, sir, through all the experience of former years, since that great declaration of human rights has been given to the world, since it was even sanctioned and acknowledged to some extent by the ancient nations whose sway it had broken, and whose policy it had frustrated and rebuked it has gone forth over this continent, building up and animating State after State, molding their institutions, dictating their laws and shaping their interests, giving them harmony, stability, and strength, until all at once we are brought to a stand, and here in this Capitol which it has built and adorned; here, on this high altar, consecrated to freedom, we find men who disclaim its holy evangel, and believe they have succeeded in turning against it some of the grandest institutions reared to illustrate its spirit and extend its blessings.

Would to God that the spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice which animated the men that framed it would come back to her forsaken altars! Would to God that, forgetting all differences, and burying all discords, we could deliberate on every subject in a spirit such as pervaded the nation when State after State wheeled into rank under the banner of the Constitution, and strove which should be foremost in every noble and patriotic achievement; that, rising above all party lines and party ties, we could open our eyes wide enough to see what a sublime destiny lies in the future, if we remain true to the principles on which the pillars of our national greatness and renown repose; and blessed as we are with a heritage such as no living generation beside possesses—our broad domain washed by two oceans, our steamers plying in every zone, and our canvas whitening every sea, our valleys smiling with abundance, and our cities glittering with the trophies of industry and art—let us beware how we imperil it all in the mere lust of party power, perchance to be wielded only amidst the desolations of civil war!

NATIONALITY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY, AND ITS IMPORTANCE TO THE UNION.

SPEECH OF HON. ELIJAH WARD, OF NEW YORK, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. WARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The subject of admitting Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution has been so fully and ably discussed by the distinguished members of this honorable body that no new view can be presented of the immediate points in issue. It has occupied the attention of Congress until, I am sure, the whole country must be wearied of the discussion. It is a matter of deep regret that so large a portion of the time of this Congress has been thus absorbed. The nation has just passed through one of those periodical financial revulsions which occur from the inflated issue of bank paper, overtrading and speculation, leaving thousands in hopeless bankruptcy—all branches of industry arrested and commerce paralyzed; and yet nearly four months of the session gone and not one effort made, one word of hope or consolation uttered, or any measure of relief brought forward in Congress that exhibits an interest, or sympathy even, with those upon whom calamity has fallen so heavily. A sectional and political excitement has been engendered, which, while it may not precipitate a dissolution of the Union, weakens that bond of fraternal intercourse which should always exist between different sections of our common country. My position was early taken from a deep conviction of duty to the nation and my party; my constituents have left me free to take such a course as my judgment dictated; and whether it meets with their approbation or not, I know they will accord to me an honesty of intention and a rectitude of purpose. While my own immediate constituents have confided in my judgment, I have not been unmindful that the united Democracy of the city of New York, of which my district is a part, and the local organizations, have cordially approved of the action of their Representatives that sustain the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; that the Democratic press, the Democratic members of the Legislature, and the leading men of the party present an unbroken front in support of the Administration, and exhibit a unity of action that has not been witnessed in our State for many years upon a prominent public question.

In addition to this concentration of public opinion, I have not been insensible to other influences. The city of New York is the largest commercial city in the Union. In 1856-57, five eighths of the total imports into the United States were imported into that city; one third of the exports, one third of the domestic produce, and over one half of the foreign produce, were exported therefrom; and there were collected at the custom-house there within the same time forty-three and a half million dollars upon dutiable imports; its banking capital, exclusive of that of private bankers, in 1857, amounted to sixty-five and a half millions, and besides has millions invested in other corporations, and in domestic manufacture and trade. These, too, are but a part of the vast interests that center there. These sources of wealth, power, and greatness, cannot but suffer by the continued agitation of this Kansas question, ending as it may in disturbing the harmony of the Union, without resulting in any practical good to the persons the slavery agitators desire to benefit. It is not to be denied that we are a commercial people, and that to commerce we are indebted for our advancement, growth, and prosperity as a nation. The majestic vessels which carry our products to other climes, penetrating every sea-port, bear with them civilization, and instruct other nations that a power here exists that cannot be disregarded. The commercial prosperity of my city, the whole country, the onward progress of commerce, and the agricultural and the other departments of industry, I believe, are involved in the public questions which from time to time agitate the country. Impressed with the value and importance of the Union to my constituents, I find reasons in addition to party considerations for pursuing a course best calculated to end the present agitation, and restore once more amity and good feeling. No one who has observed closely the events in Kansas for the last few years can fail to trace to its proper source the present excitement, and perceive the urgent necessity of investing the people of that Territory with the rights of sovereignty, so that they may exercise the function of a State government, and relieve Congress from further interference. No analogy can be made between the grievances of the American colonies prior to the Revolution, as attempted by my colleague, [Mr. HASKIN,] and the alleged complaints of a part of the people in Kansas. In the former case, Great Britain persisted in controlling local affairs; and in the latter, Congress desires, in the most speedy way, to confer all power upon the citizens of that Territory to manage their own affairs in their own way, subject to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, from the course the debate has taken, an apprehension would prevail with those not cognizant of the facts that a foul and deep wrong was about to be perpetrated upon the people of Kansas; that the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska act were to be violated, and the platform adopted at the Cincinnati convention relating to the question of slavery ignored. To demonstrate that this is mere clamor, it is proper that I should briefly refer to a few antecedent events. The act referred to, passed in 1854, has this provision:

"When admitted as a State, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission; it being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any State or Territory, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

The territorial government of Kansas was organized under the act containing this section. The resolutions of the Cincinnati convention, relating to slavery and territorial organization, were as follows:

"And that we may more distinctly meet the issue on which a sectional party, subsisting exclusively on slavery agitation, now relies to test the fidelity of the people, North and South, to the Constitution and the Union—

"1. Resolved, That claiming fellowship with, and desiring the cooperation of, all who regard the preservation of the Union under the Constitution as the paramount issue—and repudiating all sectional parties and platforms concerning domestic slavery, which seek to embroil the States and incite to treason and armed resistance to law in the Territories; and whose avowed purposes, if consummated, must end in civil war and disunion—the American Democracy recognize and adopt the principles contained in the organic laws establishing the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, as embodying the only sound and safe solution of the slavery question upon which the great national idea of the people of this whole country can repose in its determined conservatism of the Union—NON-INTERFERENCE BY CONGRESS WITH SLAVERY IN STATE AND TERRITORY, OR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

"2. That this was the basis of the compromises of 1850, confirmed by both the Democratic and Whig parties in national conventions, ratified by the people in the election of 1852, and rightly applied to the organization of Territories in 1854.

"3. That by the uniform application of this Democratic principle to the organization of Territories, and to the admission of new States, with or without domestic slavery, as they may elect, the equal rights of all the States will be preserved intact, the original compacts of the Constitution maintained inviolate, and the perpetuity and expansion of this Union insured to its utmost capacity of embracing, in peace and harmony, every future American State that may be constituted or annexed with a republican form of government.

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

It will be observed that neither the act nor resolution contemplated that the constitution of Kansas should be submitted to the people. They intended, unquestionably, the people should have the power to "regulate their domestic institutions," but whether through a submission or a convention was left undetermined. A sentiment and feeling, however, grew up during the canvass that the slavery clause should be submitted, and was acquiesced in, which would have been a full compliance with the act and the platform, leaving the constitution otherwise to be formed in such manner as the people judged best. I did not mention these facts as approbatory of non-submission, for I should have preferred the whole constitution had been voted upon. But whether that could or could not have been done, rested with the people and the convention; such has been the uniform practice, I believe, relating to the territorial action for the admission of new States, except when controlled by legislative action. I mention this because my colleague [Mr. HASKIN] has sought to create the impression that the question of submission of the whole constitution entered into the last presidential campaign as a distinct issue. Whatever individuals may have done, I assert that it was not then made a part of the Democratic creed. In confirmation of this position I cite the following passage from the address of acting-Governor Stanton, under date of April 17, 1857:

"The government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people, through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention. I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institution, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress without delay as one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

This question of submission has recently arisen, and has been seized upon since the commencement of this Congress, and made the basis for assailing the President of the United States for an honest and patriotic discharge of his high duties. The President, in his instructions to Governor Walker, neither intended nor expected that any other question than that of slavery was to be submitted. In his message transmitting the Lecompton constitution to Congress, he says:

"No person thought of any other question. For my own part, when I instructed Governor Walker, in general terms, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, I had no object in view except the all-absorbing question of slavery. In what manner the people of Kansas might regulate their other concerns, was not a subject which attracted my attention. In fact, the general provisions of our recent State constitutions, after an experience of eighty years, are so similar and so excellent that it would be difficult to go far wrong at the present day in framing a new constitution.

"I then believed, and still believe, that, under the organic act, the Kansas convention were bound to submit this all-important question of slavery to the people. It was never, however, my opinion that, independently of this act, they would have been bound to submit any portion of the constitution to a popular vote, in order to give it validity. Had I entertained such an opinion, this would have been in opposition to many precedents in our history, commencing in the very best age of the Republic. It would have been in opposition to the principle which pervades our institutions, and which is every day carried out into practice, that the people have the right to delegate to representatives, chosen by themselves, their sovereign power to frame constitutions, enact laws, and perform many other important acts, without requiring that these should be subjected to their subsequent approbation. It would be a most inconvenient limitation of their own power, imposed by the people upon themselves, to exclude them from exercising their sovereignty in any lawful manner they think proper. It is true that the people of Kansas might, if they had pleased, have required the convention to submit the constitution to a popular vote; but this they have not done. The only remedy, therefore, in this case, is that which exists in all other similar cases. If the delegates who framed the Kansas constitution have in any manner violated the will of their constituents, the people always possess the power to change their constitution or their laws, according to their own pleasure."

The alleged grievance of the Republicans in Kansas, arising out of the non-submission, is not of such a character as would authorize us to reject the admission of Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution. They had an opportunity to vote for delegates to form the constitution, also, when that instrument was submitted with slavery or without slavery, and they refused to exercise the right. But it is urged that they could not vote for or against slavery without voting for the constitution. Admitting this, I would ask who is to blame? Surely those who abstained from exercising the right of popular sovereignty when the delegates were elected to the constitutional convention. Here is a willful determination, and repeated, not to take part in any proceeding which recognized the Territorial Legislature; and which omission, in my judgment, stops them from any claim upon, or right to, our sympathies. Governor Walker, in referring to the selection of delegates, distinctly warns them what would be the consequences if they should not participate in the election. He says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in the contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

This is the true doctrine, and I have never heard it questioned. I firmly believe that, judging by the past acts of the Republicans of that Territory, if this constitution is sent back the same obstinacy and difficulty will exist. It was their deliberate intention that the constitution should be presented here with slavery to keep up that excitement, and to further aid and abet those who seek to break down the Democratic party, and this honorable body will fail to assert its rights and protect its dignity in permitting its attention longer to be occupied with this subject and these local contentions.

The motives and acts of the Republicans have been such as cannot be recognized without overturning all government, law, and order. The evidence is unquestioned and overwhelming, that they have been in a state of rebellion to the government since the meeting was convened on the 14th or 15th August, 1855, which resulted in the convention, held September 19th of that year, which framed the Topeka constitution, to be put in operation in subversion of the territorial government established under the authority of Congress. The organization under that instrument, the assembly of its Legislature, its acts, the presentation of that constitution to Congress, the passage of the bill admitting Kansas a State under it by the Republican members of the House of Representatives, and its rejection by the Senate, the creation of armed forces in Kansas to sustain this revolutionary movement, are now matters of history. These occurrences demonstrate the position I assume, and which is sustained by the President in his message, February 2, 1858:

"This government [territorial] would long since have been subverted had it not been protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States. Such has been the condition of affairs since my inauguration. Ever since that period, a large portion of the people of Kansas have been in a state of rebellion against the government, with a military leader at their head of a most turbulent and dangerous character. They have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied, the government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority. They have all the time been endeavoring to subvert it, and to establish a revolutionary government, under the so-called Topeka constitution, in its stead. Even at this very moment the Topeka Legislature is in session."

Again he says:

"The truth is, that, up till the present moment, the enemies of the existing government still adhere to their Topeka revolutionary constitution and government. The very first paragraph of the message of Governor Robinson, dated the 7th of December, to the Topeka Legislature, now assembled at Lawrence, contains an open defiance of the Constitution and laws of the United States. The Governor says: 'The convention which framed the constitution at Topeka originated with the people of Kansas Territory. They have adopted and ratified the same twice by a direct vote, and also indirectly through two elections of State officers and members of the State Legislature; yet it has pleased the Administration to regard the whole proceeding revolutionary.'"

"This Topeka government, adhered to with such treasonable pertinacity, is a government in direct opposition to the existing government prescribed and recognized by Congress. It is a usurpation of the same character as it would be for a portion of the people of any State of the Union to undertake to establish a separate government, within its limits, for the purpose of redressing any grievance, real or imaginary, of which they might complain, against the legitimate State government. Such a principle, if carried into execution, would destroy all lawful authority and produce universal anarchy."

In these revolutionary acts may be discerned the object of the Republicans, and that is, to agitate until the Topeka constitution is accepted. This cannot be done so long as Congress recognizes the legitimacy of territorial organization, and would be subversive of the fundamental principles of our Government. The question then arises, does the Lecompton constitution come to us in a legal form? The only mode in which a people of a Territory can form their constitution, or alter it when a State, is through the Legislature. This is the proper manner of ascertaining the popular will. Applying this rule to Kansas, we find that the Kansas-Nebraska act left the "people of the Territory perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." Acting upon the power thus conferred, proceedings were had authorizing the election of delegates to form a constitution. Such election was held; the convention assembled at Lecompton, adopted the constitution now presented to us for our action. I have already disposed of the objection that but a small part of the voters exercised their right. The question then arises, what can and should Congress do in the premises, and what power does it possess?

The Constitution provides that new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, and "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." The Lecompton constitution is legally framed, presented, and is republican in form, and the Territory should be admitted at once as a State under the power thus conferred. It has been urged that even if a part of the people would not vote, they should still be protected against their own wrongful omission. I am free to say, Mr. Chairman, that I should feel reluctant to participate in any act that would inflict a wrong upon the citizens of Kansas, and would not do it knowingly. I would not vote for a measure that I believed would fasten upon them a permanent constitution that could not be altered or amended; but, sir, I can see no wrong in giving them a republican constitution, and conferring upon Kansas the powers of a sovereign State. I have examined the provisions of that constitution, and find it is as democratic as that of other States. The following liberal provision is in the bill of rights:

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

This is a full reservation of power by the people, except so far as its exercise is restricted by the constitution. Taking the position I have, that an alteration of such an instrument can only be effected by legislative action, except in case of revolution, and believing, with the late lamented Webster, the great expounder of constitutional law, "that no single constitution has ever been gotten up by mass meetings," that "there must be some mode of ascertaining the public will, somehow and somewhere;" and, "if not, it is a government of the strongest and most numerous," I can only recognize the right of the people of Kansas to change their constitution in the manner prescribed thereby. If Kansas is admitted under the Lecompton constitution, can it be altered? and, if so, when? It provides for a change as follows:

"SEC. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention," &c.

It seems to me that this section (and I give it as my opinion only) takes effect in future, and that, until 1864, there is no restriction that can prevent a prior alteration. I shall not occupy the attention of the committee in elucidating this point—it has already been ably done, and especially by my friend the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] I presume it will not be disputed that, if Congress or a State Legislature pass a law to take effect on and after such a day, (named,) or after such a time, it cannot take effect or become operative until the period designated has expired. The same rule would apply to a constitutional provision. The Topeka constitution has the following:

"SEC. 4. No convention for the formation of a new constitution shall be called, and no amendment to the constitution shall be, by the General Assembly, made, before the year 1865, nor more than once in five years thereafter."

This contained a restraint or restriction that would become immediately operative.

The State of New York illustrates, in her action, the effect of both provisions. The constitution of that State, of 1777, contained no provision for its amendment. The Legislature, in 1821, passed a law submitting to the people the propriety of amending the constitution. They responded in the affirmative. The convention which assembled, instead of amending the old one, framed a new constitution, which was accepted. The one thus formed contained a clause directing the mode of changing it. In 1846, contrary to the restriction, the people, through the Legislature, called another convention, and formed the existing constitution.

Mr. Chairman, no serious objections are urged, I believe, against any other part of this constitution except the slavery provision, or point raised except as to the provision relating to an amendment. It may be said to have been recognized in solemn form by the whole people of that Territory; for, after the constitution was framed, an election was ordered and held under its provisions for the election of State officers and the Legislature. In law this is an estoppel, and amounts to an assent.

Suppose, sir, that instrument could not be altered before 1864: what injury would result thereby to the party that desire it to be a free State? None. It is conceded that there are now in Kansas but about one hundred and sixty slaves. With a supposed free-State majority in the Territory, with climate and soil adverse to the permanent existence of slavery, I do not believe that southern gentlemen would desire to take their slaves there, so that the present number would not be greatly increased before the people could amend their constitution. The public welfare, the repose of the nation, and, indeed, every consideration that can influence the patriot and lover of his country, demand that this subject should be promptly dismissed from the Halls of Congress. Kansas admitted, and the people of the Territory will then adjust their own internal affairs, peace be restored, a more natural and healthful flow of immigration than that sent forward by the emigrant aid societies will occur, peaceful pursuits be cultivated, instead of threatened warlike amusements. If Kansas is not admitted, the excitement now pervading the country will be continued, the subject will again be presented at the next session of Congress, impeding all legislation, and perhaps to the following one; with each protraction the waves of angry and embittered feeling rolling higher and higher. It does not require a prophetic spirit to foretell the disastrous consequences that may ensue.

Mr. Chairman, political history presents curious phases. It shows the members of the Opposition party to have opposed all the leading measures of the Democratic party in times gone by, until public sentiment indicated their adoption as part of the public policy of the country, and, after being driven from point to point, they sought shelter under the slavery agitation, in which refuge they now remain, pressing it on regardless of consequences to the Union. In the last Congress they were the opponents of non-intervention, or popular sovereignty, and in favor of congressional interference, and opposed to an enabling act; now we find them in favor of an enabling act and in favor of popular sovereignty, and what the next phase will be to-morrow may determine; it is not unlikely that we may find them voting for the admission of a slave State. They have the warmest sympathy for "bleeding Kansas," and cry fraud! fraud! and charge high crimes upon the Democratic party; but they have none for the great city of New York, whose vested rights were ruthlessly invaded by a Republican Legislature, and stripped of many of its chartered privileges, to give spoils and patronage to their adherents. I have been taught to believe that "charity begins at home."

Another singular spectacle is presented: we find several honorable members, who fought side by side with us in the great political battle which resulted in the recognition of non-intervention in local affairs of Territories, recently voting for the appointment of a special committee to intervene in its worst form in the domestic affairs of a Territory. Among the latter I find my colleague, [Mr. HASKIN.] It was with feelings of regret and mortification that I heard him utter the following language:

"In arriving at the conclusion to vote against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I have been aided and influenced by a desire to faithfully represent the constituency which elected me, and to fulfill the pledges which I made them upon accepting my nomination. To them I am responsible for my course here; and being honestly convinced that my opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution—repudiated and protested against, as it is, by at least three fourths of her people—meets with the approval of a large majority of my constituents, whose wishes I am in honor bound to obey, I shall vote against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution."

The honorable member represents the counties of Westchester, Rockland, and Putnam. I was born on the banks of the noble Hudson, in the county of Westchester; the traditions of home clustered around and have been identified with it for more than a century; my early life was spent in rambling among the rocks, hills, and dales of that beautiful region, until they became familiar as household words. It is classic ground, hallowed by the footsteps of the Father of his Country and his compeers; the scene of some of the most important events of the war of independence. Revolutionary patriots now sleep the sleep of death beneath its green sod; and there rest, too, the remains of Paulding, (and his associates,) the capturer of André, whose last request to his medical attendant was, "Please tell all those who ask after me that I die a true Democratic Republican," and whose descendant my colleague so recently defended on this floor. Surrounded by such association, the Democracy of that section cannot, will not, falter in a crisis like this; and I am justified in saying that my colleague does not represent the wishes of the constituents that honored him with his election. Public meetings have been held in the several counties of the district, condemning his course, and the Democratic press is unanimous against it. My colleague will bear in mind that his predecessors, in 1854, voted against the Kansas-Nebraska bill in opposition to the wishes of his constituents. He boasted that he could be returned upon that vote; not being nominated, he ran, in 1856, as an independent candidate, and received so small a number of votes that I do not find his name mentioned in the official canvass. Whether my colleague is to share the same fate, remains to be seen. While I desire the honorable member shall take all the credit he is entitled to for his advocacy in times past of the principles of the national Democracy, I cannot perceive how it can justify his present course. Others before him have been distinguished for consistent political action, and yet by a single act have blighted the good effect of all their antecedents, and destroyed their political future. Without intending anything personal, but by way of illustration, I would say that Arnold was esteemed a true and loyal officer, and had done the State some service, until he committed treason against his country. Will it be urged that his treason was therefore justified?

I have heard much during this debate of "reading members out of the party." Sir, no formal pronunciamiento is required for that purpose. They are out by the operation of their own act; they are in the position of the soldier who, in the hour of battle, deserts to the enemy; the penalty follows. It is idle to suppose that, when gentlemen proclaim the result of their act will be to break down the national party, and elevate a sectional one with its attendant consequences, and are doing all they can to attain that object, they can remain, when the act is completed, in full communion with the party they seek to destroy. Their proper place is with the Opposition, and time will soon place them in that association. History is full of examples of conflicts between individuals and the party; but each instance has resulted in a signal failure of the assailant. The contest in such cases is as unequal as that between a mere guerilla band and a powerful and well-organized army. Men, as individuals, are apt to exaggerate their power when directed against organizations. In struggles with the Democratic party, men are but pigmies contending with giants. They may be compared to the fly on the wheel: the fly is crushed, and the wheel rolls on. Whenever a great issue, as in the present case, arises, involving perhaps the very existence of the Union, it is the duty of every man having at heart the welfare of the nation to sustain the Administration in its patriotic course, and more especially those who hold their seats in this honorable body, and were elected upon the same platform with the present distinguished chief.

Sir, I entreat these anti-Lecompton Democrats to pause in the step they are about to take in the opposition. You concede the great purpose and mission of the national Democratic party; you concede it is the great bulwark that alone can arrest the ascendancy of sectionalism; you concede that such a triumph may result in a separation of the States, bringing in its train calamities that may be conjectural but not foretold; and yet you stand ready to strike the parrietal blow. Should this measure be defeated by your votes, and the disaster flow from it which has been predicted, you cannot fail to be regarded hereafter as the parricides of the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, the northern national Democracy stands now, and will continue to stand hereafter, by the principles established by the Kansas-Nebraska act, and those enunciated at Cincinnati. We insist that the Territories, as well as States, have the sole right to determine their local and municipal matters, and that each should be let alone to manage them in their own way. This course must ultimately force the slavery agitation out of Congress, notwithstanding the embarrassment which has thus far attended the application of the principle to Kansas. The present difficulty has grown out of the premature immigration forced upon the Territory by slavery agitators, which went there, not to cultivate the soil, but to foster the excitement which has of late convulsed the whole country, and of which all, I believe, are heartily tired. This rule adopted will not produce like consequences again. There may be some struggle when a constitution with slavery is presented, but I believe public sentiment will determine that it shall be no bar to admission on that ground. Once firmly established and acted upon in good faith, slavery will be left to the law of climate and soil to control it. This law, which has been silently working since the adoption of the constitution, has caused the abolition of slavery in six of the original States, and either abolished or prohibited it in nine of the new States since admitted, and which has now brought to us two, if not more, free States for admission into the Union, thereby destroying the equilibrium between the slave and free States, imposes, in my judgment, a higher duty upon the national Democracy of the North than has hitherto existed, to see that the compromises of the Constitution are maintained, and the rights of the States secured. Its action in the past is a guarantee for the future. All that the southern States demand is to be allowed to control their own affairs, and equal rights with the other States. When a new State seeks admission, and its people desire slavery, Congress should not interpose objection, if the constitution is republican in form, but should at once admit it into the Union. The national Democracy are fully committed upon this point, and will redeem the pledge.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague, [Mr. HASKIN,] in his remarks, uses the following language:
